An Exuberant Young Russian, And a Matured Parisian Prove Their Mettle

THE audience at "the Mondays" of the Symphony Orchestra is like no other that it assembles. On "the Tuesdays," the company is more youthful and predominantly feminine. On the subscription Fridays, it has "social cachet"—or so the authorities in such matters say; while on the subscription Saturdays, it wears an unmistakable air of quiet distinction. Perhaps it is safest to say that the Monday audience enjoys its six concerts for their own sake; that it attends from no other motive; that it prefers six evenings to twenty-four. Call it also the middle audience of Symphony Concerts, as distinguished from the "social" audience of Friday, the "connoisseur" audience of Saturday, the "youngish" audience of Tuesday. Above any of these three, it upturns faces seemingly of European rather than American or New-England origin; while beyond all the rest, it enjoys itself and makes no secret of its pleasure.

Probably to nineteen-twentieths of his hearers, Mr. Léon Zighera was an unknown quality until they read his name on the program-leaf. Yet at the end of Mendelssohn's Violin-Concerto they applauded him to the echo. As composer and conductor, Mr. Nicolai Berezovsky, with a new Symphony, must have been equally unknown. Once, twice and three times he was heartily recalled. Beethoven's third "Leonora" Overture whipped this Monday audience into rounds of clapping. At the end of the concert, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" fared almost as well. As for Dr. Koussevitzky, there is no taking him for granted when he comes to his place. Or the orchestra, when it rises at his call. The Monday concerts, then, for cheerful excitement. On that score, even the Tuesday matinées hardly keep pace. For both, the Symphony Orchestra is not an institution.

Mr. Zighera, of that Roumanian family of musicians, is elder brother to the familiar harpist and violoncellist at Symphony Hall. He has made his career in Paris—in orchestras, in recitals and as leader of a string quartet. Now he would try fortune in American concert-halls. His choice of Mendelssohn's Concerto suggests his qualities as virtuoso and musician. He draws a small, sensitive and finely tempered tone, that, over-pressed, tends to run thin and shrill. He directs it with keen ear, flexible hand, clear musical instinct and taste. He is neither effective nor eloquent in the conventional sense of the words, but he can shade his tone expertly; keep a smooth euphony with accompanying instruments; poise and round a phrase; point up a rhythm; control a climax—all discreetly and with clear feeling for the music before him.

Measuring all things, Mr. Zighera never clouded Mendelssohn's limpid flow; kept every contour smooth and fine; made tonal lace-work of the figures; took the displayful cadenza lightly; was sympathetic to the composer's sentiment. Not once did he inflate it into emotion; so overstrain both the pattern and the mood. At the end the listener knew him for a violinist with a happy sense of appropriate style. Playing Mendelssohn's Concerto in character, he saved it from the years and from the fashions Dr. Koussevitzky did no less for the orchestral part. Taken for what it is, the old piece, now near to its nineties, holds its own. A Viennese like Mr. Kreisler; a Parisian, like Mr. Zighera, plays it instinctively.

Decidedly Mr. Berezovsky is of another mettle. His Symphony is brief and impetuous, plunging through a single movement, well marked into the usual divisions. A recurring motiv, clearly defined at the outset, oftener repeated than varied, binds the whole together. Secondary motivs character each division; one or two suggest Russian folk-tunes.

MUSIC

Herald Mar 14

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 18th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony in D major (B. and H. No. 10). Steinert, Leggenda Sinfonica (first performance in this country). Brahms, Violin Concerto and Hungarian Dances Nos 2 F major, and 1, G minor. Nathan Milstein, the solo violinist, played for the first time in Boston.

The symphony by Haydn, one of the six written for the Concert de la Loge Olympique, Paris, was no doubt unknown to the great majority of the assembled hearers. It was played in 1902 in the reign of Wilhelm Gericke, as another symphony in this set. The Bear, was introduced at these concerts by Arthur Nikisch in 1889. Its zoological companion The Hen is by no means familiar. The symphony played yesterday is fresh and blithe in spite of the formulas expected from every God-fearing composer at the end of the 18th century. It provokes what a speaker at the banquet reported by Athenaeus called "gentleman-like joy." The Parisian orchestra, which Haydn undoubtedly had in mind, was a large one—40 violins, 12 violoncellos, eight double basses—so that the composer could be sure of strong contrasts in performance by the string section. Fortunate composer—whose symphonies require no analysis—no remarks about chief and subsidiary themes: music that one can, sitting back, enjoy without inquiring into psychological intention or noting attempts at realism in musical seascapes and landscapes—music not inspired by book or picture—just music; now pompous, now merry, and in more serious moments, never too sad, but with a constant feeling for tonal grace and beauty.

The Symphonic Legend by Alexander Lang Steinert, dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its 50th anniversary, was played for the first time at the Augusto in Rome on Dec. 14, 1930, when Howard Hanson conducted it. This Legend is a more important work as regards form, construction and contents, if less poetical, than Steinert's Southern Night played here under Dr. Koussevitzky, nearly five years ago. The Legend is the more mature composition, as is natural, for in the years between the composer has not been working and hearing. It is all very well for a composer to stay in his ivory tower lest by straying into concert halls he may be unduly influenced. While Mr. Steinert's teachers since 1923 have been leaders in the Parisian schools, his own music is not like the bean described by Gilbert as "too French." His own independence in musical thought and his natural taste have kept him from slavish imitation of some master either of the impressionistic, the realistic or the anarchistic school. It is not surprising then that this Legend is first of all honest music; there is no desire on the part of the composer to show the originality that is merely eccentricity or perverse in its worship of ugliness. There is a respect for the sound traditions, respect for that which is distinctively characteristic of the French school—we are not speaking of the dissenting or heterodox chapels—clarity, logical continuity, a sense of rhythmic and dynamic values; coloring that is appropriate to the musical thoughts and is neither pale nor gaudy. Although Mr. Steinert calls for a large and modern orchestra he uses it discreetly and does not find it necessary to employ all the instruments all the time or work them overtime. The Legend is the expression of a sensitive musician. It was received with more than the usual favor shown for an unfamiliar work. The composer bowed his acknowledgment.

Mr. Milstein is in his 27th year. There are some who think that a violinist should not attempt to play music by Johannes Brahms until his hair is silvered, his legs wobble and the state of his heart debars him from life insurance. Liszt said that youth is the time for virtuosity, but your true Brahmsite shudders if his "Master" and virtuosity are named in the same breath. After all, Johannes wrote for the fiddle music that demands full expression, and full expression does not come from the fiddle until the player is a virtuoso in the best sense of the word. "But," some say, "the music of Brahms demands thoughtfulness, gravity, a feeling for the eternal verities, a spiritual nature." There is no end to this pretty talk or balderdash, as you will. Surely Mr. Milstein's experiences in Russia until he made his escape gave him experience, gave him food for thought. Nor should the fact that he is an accomplished violinist preclude him from expounding the gospel according to St. Johannes. It is enough to say of his performance yesterday that technically, emotionally and "intellectually"—if any one insists on this feature of an interpretation—it was engrossing and admirable, a performance that by its compelling nature aroused genuine enthusiasm. It is needless to say that Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an accompaniment that was not merely a support.

The concert ended with the exciting, fiery, paprika reminder of Hungary. For once the old saying that the music of Brahms is a gypsy woman trying to dance in a tight corset was forgotten.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the usual Saturday night concert will take place on Thursday night. The Friday afternoon concert will still be on Friday. The program will comprise Mendelssohn's overture and Scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Honegger's Symphony (played earlier in this season); Tchaikowsky's piano concerto No. 1 (Mr. Horowitz) and Salome's dance from Strauss's opera.

The other day in London, Stravinsky himself played the piano-part in his own "Caprice" and was welcomed a deal less warmly than Bostonians are accustomed to receive Mr. Sanromá in the same music. Said the Times dryly:

Stravinsky as composer and as pianist was the bright particular star of last night's concert at Queen's Hall; but when he came on to the platform to play the solo part in his "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra he was received with reserve. Perhaps the audience was waiting to see how bright he was going to be before showing him any particular favor. When it was over the applause was not tumultouous; indeed, it was rather surprisingly apathetic, for the "Capriccio" is certainly a bright work. It contains tunes with lively rhythms and plenty of those quips of orchestration with which Stravinsky in his earlier days improved on Rimsky-Korsakov, and in the use of which his numerous imitators have conspicuously failed to improve on him.

Music Notes and Comment

Globe Mar 15

This week the Saturday concert of the Boston Symphony has been shifted to Thursday evening, in order to make room for the final rehearsals for the Bach festival next week. The Friday concert will be given at the usual hour.

The soloist will be Vladimir Horowitz, the sensational Russian pianist, who should excel in the Tchaikovsky concerto he has chosen. Dr Koussevitsky will repeat the new Honegger symphony, composed for the Boston Symphony's anniversary. It is to be hoped that he may later also repeat Roussel's new symphony, the third of the trio of masterpieces thus far introduced this year. Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" has already been repeated here. It was also played in New York by the orchestra last week, and even the ultra conservative New York reviewers, most of whom detest music later than Debussy, conceded that it is a masterpiece.

Tomorrow night, by exception, the Monday subscribers will hear a symphony and a soloist not offered in the regular series, a proceeding sure to rouse protests that inferior articles not good enough for the Friday and Saturday audiences are being palmed off on the Monday audience. Nicolai Berezowsky, who has had works performed in New York and Cincinnati, will conduct the first Boston performance of his symphony. He is a Russian, and has been one of the violinists in the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The soloist is a young violinist, Leon Zighera, who has two brothers among the Boston Symphony members, the first harp, and a cellist.

Many soloists will appear in the Bach Festival to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week in memory of Henry L. Higginson and in celebration of its 50th anniversary.

Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz will appear with the orchestra in the concerto for two violins, March 27. Mr Burgin will be the soloist, together with Georges Laurent, flute; Ferdinand Gillet, oboe, and Georges Mager, trumpet, in the Second Brandenburg Concerto, March 26. Alexander Borovsky, together with Messrs Burgin and Laurent will appear in the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto, March 28. Mr Borovsky will also play the Piano Concerto in D minor, March 26, and give a group of Preludes and Fugues from the "Well-tempered clavichord," March 28. Mme Patorni-Casadesus, who like Mr Borovsky is coming from Europe for the occasion, will give a group of solos for harpsichord, March 25. On the same date Wallace Goodrich will play organ pieces, and Bliss Perry, the biographer of Henry L. Higginson, will give an address on the orchestra's founder.

To appear in the choral scores of five programs will be Amy Evans, soprano; Adelle Alberts, second soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; and Fraser Gange, baritone.

The festival will begin Tuesday evening, March 24, and continue daily through the following Sunday, March 29.

Tuesday evening, April 7, Lewis Emery, baritone, will be heard here at Jordan Hall for the first time.

Original sketches made for Symphony Hall in 1892 are now being shown at the anniversary exhibition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These plans were based upon the design of a Greek theatre and were subsequently abandoned. They were made by Charles F. McKim of the firm of McKim, Mead & White. It was also Mr McKim who designed the auditorium which now stands.

The Week-End Pleasures of Concert-Halls

Peace Again at Symphony Hall, Discovery at Cambridge, Franck Renewed

A DESIRABLE change has come to pass at the Symphony Concerts, noticed, perhaps, only by those who repine under it or are soothed by it. The concerts of Friday and Saturday began with a symphony by Haydn no more than half an hour long. From first note to last, the doors were closed and kept closed. That is to say, no late-comers entered in the momentary pauses between the movements—no, not even when the conductor had lifted his hand to beat the initial measure. Through the other numbers the doors were as strictly guarded. For the first times, almost, in a season that has now run two-thirds of its course, both audiences listened undisturbed by the inept or careless admission of the tardy. Agreed that, the task is considerable. There are forty-eight entrances to be watched—a surprising number; but as the event proved twice over, with a little discipline they can be watched effectively.

From October through February, breaches of the peace, and public or private complaint over them, had steadily increased. Especially on Friday afternoons, and even when performance was in full tide, late-comers entered the hall without let or hindrance; moved leisurely to their chairs, not always near a door; settled themselves as audibly; in general and in particular perturbed the neighborhood. Worse still, at the pauses, however brief, in a symphony, a suite or a concerto, the doors opened and one or another moved, "dignified and stately," to his or her place; while conductor or orchestra waited their pleasure with uplifted hands or ready lips. As gossip had it, the climax came when one late-comer paused twice in her course to exchange the time of day with acquaintances; while conductor, orchestra and audience waited, in weary politeness, for the end of these greetings.

No wonder complaint multiplied to the management; while the venerable sage of the program-book protested openly and warrantably "in the public prints." Now, at last, discipline is restored; the doors are firmly guarded; many are returning thanks. All of which is not to

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A new symphony and a soloist newly come to America graced the fifth concert of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the evening of March 16. The symphony was the first adventure in this form by Nicolai Berezowsky, a young Russian now living in New York. The soloist was Léon Zighera, violinist, and brother of Alfred of the first desk of the orchestra's cellos, and of Bernard, its first harpist.

Born in Leningrad, Mr. Berezowsky migrated to the United States in 1922 and became a member of the New York Philharmonic, leading the second violin. His "Hebrew" Suite was performed in 1928 by the New York Philharmonic under Mengelberg. He has written chamber music, an operetta and a cantata.

This "Symphony in one movement"—really in four, played without pause—though it is without key designation, was evidently not written merely to shock the public. Even if Mr. Berezowsky had been tempted to take this road to notoriety, he probably would have realized that traffic on it is now diverted to obscurity. No; his music is really quite lyric, opening with a clearly drawn if not especially compelling theme in the flute, which serves him well throughout. There are other themes, too, one of which, for violas, is rather attractive. None of these themes undergoes any real development. They are tossed about and interwoven among the several choirs with considerable sense of instrumental values but without much apparent structural feeling. The slow movement is restful, and the Scherzo engaging in a quite Russian way. In the Finale the composer surrenders to Stravinsky. Here there is considerable rhythmic emphasis, and a great deal of noise. By reason of its energy and vitality, transmitted through a stirring performance under the composer's own vigorous baton, the symphony won a notable success.

Mr. Zighera brought to the interpretation of Mendelssohn's Concerto a good left-hand technique, excellent bowing and strong musical feeling. His tone is small and rather feminine, and for this reason he doubtless was well advised to choose this concerto for his American début, rather than a more robust vehicle. His performance was well received.

The concert opened with a thrilling proclamation of the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture and closed with a performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" in which the meretriciousness of the music was almost forgotten in the virtuosity of its utterance. Mr. Burgin (concertmaster), Mr. Laurent (flute), Mr. Speyer (English horn) and Mr. B. Zighera (harp) particularly distinguished themselves in their solo passages.

L. A. S.

Russian Violinist Makes Boston Debut

Globe—Mar. 14

Nathan Milstein, a young Russian violinist who studied under the late Leopold Auer, made his first Boston appearance yesterday afternoon as soloist in the Brahms concerto at the Symphony concert. Mr Milstein was applauded by orchestra and audience with unusual warmth for playing which deserved the much abused adjective "brilliant."

The novelty on Dr Koussevitzky's program was a "Leggenda Sinfonica" by the young Bostonian composer Alexander Steinert. Mr Steinert was called to the stage to bow repeatedly in response to prolonged applause. Dr Koussevitzky, as is his invariable custom, made his own approval of Mr Milstein and Mr Steinert manifest by hearty handclapping. He is al anxious that young musicians sl be encouraged by a hearty respon their efforts at the Symphony conc

The Brahms concerto is not e tially a show piece, nor has Mr stein's quiet and sensible dem on the concert platform any hi the ostentation of the old-fash "virtuoso" violinist. Yet his bol spirited style of playing, the app ease with which he performed the most intricate and techn difficult phrases, his big tone, his mand of rhythmic and melodic e conquered the approval of Mr stein's hearers.

He has at 26 already acquire international reputation. His ma of violin playing is indeed indispu But ought the Brahms concer sound quite as brilliant as he ma Would not greater purity of tone a less romantic interpretation be erable? At least one listener terday thought so.

"Leggenda Sinfonica"

Mr Steinert's "Leggenda Sinfo dedicated to the Boston Sym Orchestra "on its 50th anniver was first performed at Rome D 1930. Yesterday's was merely th performance in the United S This work has no detailed pro merely the hint to the listener agination that the coda, follow moment of silence, "suggests th rator who has come to the end legendary tale."

Mr Steinert's score is an ela working out of three musical which are developed to a fort climax. The themes and his ment of them recall the wo Henry Hadley among the elde eration of living Americans, Howard Hanson among the y contemporary Americans. He h caped for the most part the vading influence of Stravinsky. written with a markedly inc command of musical texture, th piece lacks some of the harmoni that was the chief charm of Mr ert's earlier work. The perfo was painstakingly eloquent.

Dr Koussevitzky, wisely t from the more familiar symp Haydn wrote for England, ch open yesterday's concert with D major written in the 1780s "Concert de la Loge Olympiq Paris, and unplayed here sin regime of Mr Gericke. This sy is one of Haydn's best, full melodic and rhythmic vitality insured immortality for his despite its obvious limitations hopes others like it may be resu from his complete works and for our delectation.

Small Orchestra

For Mozart Dr Koussevitzk employs habitually a small orc with about the quota of instr for which the 18th century co wrote as a rule, no more than ers at most. But in Paris the by the 1780s orchestras alm large as the present Boston phony, a fact doubtless held by Haydn when writing the sy played yesterday. It was t the right thing to do to use number of strings, as Dr Kous wisely did. One felt that in a hall this procedure might erable even for Mozart.

Yesterday's performance wa ited and delightful one, faithf spirit of Haydn's music, with dantic overemphasis on its was renewed evidence of t progress made in recent sea conductor and orchestra.

SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Post Mar 14

Steinert's "Leggenda Sinfonica" Well Received

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concerts have suddenly "gone soloist." At the last pair there was Mr. Heifetz, scaling the heights in the Vieux

Fears.

Mar 17 Pla

New Composer, New Violinist Contrastingly

An Exuberant Young Russian, And a Matured Parisian Prove Their Mettle

THE audience at "the Mondays" of the Symphony Orchestra is like no other that it assembles. On "the Tuesdays," the company is more youthful and predominantly feminine. On the subscription Fridays, it has "social cachet"—or so the authorities in such matters say; while on the subscription Saturdays, it wears an unmistakable air of quiet distinction. Perhaps it is safest to say that the Monday audience enjoys its six concerts for their own sake; that it attends from no other motive; that it prefers six evenings to twenty-four. Call it also the middle audience of Symphony Concerts, as distinguished from the "social" audience of Friday, the "connoisseur" audience of Saturday, the "youngish" audience of Tuesday. Above any of these three, it upturns faces seemingly of European rather than American or New-England origin; while beyond all the rest, it enjoys itself and makes no secret of its pleasure.

Probably to nineteen-twentieths of his hearers, Mr. Léon Zighera was an unknown quality until they read his name on the program-leaf. Yet at the end of Mendelssohn's Violin-Concerto they applauded him to the echo. As composer and conductor, Mr. Nicolai Berezovsky, with a new Symphony, must have been equally unknown. Once, twice and three times he was heartily recalled. Beethoven's third "Leonora" Overture whipped this Monday audience into rounds of clapping. At the end of the concert, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" fared almost as well. As for Dr. Koussevitzky, there is no taking him for granted when he comes to his place. Or the orchestra, when it rises at his call. The Monday concerts, then, for cheerful excitement. On that score, even the Tuesday matinées hardly keep pace. For both, the Symphony Orchestra is not an institution.

Mr. Zighera, of that Roumanian family of musicians, is elder brother to the familiar harpist and violoncellist at Symphony Hall. He has made his career in Paris—in orchestras, in recitals and as leader of a string quartet. Now he would try fortune in American concert-halls. His choice of Mendelssohn's Concerto suggests his qualities as virtuoso and musician. He draws a small, sensitive and finely tempered tone, that, over-pressed, tends to run thin and shrill. He directs it with keen ear, flexible hand, clear musical instinct and taste. He is neither effective nor eloquent in the conventional sense of the words, but he can shade his tone expertly; keep a smooth euphony with accompanying instruments; poise and round a phrase; point up a rhythm; control a climax—all discreetly and with clear feeling for the music before him.

Measuring all things, Mr. Zighera never clouded Mendelssohn's limpid flow; kept every contour smooth and fine; made tonal lace-work of the figures; took the displayful cadenza lightly; was sympathetic to the composer's sentiment. Not once did he inflate it into emotion; so overstrain both the pattern and the mood. At the end the listener knew him for a violinist with a happy sense of appropriate style. Playing Mendelssohn's Concerto in character, he saved it from the years and from the fashions. Dr. Koussevitzky did no less for the orchestral part. Taken for what it is, the old piece, now near to its nineties, holds its own. A Viennese like Mr. Kreisler; a Parisian, like Mr. Zighera, plays it instinctively.

Decidedly Mr. Berezovsky is of another mettle. His Symphony is brief and impetuous, plunging through a single movement, well marked into the usual divisions. A recurring motiv, clearly defined at the outset, oftener repeated than varied, binds the whole together. Secondary motivs character each division; one or two suggest Russian folk-tunes. There is little development in the orthodox symphonic sense. Instead, changing rhythm, diversified harmonic and instrumental color, keep the music in motion and significance. True Russian, Mr. Berezovsky is no structural composer; while throughout he prefers free form, free melody, free rhythm. (There is hardly a "modernism" in the whole Symphony.) Above all, he has a passion for sonorities fed, no doubt, by orchestral experience as player and conductor. He chooses the driving pace, the whipping rhythm, the tumultuous progress. He urges his orchestra exuberantly, unremittingly, often to the neglect of contrast. He deploys it in tonal mass, or choir by choir, rather than with play of individual instruments. His scherzo leaps; his slow movement sings loud; his finale rises, breaks, rises yet again in floods of sound. Anywhere and everywhere, if there are details, who can spy them out? Hot blood, young vigor and an orchestra at full power carry all before them. Only pedants or "superior persons" will say nay to Mr. Berezovsky's Symphony of young twenties.

From Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra the third "Leonora" Overture now sounds in high, heroic voice. The conductor misses no significant detail; deepens or sharpens the momentary significance. Yet the whole expands and mounts; while each phrase, each musical sentence or paragraph falls into instant place. There is transition, suspense, climax. A musical design, puissant in itself, is moulded and dramatized into epic epitome of the victory of freedom over durance, love over hate, light over darkness. The listener doubts only at the moment when the proclaiming trumpets sound too faint and far. . . . . Agreed that in these realistic days of Spanish composers, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice" is Spanish only by courtesy title. Agreed also that, first last, and nearly all the time, it is orchestral show-piece. Nobody but reviewers of music in New York live perpetually upon a lofty plane of "spiritual elevation." For the rest of us, every one of Rimsky's kickshaws—variations, gypsy song, cadenzas, fandango, what not—so long as there is a virtuoso-orchestra to dispense them and a conductor rejoicing in it to give the word. Euterpe smiles—maybe tucks up her skirt—when she hears such a music.

H. T. P.

noon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony in D major (B. and H. No. 10). Steinert, Leggenda Sinfonica (first performance in this country). Brahms, Violin Concerto and Hungarian Dances Nos 2 F major, and 1, G minor. Nathan Milstein, the solo violinist, played for the first time in Boston.

The symphony by Haydn, one of the six written for the Concert de la Loge Olympique, Paris, was no doubt unknown to the great majority of the assembled hearers. It was played in 1902 in the reign of Wilhelm Gericke, as another symphony in this set. The Bear, was introduced at these concerts by Arthur Nikisch in 1889. Its zoological companion The Hen is by no means familiar. The symphony played yesterday is fresh and blithe in spite of the formulas expected from every God-fearing composer at the end of the 18th century. It provokes what a speaker at the banquet reported by Athenaeus called "gentleman-like joy." The Parisian orchestra, which Haydn undoubtedly had in mind, was a large one—40 violins, 12 violoncellos, eight double basses—so that the composer could be sure of strong contrasts in performance by the string section. Fortunate composer—whose symphonies require no analysis—no remarks about chief and subsidiary themes: music that one can, sitting back, enjoy without inquiring into psychological intention or noting attempts at realism in musical seascapes and landscapes—music not inspired by book or picture—just music; now pompous, now merry, and in more serious moments, never too sad, but with a constant feeling for tonal grace and beauty.

The Symphonic Legend by Alexander Lang Steinert, dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its 50th anniversary, was played for the first time at the Augusto in Rome on Dec. 14, 1930, when Howard Hanson conducted it. This Legend is a more important work as regards form, construction and contents, if less poetical, than Steinert's Southern Night played here under Dr. Koussevitzky, nearly five years ago. The Legend is the more mature composition, as is natural, for in the years between the composer has not been working and hearing. It is all very well for a composer to stay in his ivory tower lest by straying into concert halls he may be unduly influenced. While Mr. Steinert's teachers since 1923 have been leaders in the Parisian schools, his own music is not like the bean described by Gilbert as "too French." His own independence in musical thought and his natural taste have kept him from slavish imitation of some master either of the impressionistic, the realistic or the anarchistic school. It is not surprising then that this Legend is first of all honest music; there is no desire on the part of the composer to show the originality that is merely eccentricity or perverse in its worship of ugliness. There is a respect for the sound traditions, respect for that which is distinctively characteristic of the French school—we are not speaking of the dissenting or heterodox chapels—clarity, logical continuity, a sense of rhythmic and dynamic values; coloring that is appropriate to the musical thoughts and is neither pale nor gaudy. Although Mr. Steinert calls for a large and modern orchestra he uses it discreetly and does not find it necessary to employ all the instruments all the time or work them overtime. The Legend is the expression of a sensitive musician. It was received with more than the usual favor shown for an unfamiliar work. The composer bowed his acknowledgment.

Mr. Milstein is in his 27th year. There are some who think that a violinist should not attempt to play music by Johannes Brahms until his hair is silvered, his legs wobble and the state of his heart debars him from life insurance. Liszt said that youth is the time for virtuosity, but your true Brahmsite shudders if his "Master" and virtuosity are named in the same breath. After all, Johannes wrote for the fiddle music that demands full expression, and full expression does not come from the fiddle until the player is a virtuoso in the best sense of the word. "But," some say, "the music of Brahms demands thoughtfulness, gravity, a feeling for the eternal verities, a spiritual nature." There is

The other day in London, Stravinsky himself played the piano-part in his own "Caprice" and was welcomed a deal less warmly than Bostonians are accustomed to receive Mr. Sanromá in the same music. Said the Times dryly:

Stravinsky as composer and as pianist was the bright particular star of last night's concert at Queen's Hall; but when he came on to the platform to play the solo part in his "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra he was received with reserve. Perhaps the audience was waiting to see how bright he was going to be before showing him any particular favor. When it was over the applause was not tumultuous; indeed, it was rather surprisingly apathetic, for the "Capriccio" is certainly a bright work. It contains tunes with lively rhythms and plenty of those quips of orchestration with which Stravinsky in his earlier days improved on Rimsky-Korsakov, and in the use of which his numerous imitators have conspicuously failed to improve on him.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE MAR 15

This week the Saturday concert of the Boston Symphony has been shifted to Thursday evening, in order to make room for the final rehearsals for the Bach festival next week. The Friday concert will be given at the usual hour.

The soloist will be Vladimir Horowitz, the sensational Russian pianist, who should excel in the Tchaikovsky concerto he has chosen. Dr Koussevitsky will repeat the new Honegger symphony, composed for the Boston Symphony's anniversary. It is to be hoped that he may later also repeat Roussel's new symphony, the third of the trio of masterpieces thus far introduced this year. Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" has already been repeated here. It was also played in New York by the orchestra last week, and even the ultra conservative New York reviewers, most of whom detest music later than Debussy, conceded that it is a masterpiece.

Tomorrow night, by exception, th Monday subscribers will hear a sym phony and a soloist not offered in th regular series, a proceeding sure t rouse protests that inferior articles not good enough for the Friday and Saturday audiences are being palmed off on the Monday audience. Nicolai Berezowsky, who has had works performed in New York and Cincinnati, will conduct the first Boston performance of his symphony. He is a Russian, and has been one of the violinists in the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The soloist is a young violinist, Leon Zighera, who has two brothers among the Boston Symphony members, the first harp, and a cellist.

Many soloists will appear in the Bach Festival to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week in memory of Henry L. Higginson and in celebration of its 50th anniversary.

Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz will appear with the orchestra in the concerto for two violins, March 27. Mr Burgin will be the soloist, together with Georges Laurent, flute; Ferdinand Gillet, oboe, and Georges Mager, trumpet, in the Second Brandenburg Concerto, March 26. Alexander Borovsky, together with Messrs Burgin and Laurent will appear in the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto, March 28. Mr Borovsky will also play the Piano Concerto in D minor, March 26, and give a group of Preludes and Fugues from the "Well-tempered clavichord," March 28. Mme Paternl-Casadesus, who like Mr Borovsky is coming from Europe for the occasion, will give a group of solos for harpsichord, March 25. On the same date Wallace Goodrich will play organ pieces, and Bliss Perry, the biographer of Henry L. Higginson, will give an address on the orchestra's founder.

To appear in the choral scores of five programs will be Amy Evans, soprano; Adelle Alberts, second soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; and Fraser Gange, baritone.

The festival will begin Tuesday evening, March 24, and continue daily through the following Sunday, March 29.

Tuesday evening, April 7, Lewis Emery, baritone, will be heard here at Jordan Hall for the first time.

Original sketches made for Symphony Hall in 1892 are now being shown at the anniversary exhibition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These plans were based upon the design of a Greek theatre and were subsequently abandoned. They were made by Charles F. McKim of the firm of McKim, Mead & White. It was also Mr McKim who designed the auditorium which now stands.

Peace Again at Symphony Hall, Discovery at Cambridge, Franck Renewed

A DESIRABLE change has come to pass at the Symphony Concerts, noticed, perhaps, only by those who repine under it or are soothed by it. The concerts of Friday and Saturday began with a symphony by Haydn no more than half an hour long. From first note to last, the doors were closed and kept closed. That is to say, no late-comers entered in the momentary pauses between the movements—no, not even when the conductor had lifted his hand to beat the initial measure. Through the other numbers the doors were as strictly guarded. For the first times, almost, in a season that has now run two-thirds of its course, both audiences listened undisturbed by the inept or careless admission of the tardy. Agreed that, the task is considerable. There are forty-eight entrances to be watched—a surprising number; but as the event proved twice over, with a little discipline they can be watched effectively.

From October through February, breaches of the peace, and public or private complaint over them, had steadily increased. Especially on Friday afternoons, and even when performance was in full tide, late-comers entered the hall without let or hindrance; moved leisurely to their chairs, not always near a door; settled themselves as audibly; in general and in particular perturbed the neighborhood. Worse still, at the pauses, however brief, in a symphony, a suite or a concerto, the doors opened and one or another moved, "dignified and stately," to his or her place; while conductor or orchestra waited their pleasure with uplifted hands or ready lips. As gossip had it, the climax came when one late-comer paused twice in her course to exchange the time of day with acquaintances; while conductor, orchestra and audience waited, in weary politeness, for the end of these greetings.

No wonder complaint multiplied to the management; while the venerable sage of the program-book protested openly and warrantably "in the public prints." Now, at last, discipline is restored; the doors are firmly guarded; many are returning thanks. All of which is not to eing hide-note and ected ially

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A new symphony and a soloist newly come to America graced the fifth concert of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the evening of March 16. The symphony was the first adventure in this form by Nicolai Berezowsky, a young Russian now living in New York. The soloist was Léon Zighera, violinist, and brother of Alfred of the first desk of the orchestra's cellos, and of Bernard, its first harpist.

Born in Leningrad, Mr. Berezowsky migrated to the United States in 1922 and became a member of the New York Philharmonic, leading the second violin. His "Hebrew" Suite was performed in 1928 by the New York Philharmonic under Mengelberg. He has written chamber music, an operetta and a cantata.

This "Symphony in one movement" —really in four, played without pause—though it is without key designation, was evidently not written merely to shock the public. Even if Mr. Berezowsky had been tempted to take this road to notoriety, he probably would have realized that traffic on it is now diverted to obscurity. No; his music is really quite lyric, opening with a clearly drawn if not especially compelling theme in the flute, which serves him well throughout. There are other themes, too, one of which, for violas, is rather attractive. None of these themes undergoes any real development. They are tossed about and interwoven among the several choirs with considerable sense of instrumental values but without much apparent structural feeling. The slow movement is restful, and the Scherzo engaging in a quite Russian way. In the Finale the composer surrenders to Stravinsky. Here there is considerable rhythmic emphasis, and a great deal of noise. By reason of its energy and vitality, transmitted through a stirring performance under the composer's own vigorous baton, the symphony won a notable success.

Mr. Zighera brought to the interpretation of Mendelssohn's Concerto a good left-hand technique, excellent bowing and strong musical feeling. His tone is small and rather feminine, and for this reason he doubtless was well advised to choose this concerto for his American début, rather than a more robust vehicle. His performance was well received.

The concert opened with a thrilling proclamation of the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture and closed with a performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" in which the meretriciousness of the music was almost forgotten in the virtuosity of its utterance. Mr. Burgin (concertmaster), Mr. Laurent (flute), Mr. Speyer (English horn) and Mr. B. Zighera (harp) particularly distinguished themselves in their solo passages.

L. A. S.

140

MUSIC

Herald Mar 14

MILSTEIN HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Russian Violinist Makes Boston Debut

Globe Mar. 14

Nathan Milstein, a young Russian violinist who studied under the late Leopold Auer, made his first Boston appearance yesterday afternoon as soloist in the Brahms concerto at the Symphony concert. Mr Milstein was applauded by orchestra and audience with unusual warmth for playing which deserved the much abused adjective "brilliant."

The novelty on Dr Koussevitzky's program was a "Leggenda Sinfonica" by the young Bostonian composer Alexander Steinert. Mr Steinert was called to the stage to bow repeatedly in response to prolonged applause. Dr Koussevitzky, as is his invariable custom, made his own approval of Mr Milstein and Mr Steinert manifest by hearty handclapping. He is always anxious that young musicians should be encouraged by a hearty response to their efforts at the Symphony concerts.

The Brahms concerto is not essentially a show piece, nor has Mr Milstein's quiet and sensible demeanor on the concert platform any hint of the ostentation of the old-fashioned "virtuoso" violinist. Yet his bold and spirited style of playing, the apparent ease with which he performed even the most intricate and technically difficult phrases, his big tone, his command of rhythmic and melodic effects conquered the approval of Mr Milstein's hearers.

He has at 26 already acquired an international reputation. His mastery of violin playing is indeed indisputable. But ought the Brahms concerto to sound quite as brilliant as he made it? Would not greater purity of tone and a less romantic interpretation be preferable? At least one listener yesterday thought so.

"Leggenda Sinfonica"

Mr Steinert's "Leggenda Sinfonica," dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra "on its 50th anniversary," was first performed at Rome Dec 14, 1930. Yesterday's was merely the first performance in the United States. This work has no detailed program, merely the hint to the listener's imagination that the coda, following a moment of silence, "suggests the narrator who has come to the end of a legendary tale."

Mr Steinert's score is an elaborate working out of three musical ideas, which are developed to a fortissimo climax. The themes and his treatment of them recall the work of Henry Hadley among the elder generation of living Americans, and of Howard Hanson among the younger contemporary Americans. He has escaped for the most part the all-pervading influence of Stravinsky. Though written with a markedly increased command of musical texture, this new piece lacks some of the harmonic color that was the chief charm of Mr Steinert's earlier work. The performance was painstakingly eloquent.

Dr Koussevitzky, wisely turning from the more familiar symphonies Haydn wrote for England, chose to open yesterday's concert with one in D major written in the 1780s for the "Concert de la Loge Olympique" in Paris, and unplayed here since the regime of Mr Gericke. This symphony is one of Haydn's best, full of the melodic and rhythmic vitality that has insured immortality for his music, despite its obvious limitations. One hopes others like it may be resurrected from his complete works and played for our delectation.

Small Orchestra

For Mozart Dr Koussevitzky now employs habitually a small orchestra, with about the quota of instruments for which the 18th century composers wrote as a rule, no more than 50 players at most. But in Paris there were by the 1780s orchestras almost as large as the present Boston Symphony, a fact doubtless held in mind by Haydn when writing the symphony played yesterday. It was therefore the right thing to do to use the full number of strings, as Dr Koussevitzky wisely did. One felt that in so large a hall this procedure might be preferable even for Mozart.

Yesterday's performance was a spirited and delightful one, faithful to the spirit of Haydn's music, with no pedantic overemphasis on its letter. It was renewed evidence of the great progress made in recent seasons by conductor and orchestra.

MILSTEIN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Post Mar 14

Steinert's "Leggenda Sinfonica" Well Received

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concerts have suddenly "gone soloist." At the last pair there was Mr. Heifetz, scaling the heights in the Violin Concerto of Beethoven. Next week it will be a pianist, the phenomenally dexterous Mr. Horowitz. And yesterday yet another Russian, Nathan Milstein, spoken of with considerable justice as the most promising of the young violinists, made his bow to Boston, playing with warmth and easy mastery the Concerto of Brahms.

A NEGLECTED HAYDN

From first to last yesterday's was an enjoyable concert as regards both programme and performance. For the first number Dr. Koussevitzky's choice had fallen on a neglected and an attractive Symphony of Hadyn, in D major, one of the six written for Paris in 1784. There followed a new and engaging "Leggenda Sinfonica" by Alexander Steinert, its Italianate ardor bearing out the language of its title. Finally, for the first time in a month of Symphony seasons, there came two of the Hungarian Dances of Brahms, generally relegated to the Pop Concerts, but heard gladly by a Symphony audience.

This is not the first time that Dr. Koussevitzky has made a rewarding discovery among the hundred or more symphonies of the industrious Papa Haydn. The most distinctive movement of this D major Symphony proved to be the second, curiously titled "Capriccio: Largo," which displayed Haydn's muse in a richer, more imaginative guise than that which she commonly wore. Yet the other movements, though they lacked commanding thematic individuality, went their way by no means unagreeably.

Composer Steinert Present

It might be objected that Mr. Steinert's Legend is somewhat diffuse, not too well co-ordinated and not strikingly original. But it is heartening to find a young composer who is not afraid of melody and of a show of emotion. With Nabokov's Symphony of last fall, this Legend suggests a reaction from the cerebral abstractions, the calculated uglinesses, of the phase of modernism that seems happily to be passing.

Present in the audience yesterday, Mr. Steinert, who now spends most of his time in Europe, was cordially received by his former townsmen.

Applause for Milstein

The applause that followed the first movement of Brahms' Concerto showed that yesterday's audience was sensible of the fact that Mr. Milstein, who has been little heralded and who has not the advantage of a magnetic presence, is a violinist of remarkable attainments. The purist may complain that his tone yesterday was over-luscious for Brahms and that he played the music with more of outward fervor than of inward depth. But while one may still prefer Mr. Heifetz's Brahms of two seasons ago, it may not be gainsaid that Mr. Milstein decisively prevailed with the Concerto yesterday.

When he was done, orchestra as well as audience applauded him, and that applause was unusually long-continued.

For CHAPPED HANDS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 18th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony in D major (B. and H. No. 10). Steinert, Leggenda Sinfonica (first performance in this country). Brahms, Violin Concerto and Hungarian Dances Nos 2 F major, and 1, G minor. Nathan Milstein, the solo violinist, played for the first time in Boston.

The symphony by Haydn, one of the six written for the Concert de la Loge Olympique, Paris, was no doubt unknown to the great majority of the assembled hearers. It was played in 1902 in the reign of Wilhelm Gericke, as another symphony in this set. The Bear, was introduced at these concerts by Arthur Nikisch in 1889. Its zoological companion The Hen is by no means familiar. The symphony played yesterday is fresh and blithe in spite of the formulas expected from every God-fearing composer at the end of the 18th century. It provokes what a speaker at the banquet reported by Athenaeus called "gentleman-like joy." The Parisian orchestra, which Haydn undoubtedly had in mind, was a large one—40 violins, 12 violoncellos, eight double basses—so that the composer could be sure of strong contrasts in performance by the string section. Fortunate composer—whose symphonies require no analysis—no remarks about chief and subsidiary themes: music that one can, sitting back, enjoy without inquiring into psychological intention or noting attempts at realism in musical seascapes and landscapes—music not inspired by book or picture—just music; now pompous, now merry, and in more serious moments, never too sad, but with a constant feeling for tonal grace and beauty.

The Symphonic Legend by Alexander Lang Steinert, dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its 50th anniversary, was played for the first time at the Augusto in Rome on Dec. 14, 1930, when Howard Hanson conducted it. This Legend is a more important work as regards form, construction and contents, if less poetical, than Steinert's Southern Night played here under Dr. Koussevitzky, nearly five years ago. The Legend is the more mature composition, as is natural, for in the years between the composer has not been working and hearing. It is all very well for a composer to stay in his ivory tower lest by straying into concert halls he may be unduly influenced. While Mr. Steinert's teachers since 1923 have been leaders in the Parisian schools, his own music is not like the bean described by Gilbert as "too French." His own independence in musical thought and his natural taste have kept him from slavish imitation of some master either of the impressionistic, the realistic or the anarchistic school. It is not surprising then that this Legend is first of all honest music; there is no desire on the part of the composer to show the originality that is merely eccentricity or perverse in its worship of ugliness. There is a respect for the sound traditions, respect for that which is distinctively characteristic of the French school—we are not speaking of the dissenting or heterodox chapels—clarity, logical continuity, a sense of rhythmic and dynamic values; coloring that is appropriate to the musical thoughts and is neither pale nor gaudy. Although Mr. Steinert calls for a large and modern orchestra he uses it discreetly and does not find it necessary to employ all the instruments all the time or work them overtime. The Legend is the expression of a sensitive musician. It was received with more than the usual favor shown for an unfamiliar work. The composer bowed his acknowledgment.

Mr. Milstein is in his 27th year. There are some who think that a violinist should not attempt to play music by Johannes Brahms until his hair is silvered, his legs wobble and the state of his heart debars him from life insurance. Liszt said that youth is the time for virtuosity, but your true Brahmsite shudders if his "Master" and virtuosity are named in the same breath. After all, Johannes wrote for the fiddle music that demands full expression, and full expression does not come from the fiddle until the player is a virtuoso in the best sense of the word. "But," some say, "the music of Brahms demands thoughtfulness, gravity, a feeling for the eternal verities, a spiritual nature." There is no end to this pretty talk or balderdash, as you will. Surely Mr. Milstein's experiences in Russia until he made his escape gave him experience, gave him food for thought. Nor should the fact that he is an accomplished violinist preclude him from expounding the gospel according to St. Johannes. It is enough to say of his performance yesterday that technically, emotionally and "intellectually"—if any one insists on this feature of an interpretation—it was engrossing and admirable, a performance that by its compelling nature aroused genuine enthusiasm. It is needless to say that Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an accompaniment that was not merely a support.

The concert ended with the exciting, fiery, paprika reminder of Hungary. For once the old saying that the music of Brahms is a gypsy woman trying to dance in a tight corset was forgotten.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the usual Saturday night concert will take place on Thursday night. The Friday afternoon concert will still be on Friday. The program will comprise Mendelssohn's overture and Scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Honegger's Symphony (played earlier in this season); Tchaikowsky's piano concerto No. 1 (Mr. Horowitz) and Salome's dance from Strauss's opera.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE MAR 15

This week the Saturday concert of the Boston Symphony has been shifted to Thursday evening, in order to make room for the final rehearsals for the Bach festival next week. The Friday concert will be given at the usual hour.

The soloist will be Vladimir Horowitz, the sensational Russian pianist, who should excel in the Tchaikovsky concerto he has chosen. Dr Koussevitsky will repeat the new Honegger symphony, composed for the Boston Symphony's anniversary. It is to be hoped that he may later also repeat Roussel's new symphony, the third of the trio of masterpieces thus far introduced this year. Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" has already been repeated here. It was also played in New York by the orchestra last week, and even the ultra conservative New York reviewers, most of whom detest music later than Debussy, conceded that it is a masterpiece.

Tomorrow night, by exception, the Monday subscribers will hear a symphony and a soloist not offered in the regular series, a proceeding sure to rouse protests that inferior articles not good enough for the Friday and Saturday audiences are being palmed off on the Monday audience. Nicolai Berezowsky, who has had works performed in New York and Cincinnati, will conduct the first Boston performance of his symphony. He is a Russian, and has been one of the violists in the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The soloist is a young violinist, Leon Zighera, who has brothers among the Boston Symphony members, the first harp, and a cellist.

Many soloists will appear in the Bach Festival to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week in memory of Henry L. Higginson and in celebration of its 50th anniversary.

Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz will appear with the orchestra in the concerto for two violins, March 27. Mr Burgin will be the soloist, together with Georges Laurent, flute; Ferdinand Gillet, oboe, and Georges Mager, trumpet, in the Second Brandenburg Concerto, March 26. Alexander Borovsky, together with Messrs Burgin and Laurent will appear in the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto, March 28. Mr Borovsky will also play the Piano Concerto in D minor, March 26, and give a group of Preludes and Fugues from the "Well-tempered clavichord," March 28. Mme Patorni-Casadesus, who like Mr Borovsky is coming from Europe for the occasion, will give a group of solos for harpsichord, March 25. On the same date Wallace Goodrich will play organ pieces, and Bliss Perry, the biographer of Henry L. Higginson, will give an address on the orchestra's founder.

To appear in the choral scores of five programs will be Amy Evans, soprano; Adelle Alberts, second soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; and Fraser Gange, baritone.

The festival will begin Tuesday evening, March 24, and continue daily through the following Sunday, March 29.

Tuesday evening, April 7, Lewis Emery, baritone, will be heard here at Jordan Hall for the first time.

Original sketches made for Symphony Hall in 1892 are now being shown at the anniversary exhibition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These plans were based upon the design of a Greek theatre and were subsequently abandoned. They were made by Charles F. McKim of the firm of McKim, Mead & White. It was also Mr McKim who designed the auditorium which now stands.

The other day in London, Stravinsky himself played the piano-part in his own "Caprice" and was welcomed a deal less warmly than Bostonians are accustomed to receive Mr. Sanromá in the same music. Said the Times dryly:

Stravinsky as composer and as pianist was the bright particular star of last night's concert at Queen's Hall; but when he came on to the platform to play the solo part in his "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra he was received with reserve. Perhaps the audience was waiting to see how bright he was going to be before showing him any particular favor. When it was over the applause was not tumultuous; indeed, it was rather surprisingly apathetic, for the "Capriccio" is certainly a bright work. It contains tunes with lively rhythms and plenty of those quips of orchestration with which Stravinsky in his earlier days improved on Rimsky-Korsakov, and in the use of which his numerous imitators have conspicuously failed to improve on him.

The Week-End Pleasures of Concert-Halls

Peace Again at Symphony Hall, Discovery at Cambridge, Franck Renewed

A DESIRABLE change has come to pass at the Symphony Concerts, noticed, perhaps, only by those who repine under it or are soothed by it. The concerts of Friday and Saturday began with a symphony by Haydn no more than half an hour long. From first note to last, the doors were closed and kept closed. That is to say, no late-comers entered in the momentary pauses between the movements—no, not even when the conductor had lifted his hand to beat the initial measure. Through the other numbers the doors were as strictly guarded. For the first times, almost, in a season that has now run two-thirds of its course, both audiences listened undisturbed by the inept or careless admission of the tardy. Agreed that, the task is considerable. There are forty-eight entrances to be watched—a surprising number; but as the event proved twice over, with a little discipline they can be watched effectively.

From October through February, breaches of the peace, and public or private complaint over them, had steadily increased. Especially on Friday afternoons, and even when performance was in full tide, late-comers entered the hall without let or hindrance; moved leisurely to their chairs, not always near a door; settled themselves as audibly; in general and in particular perturbed the neighborhood. Worse still, at the pauses, however brief, in a symphony, a suite or a concerto, the doors opened and one or another moved, "dignified and stately," to his or her place; while conductor or orchestra waited their pleasure with uplifted hands or ready lips. As gossip had it, the climax came when one late-comer paused twice in her course to exchange the time of day with acquaintances; while conductor, orchestra and audience waited, in weary politeness, for the end of these greetings.

No wonder complaint multiplied to the management; while the venerable sage of the program-book protested openly and warrantably "in the public prints." Now, at last, discipline is restored; the doors are firmly guarded; many are returning thanks. All of which is not to say that the Symphony Concerts, being occasions for pleasure, should be hidebound with "house rules." It is to note only that two audiences of prompt and considerate listeners should be protected against the few who decline to be equally considerate.

[illegible] Bach" [illegible] of spec[illegible] with the [illegible] on view

[illegible] throwing into confusion the orderly transfers of machinery. Continued advent of late comers, men will not be [illegible] because of this, men will not be [illegible] Now, with machines to [illegible] many of the finest [illegible] toward creative work. Hands directly [illegible] with their [illegible] At one time, [illegible] effort, he explains the center of human [illegible] merely [illegible] advent of [illegible] brother [illegible] ard, the orchestra [illegible] ezowsky migrated to the United States in 1922 and became a member of the New York Philharmonic, leading the second violin. His "Hebrew" Suite was performed in 1928 by the New York Philharmonic under Mengelberg. He has written chamber music, an operetta and a cantata.

This "Symphony in one movement"—really in four, played without pause—though it is without key designation, was evidently not written merely to shock the public. Even if Mr. Berezowsky had been tempted to take this road to notoriety, he probably would have realized that traffic on it is now diverted to obscurity. No; his music is really quite lyric, opening with a clearly drawn if not especially compelling theme in the flute, which serves him well throughout. There are other themes, too, one of which, for violas, is rather attractive. None of these themes undergoes any real development. They are tossed about and interwoven among the several choirs with considerable sense of instrumental values but without much apparent structural feeling. The slow movement is restful, and the Scherzo engaging in a quite Russian way. In the Finale the composer surrenders to Stravinsky. Here there is considerable rhythmic emphasis, and a great deal of noise. By reason of its energy and vitality, transmitted through a stirring performance under the composer's own vigorous baton, the symphony won a notable success.

Mr. Zighera brought to the interpretation of Mendelssohn's Concerto a good left-hand technique, excellent bowing and strong musical feeling. His tone is small and rather feminine, and for this reason he doubtless was well advised to choose this concerto for his American début, rather than a more robust vehicle. His performance was well received.

The concert opened with a thrilling proclamation of the "Lecnore" No. 3 Overture and closed with a performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" in which the meretriciousness of the music was almost forgotten in the virtuosity of its utterance. Mr. Burgin (concertmaster), Mr. Laurent (flute), Mr. Speyer (English horn) and Mr. B. Zighera (harp) particularly distinguished themselves in their solo passages.

L. A. S.

TUESDAY, MARCH 17, 1931

MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening series took place last night in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore" No. 3. Berezowsky, Symphony No. 1, Op. 10 (played without pause; first performance; conducted by the composer). Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto (Leon Zighera, violinist). Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish themes.

There was a time in the history of this orchestra when any one of Weber's three greatest overtures was considered by conductors as a safe "filler" in any program. In recent years "Leonore" No. 3 has taken their place. A famous overture, to be sure, more dramatic than the opera "Fidelio," but like other works of Beethoven's it has been performed too often. There has been undue and injurious familiarity with it; so that audiences have come to take it for granted, and, no matter how brilliant the performance, are no longer thrilled by the trumpet's announcement off-stage, nor by the tumultuous rejoicing at the discomfiture of the wicked master of the prison. If this overture were to be performed only once in several years, its grandeur would be more fully realized. Yet when a performance is so eloquent as that of last night, one is tempted to wish a repetition at no distant day.

Nicolai Berezowsky, born at Leningrad in 1900, studied there and in Vienna. He came to New York in 1922 and joined, as a violinist, the Philharmonic Orchestra of that city. His "Hebrew" suite was played at a concert of that orchestra in 1928. He continued his studies in New York and gave a violin recital there. He has composed orchestral and chamber music—including a work that has been performed in European cities as well as in this country. In January of this year he was a "guest" conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

The symphony, written, we hear, four years ago, is full of vitality, at times in a yeasty manner. It shows the exuberance of youth, which, after all, is preferable to the scheming callousness of a more mature composer, arranging in cold blood his patterns and an "original" harmonic scheme, in which all that is unfamiliar is carefully sought out. Mr. Berezowsky's thematic material is pleasing; melodious without being lush. The chief theme is created in an interesting manner in its varied reappearances. The motive for violas has character; the scherzo is sufficiently piquant; the finale bringing in the chief theme with insistence in tumultuously exciting. The orchestration suits no doubt the prevailing hurrah-boys spirit of the symphony. One would gladly hear passages of delicacy; recognize a more discreet use of the orchestra. A more frequent dynamic contrasts; a keener search after beauty of emotional expression. But one should not expect too much, even from a young man of an indisputable musical nature, who has a flaming temperament as was shown even in his conducting. His symphony means much to him, and if at times he "over-conducted," not sparing even the score which in his enthusiasm he knocked from the desk; if certain pages of the work seemed unnecessarily flamboyant, yet the very large audience felt that Mr. Berezowsky had something to say that was worth while, and often said it effectively; it felt this and was so pleased with his fiery spirit that it recalled him several times and in no perfunctory manner.

Mr. Zighera played in Boston for the first time. He is a brother of the harp-player and a leading violoncellist of the orchestra. He has won recognition in Paris, London and other European cities. His tone is not large, nor particularly rich—one should not say "sensuous" for the priggish Mendelssohn would haev shuddered if any violinist had thus disturbed his gentee and always agreeable concerts. Mr. Zighera showed facility and taste though in the opening movement he was inclined to be feverish; and Mendelssohn was placid in rapidity. Mr. Zighera's tone was at times acid, especially in forte passages. The audience like him: applauded him warmly, and appreciated Dr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment. The concert ended brilliantly with the Caprice. The sixth and last concert will be on April 27th.

A "Bach" case of music and pictures of special interest in connection with the coming Bach festival is also on view.

TWO EVENTS AT MONDAY SYMPHONY

Berezowsky Conducts Own Work; Zighera Makes Debut

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In contradistinction to the general run of its fellows, the Symphony Concert of last evening, the last but one of the current Monday series, was marked by the performance of music altogether new to Boston. The piece in question was a Symphony, its composer's first, by Nicolai Berezowsky, a Russian in his 31st year, now living in New York, and Mr. Berezowsky himself conducted it in what the programme announced as its first performance.

SLOW DIVISION BEAUTIFUL

After the fashion of many another modern symphony, that of Mr. Berezowsky runs in a single movement, in which the several divisions of the traditional form are suggested. At the outset, and indeed through most of its length, this new symphony made a more than usually favorable impression. It was to be felt that Mr. Berezowsky wrote with a certain distinction of utterance, that he handled the orchestra well and that, unlike some other modern composers, he was not unmindful of its capacity for tonal effects of beauty. Throughout its length the Symphony displayed an unmistakable Russian influence. This was especially to be remarked in the elegiac slow division and in the exceedingly exuberant final section, in which the composer might be said to have "cut loose"—here there was suggestion of the manner if not of the matter of the dance of the infernal subjects of Katschei in the "Fire-Bird" music of Stravinsky.

Undeniably exciting to hear, this part of the Symphony nevertheless, evinces a certain falling off from the level maintained up to that point; the music here makes its effect chiefly by boisterousness and rhythmic insistence and it seems not unlikely that at some future time the composer will feel inclined to revise and if possible to dignify this portion of the work.

Leon Zighera, Violinist

Nor was this premiere the only event of the evening. Following the Symphony, Leon Zighera, violinist, newly arrived from France, made his American debut with the orchestra in which one of his brothers is first harp and another shares with Mr. Bedetti the first desk of the violoncellos. Mr. Zighera was heard as soloist in the Concerto of Mendelssohn, revealing a fluent technique, an unusually apt bow arm, admirable intonation, a generally agreeable tone and a manner of playing characterized by an exceeding verve that could yet summon for the slow movement of the Concerto the appropriate sentiment and refinement.

Brilliant performances of Beethoven's Third "Leonora" Overture, and of Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish Caprice, respectively, began and ended a more than usually interesting Monday evening concert.

COMPOSER DIRECTS HIS OWN SYMPHONY

The program of the fifth concert in the Boston Symphony's Monday series last night included the first performance of a new symphony by Nikolai Berezowsky, conducted by the composer; and the Boston debut of a new violinist, Leon Zighera, who appeared in the Mendelssohn concerto. Dr Koussevitzky began and ended his program with familiar repertory pieces, Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3" overture, and Rimsky Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, both works in which the orchestra excels.

Mr Berezowsky, Russian by birth, now lives in New York. Though born in 1900, he still looks like a college boy. His symphony, opus 10, won and richly deserved some of the heartiest applause that has greeted a new orchestral work in Symphony Hall in recent years. He has a lively rhythmic sense, a gift of melody, and the courage, too rare in this day of musical complexities and attempted austerities, to write simple, spontaneous music.

Polyphony and what the text books dub "development" do not apparently interest him. He has plenty of harmonic audacity, and the good taste to avoid banalities. His symphony is brief, condensing into a single movement the essential features of the conventional four movements.

Like all his generation he has obviously learned from Stravinsky how to build up exciting rhythmic effects. But in general his style is his own. One thought of the naive composers of the past as one listened; of Volkmann, Smetana, Dvorak, Rimsky-Korsakov, even of Schubert. Yet the music was definitely of our own day and age, never old-fashioned. This symphony should be heard in the regular Friday and Saturday subscription series.

Mr Zighera in the Mendelssohn concerto played with a small, rather acid tone, and a tendency to sentimentalize. His performance did nothing to make one feel the often-played concerto had any new message to give present-day audience. His technique had its good points, but there were some obvious faults. On the whole this performance fell below the very exacting standard set in the past by Boston Symphony soloists. P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
FEB 2? 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
FEB 20 1931

Koussevitzky Plans

DR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

(Photo by Bachrach)
Distinguished Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Higginson to Be Honored As Founder of Orchestra

Bach Festival to Celebrate 50th Anniversary of Boston Symphony—Series to Open at Symphony Hall Tuesday, March 24 and Will Continue Each Day Through Sunday, the 29th

A BACH FESTIVAL to be given through the last week of March will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's half-century season. The festival will be performed at Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored, on the second night, which will be dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Maj Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber phony orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Maj Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who, through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees.

After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly-enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows: George Henschel, 1881-1884; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henri Rabaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924; Serge Koussevitzky, 1924-.

An Illustrious Half Century

A retrospect of the Boston Sym-

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1931

Bach Festival By the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A Bach Festival, to be given through the last week of March, will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29. The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening, March 25, is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B-minor which will open the festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee club and Radcliffe Choral society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, and 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos, Nos. 2 and 5, and Suites Nos. 1 and 3. The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin nad Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D-minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Chlavichord." Mme. Patroni-Casadesus of the "Societ des Instruments Anciens," will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory and formerly organist with this orchestra.

Other events of the 50th anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven Festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of 50 years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

Bach Festival in Boston.

A Bach festival of orchestral, choral and chamber music works will be given in Boston March 24-29 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Bach Cantata Club.

One of the features of the festival will be the two performances of the Mass in B Minor," which will be given for the first time in Boston in its entirety. The soloists will be Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone, giving a splendid quartet. The Mass will be given on Tuesday, March 24, and Sunday, March 29. It will be given in two parts, commencing at 2.30 o'clock, lasting until 6.30, and commencing at 8.30 o'clock.

On Wednesday, March 25, the featured work will be the Prelude and Fugue and Fantasia for Harpischord, flute. Patorni-Casadesus being the soloist. Thursday, the 26th, the Brandenburg Concerto No. 2" with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. will be heard in addition to the "Piano concerto in D Minor," played by Alexander Borovsky, the "Magnificat" for chorus and orchestra and "Suite for Orchestra No. 1 in C Major." Two cantatas will be sung on Friday the 27th. "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit," and in addition one will hear the "Suite for Orchestra, No. in D" and the "Concerto for Two Violins." Saturday night the cantatas "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein fest Burg" will be sung and also on the program will be the Brandenburg Concerto No. 5" with solo piano, violin and flute. "Preludes and Fugues" for solo piano will be played. The festival closes Sunday the 29th with a repetition of the Mass.

One usually has to go to Bethlehem, Pa., for a Bach Festival but these fine programs, so near by, will give the opportunity for many music lovers in this vicinity to hear them. Last year the orchestra sponsored a Brahms Festival which was a great success and attracted listeners from many points.

Continued
Now Page 14

TUESDAY, MARCH 17, 1931

MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening series took place last night in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore" No. 3. Berezowsky, Symphony No. 1, Op. 10 (played without pause; first performance; conducted by the composer). Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto (Leon Zighera, violinist). Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish themes.

There was a time in the history of this orchestra when any one of Weber's three greatest overtures was considered by conductors as a safe "filler" in any program. In recent years "Leonore" No. 3 has taken their place. A famous overture, to be sure, more dramatic than the opera "Fidelio," but like other works of Beethoven's it has been performed too often. There has been undue and injurious familiarity with it; so that audiences have come to take it for granted, and, no matter how brilliant the performance, are no longer thrilled by the trumpet's announcement off-stage, nor by the tumultuous rejoicing at the discomfiture of the wicked master of the prison. If this overture were to be performed only once in several years, its grandeur would be more fully realized. Yet when a performance is so eloquent as that of last night, one is tempted to wish a repetition at no distant day.

Nicolai Berezowsky, born at Leningrad in 1900, studied there and in Vienna. He came to New York in 1922 and joined, as a violinist, the Philharmonic Orchestra of that city. His "Hebrew" suite was played at a concert of that orchestra in 1928. He continued his studies in New York and gave a violin recital there. He has composed orchestral and chamber music—including a work that has been performed in European cities as well as in this country. In January of this year he was a "guest" conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

The symphony, written, we hear, four years ago, is full of vitality, at times in a yeasty manner. It shows the exuberance of youth, which, after all, is preferable to the scheming callousness of a more mature composer, arranging in cold blood his patterns and an "original" harmonic scheme, in which all that is unfamiliar is carefully sought out. Mr. Berezowsky's thematic material is pleasing; melodious without being lush. The chief theme is created in an interesting manner in its varied reappearances. The motive for violas has character; the scherzo is sufficiently piquant; the finale bringing in the chief theme with insistence in tumultuously exciting. The orchestration suits no doubt the prevailing hurrah-boys spirit of the symphony. One would gladly hear passages of delicacy; recognize a more discreet use of the orchestra. A more frequent dynamic contrasts; a keener search after beauty of emotional expression. But one should not expect too much, even from a young man of an indisputable musical nature, who has a flaming temperament as was shown even in his conducting. His symphony means much to him, and if at times he "over-conducted," not sparing even the score which in his enthusiasm he knocked from the desk; if certain pages of the work seemed unnecessarily flamboyant, yet the very large audience felt that Mr. Berezowsky had something to say that was worth while, and often said it effectively; it felt this and was so pleased with his fiery spirit that it recalled him several times and in no perfunctory manner.

Mr. Zighera played in Boston for the first time. He is a brother of the harp-player and a leading violoncellist of the orchestra. He has won recognition in Paris, London and other European cities. His tone is not large, nor particularly rich—one should not say "sensuous" for the priggish Mendelssohn would haev shuddered if any violinist had thus disturbed his gentle and always agreeable concerts. Mr. Zighera showed facility and taste though in the opening movement he was inclined to be feverish: and Mendelssohn was placid in rapidity. Mr. Zighera's tone was at times acid, especially in forte passages. The audience liked him: applauded him warmly, and appreciated Dr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment. The concert ended brilliantly with the Caprice. The sixth and last concert will be on April 27th.

A "Bach" case of music and pictures of special interest in connection with the coming Bach festival is also on view.

TWO EVENTS AT MONDAY SYMPHONY

Berezowsky Conducts Own Work; Zighera Makes Debut

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In contradistinction to the general run of its fellows, the Symphony Concert of last evening, the last but one of the current Monday series, was marked by the performance of music altogether new to Boston. The piece in question was a Symphony, its composer's first, by Nicolai Berezowsky, a Russian in his 31st year, now living in New York, and Mr. Berezowsky himself conducted it in what the programme announced as its first performance.

SLOW DIVISION BEAUTIFUL

After the fashion of many another modern symphony, that of Mr. Berezowsky runs in a single movement, in which the several divisions of the traditional form are suggested. At the outset, and indeed through most of its length, this new symphony made a more than usually favorable impression. It was to be felt that Mr. Berezowsky wrote with a certain distinction of utterance, that he handled the orchestra well and that, unlike some other modern composers, he was not unmindful of its capacity for tonal effects of beauty. Throughout its length the Symphony displayed an unmistakable Russian influence. This was especially to be remarked in the elegiac slow division and in the exceedingly exuberant final section, in which the composer might be said to have "cut loose"—here there was suggestion of the manner if not of the matter of the dance of the infernal subjects of Katschei in the "Fire-Bird" music of Stravinsky.

Undeniably exciting to hear, this part of the Symphony nevertheless, evinces a certain falling off from the level maintained up to that point; the music here makes its effect chiefly by boisterousness and rhythmic insistence and it seems not unlikely that at some future time the composer will feel inclined to revise and if possible to dignify this portion of the work.

Leon Zighera, Violinist

Nor was this premiere the only event of the evening. Following the Symphony, Leon Zighera, violinist, newly arrived from France, made his American debut with the orchestra in which one of his brothers is first harp and another shares with Mr. Bedetti the first desk of the violoncellos. Mr. Zighera was heard as soloist in the Concerto of Mendelssohn, revealing a fluent technique, an unusually apt bow arm, admirable intonation, a generally agreeable tone and a manner of playing characterized by an exceeding verve that could yet summon for the slow movement of the Concerto the appropriate sentiment and refinement.

Brilliant performances of Beethoven's Third "Leonora" Overture, and of Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish Caprice, respectively, began and ended a more than usually interesting Monday evening concert.

ALLEGES HER "MARK" FORGED ON MORTGAG

Mrs Carrie Jessie Files Bill in Equity

Mrs Carrie Jessie of Arlington, who does not write but signs with a cross as her legal mark or signature, yesterday filed a bill in equity in Middlesex Superior Court alleging that her "signature" was forged to mortgage documents filed in the Middlesex Regis-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 20 19
THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
FEB 27 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
FEB 20 1931

Koussevitzky Plans

DR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

(Photo by Bachrach)
Distinguished Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Higginson to Be Honored As Founder of Orchestra

Bach Festival to Celebrate 50th Anniversary of Boston Symphony—Series to Open at Symphony Hall Tuesday, March 24 and Will Continue Each Day Through Sunday, the 29th

A BACH FESTIVAL to be given through the last week of March will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's half-century season. The festival will be performed at Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored, on the second night, which will be dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Maj Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B minor which will open the festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee club and Radcliffe Choral society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos (Nos 2 and 5), and suites (Nos 1 and 3). The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord." Mme Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens," will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England conservatory, and formerly organist with this orchestra.

Other events of the 50th anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of 50 years ago.

An Illustrious Half Century

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Maj Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who, through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees.

After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly-enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows: George Henschel, 1881-1884; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henri Rabaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924; Serge Koussevitzky, 1924-.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1931

Bach Festival By the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A Bach Festival, to be given through the last week of March, will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29. The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening, March 25, is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B-minor which will open the festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee club and Radcliffe Choral society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, and 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos, Nos. 2 and 5, and Suites Nos. 1 and 3. The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin nad Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D-minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Clhlavichord." Mme. Patroni-Casadesus of the "Societ des Instruments Anciens," will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory and formerly organist with this orchestra.

Other events of the 50th anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven Festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was led by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of 50 years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

Bach Festival in Boston.

A Bach festival of orchestral, choral and chamber music works will be given in Boston March 24-29 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Bach Cantata Club.

One of the features of the festival will be the two performances of the "Mass in B Minor," which will be given for the first time in Boston in its entirety. The soloists will be Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone, form nearly a splendid quartet. The Mass will be given on Tuesday, March 24, and Sunday, March 29. It will be given in two parts, commencing at 2.30 o'clock, lasting until 6.30, and commencing at 8.30 o'clock.

On Wednesday, March 25, the featured work will be the Prelude and Fugue and Fantasia for Harpischord, Organ. Patorni-Casadesus being the soloist. Thursday, the 26th, the Third Brandenburg Concerto No. 2" with violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, will be heard in addition to the "Piano Concerto in D Minor," played by Alexander Borovsky, the "Magnificat" for chorus and orchestra and "Suite for Orchestra No. 1 in C Major." Two cantatas will be sung on Friday the 27th. "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit," and in addition one will hear the "Suite for Orchestra, No. in D" and the "Concerto for Two Violins." Saturday night the cantatas "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein fest Burg" will be sung and also on the program will be the Brandenburg Concerto No. 5" with solo piano, violin and flute. "Preludes and Fugues" for solo piano will be played. The festival closes Sunday the 29th with a repetition of the Mass.

One usually has to go to Bethlehem, Pa., for a Bach Festival but these fine programs, so near by, will give the opportunity for many music lovers in this vicinity to hear them. Last year the orchestra sponsored a Brahms Festival which was a great success and attracted listeners from many points.

Continued from Page 14

TUESDAY. MARCH 17. 1931

MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening series took place last night in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore" No. 3. Berezowsky, Symphony No. 1, Op. 10 (played without pause; first performance; conducted by the composer). Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto (Leon Zighera, violinist). Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish themes.

There was a time in the history of this orchestra when any one of Weber's three greatest overtures was considered by conductors as a safe "filler" in any program. In recent years "Leonore" No. 3 has taken their place. A famous overture, to be sure, more dramatic than the opera "Fidelio," but like other works of Beethoven's it has been performed too often. There has been undue and injurious familiarity with it; so that audiences have come to take it for granted, and, no matter how brilliant the performance, are no longer thrilled by the trumpet's announcement off-stage, nor by the tumultuous rejoicing at the discomfiture of the wicked master of the prison. If this overture were to be performed only once in several years, its grandeur would be more fully realized. Yet when a performance is so eloquent as that of last night, one is tempted to wish a repetition at no distant day.

Nicolai Berezowsky, born at Leningrad in 1900, studied there and in Vienna. He came to New York in 1922 and joined, as a violinist, the Philharmonic Orchestra of that city. His "Hebrew" suite was played at a concert of that orchestra in 1928. He continued his studies in New York and gave a violin recital there. He has composed orchestral and chamber music—including a work that has been performed in European cities as well as in this country. In January of this year he was a "guest" conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

The symphony, written, we hear, four years ago, is full of vitality, at times in a yeasty manner. It shows the exuberance of youth, which, after all, is preferable to the scheming callousness of a more mature composer, arranging in cold blood his patterns and an "original" harmonic scheme, in which all that is unfamiliar is carefully sought out. Mr. Berezowsky's thematic material is pleasing; melodious without being lush. The chief theme is created in an interesting manner in its varied reappearances. The motive for violas has character; the scherzo is sufficiently piquant; the finale bringing in the chief theme with insistence in tumultuously exciting. The orchestration suits no doubt the prevailing hurrah-boys spirit of the symphony. One would gladly hear passages of delicacy; recognize a more discreet use of the orchestra. A more frequent dynamic contrasts; a keener search after beauty of emotional expression. But one should not expect too much, even from a young man of an indisputable musical nature, who has a flaming temperament as was shown even in his conducting. His symphony means much to him, and if at times he "over-conducted," not sparing even the score which in his enthusiasm he knocked from the desk; if certain pages of the work seemed unnecessarily flamboyant, yet the very large audience felt that Mr. Berezowsky had something to say that was worth while, and often said it effectively; it felt this and was so pleased with his fiery spirit that it recalled him several times and in no perfunctory manner.

Mr. Zighera played in Boston for the first time. He is a brother of the harp-player and a leading violoncellist of the orchestra. He has won recognition in Paris, London and other Europe[an] cities. His tone is not large, nor pa[r]ticularly rich—one should not e[x]pect "sensuous" for the priggish Mendel[s]sohn would haev shuddered if any vi[o]linist had thus disturbed his gent[le] and always agreeable concerts. M[r.] Zighera showed facility and ta[ste] though in the opening movement he w[as] inclined to be feverish; and Mendel[s]sohn was placid in rapidity. Mr. Zi[g]hera's tone was at times acid, especial[ly] in forte passages. The audience lik[ed] him: applauded him warmly, and a[p]preciated Dr. Koussevitzky's accompan[i]ment. The concert ended brilliant[ly] with the Caprice. The sixth and la[st] concert will be on April 27th.

TWO EVENTS AT MONDAY SYMPHONY

Berezowsky Conducts Own Work; Zighera Makes Debut

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In contradistinction to the general run of its fellows, the Symphony Concert of last evening, the last but one of the current Monday series, was marked by the performance of music altogether new to Boston. The piece in question was a Symphony, its composer's first, by Nicolai Berezowsky, a Russian in his 31st year, now living in New York, and Mr. Berezowsky himself conducted it in what the programme announced as its first performance.

SLOW DIVISION BEAUTIFUL

After the fashion of many another modern symphony, that of Mr. Berezowsky runs in a single movement, in which the several divisions of the traditional form are suggested. At the outset, and indeed through most of its length, this new symphony made a more than usually favorable impression. It was to be felt that Mr. Berezowsky wrote with a certain distinction of utterance, that he handled the orchestra well and that, unlike some other modern composers, he was not unmindful of its capacity for tonal effects of beauty. Throughout its length the Symphony displayed an unmistakable Russian influence. This was especially to be remarked in the elegiac slow division and in the exceedingly exuberant final section, in which the composer might be said to have "cut loose"—here there was suggestion of the manner if not of the matter of the dance of the infernal subjects of Katschei in the "Fire-Bird" music of Stravinsky.

Undeniably exciting to hear, this part of the Symphony nevertheless, evinces a certain falling off from the level maintained up to that point; the music here makes its effect chiefly by boisterousness and rhythmic insistence and it seems not unlikely that at some future time the composer will feel inclined to revise and if possible to dignify this portion of the work.

Leon Zighera, Violinist

Nor was this premiere the only event of the evening. Following the Symphony, Leon Zighera, violinist, newly arrived from France, made his American debut with the orchestra in which one of his brothers is first harp and another shares with Mr. Bedetti the first desk of the violoncellos. Mr. Zighera was heard as soloist in the Concerto of Mendelssohn, revealing a fluent technique, an unusually apt bow arm, admirable intonation, a generally agreeable tone and a manner of playing characterized by an exceeding verve that could yet summon for the slow movement of the Concerto the appropriate sentiment and refinement.

Brilliant performances of Beethoven's Third "Leonora" Overture, and of Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish Caprice, respectively, began and ended a more than usually interesting Monday evening concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1931

Bach Festival By the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A Bach Festival, to be given through the last week of March, will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29. The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening, March 25, is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B-minor which will open the festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee club and Radcliffe Choral society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, and 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos, Nos. 2 and 5, and Suites Nos. 1 and 3. The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin nad Julius Theodorowicz. Alexandef Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D-minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Chlavichord." Mme. Patroni-Casadesus of the "Societ des Instruments Anciens," will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory and formerly organist with this orchestra.

Other events of the 50th anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven Festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of 50 years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
FEB 20 1931

Koussevitzky Plans Orchestra Festival

Boston Symphony to Play Special Programs in March Concerts

A Bach Festival to be given through the last week of March will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the Orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through thirty-seven years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B minor which will open the Festival on Tuesday (March 24), and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the Orchestra for both works. Four Cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The Concerto for Two Violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered Chlavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory, and formerly organist with this orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FEB 20 1931

BACH FESTIVAL IN BOSTON MARCH 24-29

As a special feature of its fiftieth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Bach festival under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, through the following Sunday, March 29. The program for March 25 will be dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder, Major Henry L. Higginson. Bliss Perry will deliver a memorial address.

Participants with the Boston Symphony in this festival include the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Bach Cantata, of Boston; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Regina Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichordist, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

Bach's B minor Mass is scheduled both for March 24 and 28. On March 25, besides Professor Perry's address, the program includes organ and harpsichord numbers. On March 26 the second Brandenburg concerto, first orchestral suite, D minor piano concerto and the Magnificat will be heard; on the afternoon of March 27 the third orchestral suite, concerto for two violins and cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O Ewigkeit." On Saturday evening, March 28, the cantatas "Christus lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein feste Burg," fifth Brandenburg concerto and piano numbers will be performed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1931

Bach Festival By the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A Bach Festival, to be given through the last week of March, will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29. The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening, March 25, is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B-minor which will open the festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee club and Radcliffe Choral society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, and 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos, Nos. 2 and 5, and Suites Nos. 1 and 3. The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin nad Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D-minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Chlavichord." Mme. Patroni-Casadesus of the "Societ des Instruments Anciens," will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory and formerly organist with this orchestra.

Other events of the 50th anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven Festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of 50 years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FEB 20 1931

BACH FESTIVAL IN BOSTON MARCH 24-29

As a special feature of its fiftieth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Bach festival under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

sky, pianist; Regina Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichordist, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

Bach's B minor Mass is scheduled both for March 24 and 28. On March 25, besides Professor Perry's address, the program includes organ and harpsichord numbers. On March 26 the second Brandenburg concerto, first orchestral suite, D minor piano concerto and the Magnificat will be heard; on the afternoon of March 27 the third orchestral suite, concerto for two violins and cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O Ewigkeit." On Saturday evening, March 28, the cantatas "Christus lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein feste Burg," fifth Brandenburg concerto and piano numbers will be performed.

and Sunday, March 29. It will be given in two parts, commencing at 4.30 o'clock, lasting until 6.30, and recommencing at 8.30 o'clock.

On Wednesday, March 25, the featured work will be the Prelude and Fugue and Fantasia for Harpischord, Mme. Patorni-Casadesus being the soloist. Thursday, the 26th, the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 2" with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, will be heard in addition to the "Piano Concerto in D Minor," played by Alexander Borovsky, the "Magnificat" for chorus and orchestra and "Suite for Orchestra No. 1 in C Major." Two cantatas will be sung on Friday the 27th. "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit," and in addition one will hear the "Suite for Orchestra, No. 3 in D" and the "Concerto for Two Violins." Saturday night the cantatas "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein fest Burg" will be sung and also on the program will be the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 5" with solo piano, violin and flute. "Preludes and Fugues" for solo piano will be played. The festival closes Sunday the 29th with a repetition of the Mass.

One usually has to go to Bethlehem, Pa., for a Bach Festival but these fine programs, so near by, will give the opportunity for many music lovers in this vicinity to hear them. Last year the orchestra sponsored a Brahms Festival which was a great success and attracted listeners from many points.

Continued from Page 14

Musical Notes

BACH FESTIVAL IN BOSTON MARCH 24-29

As a special feature of its fiftieth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Bach festival under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, through the following Sunday, March 29. The program for March 25 will be dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder, Major Henry L. Higginson. Bliss Perry will deliver a memorial address.

Participants with the Boston Symphony in this festival include the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Bach Cantata, of Boston; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Regina Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichordist, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

Bach's B minor Mass is scheduled both for March 24 and 28. On March 25, besides Professor Perry's address, the program includes organ and harpsichord numbers. On March 26 the second Brandenburg concerto, first orchestral suite, D minor piano concerto and the Magnificat will be heard; on the afternoon of March 27 the third orchestral suite, concerto for two violins and cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O Ewigkeit." On Saturday evening, March 28, the cantatas "Christus lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein feste Burg," fifth Brandenburg concerto and piano numbers will be performed.

ALLEGES HER "MARK" FORGED ON MORTGAG

Mrs Carrie Jessie Files Bill in Equity

Mrs Carrie Jessie of Arlington, who does not write but signs with a cross as her legal mark or signature, yesterday filed a bill in equity in Middlesex Superior Court alleging that her "signature" was forged to mortgage documents filed in the Middlesex Regis-

[illegible] won and richly deserved some of the heartiest applause that has greeted a new orchestral work in Symphony Hall in recent years. He has a lively rhythmic sense, a gift of melody, and the courage, too rare in this day of musical complexities and attempted austerities, to write simple, spontaneous music.

Polyphony and what the text book dub "development" do not apparently interest him. He has plenty o harmonic audacity, and the goo taste to avoid banalities. His sym phony is brief, condensing into single movement the essential featur of the conventional four movement

Like all his generation he has o viously learned from Stravinsky ho

[illegible] Symphony, opus 10,

A "Bach" case of music and pictures of special interest in connection with the coming Bach festival is also on view.

[illegible] has become [illegible] Americana-conscious. The acquisitive which in childhood were contracted upon postage stamps, birds' eggs or chewing tobacco tags are being directed now toward such bulky objects as clear store Indians, horse-hair sofas, cast-iron hitching posts and complete files of "The Old Sleuth Weekly." Indeed, collecting is so widespread and diversified that it is necessary to specialize if you expect to get anywhere.

A person can always achieve a certain eminence if he accumulates enough of any one thing, whether it be money or the heads of enemy tribesmen. I know a man who had the largest collection of New England meat skewers in the world. You would never suspect it to look at him; he is as modest and unassuming as the fellow who brings you your Ein. Yet they tell me that his name is a by-word in skewer circles everywhere.

The fact that an article is quite ordinary does not make it less desirable as a hobby. Fashionable colors are alarming from the exotic to the commonplace. They realize that there are a thousand prayer rug fanciers for every circus handbill collector as they achieve distinction by tracking down all the old circus handbills in the country and leaving them to [illegible]

TUESDAY, MARCH 17, 1931

MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening series took place last night in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore" No. 3. Berezowsky, Symphony No. 1, Op. 10 (played without pause; first performance; conducted by the composer). Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto (Leon Zighera, violinist). Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish themes.

There was a time in the history of this orchestra when any one of Weber's three greatest overtures was considered by conductors as a safe "filler" in any program. In recent years "Leonore" No. 3 has taken their place. A famous overture, to be sure, more dramatic than the opera "Fidelio," but like other works of Beethoven's it has been performed too often. There has been undue and injurious familiarity with it; so that audiences have come to take it for granted, and, no matter how brilliant the performance, are no longer thrilled by the trumpet's announcement off-stage, nor by the tumultuous rejoicing at the discomfiture of the wicked master of the prison. If this overture were to be performed only once in several years, its grandeur would be more fully realized. Yet when a performance is so eloquent as that of last night, one is tempted to wish a repetition at no distant day.

Nicolai Berezowsky, born at Leningrad in 1900, studied there and in Vienna. He came to New York in 1922 and joined, as a violinist, the Philharmonic Orchestra of that city. His "Hebrew" suite was played at a concert of that orchestra in 1928. He continued his studies in New York and gave a violin recital there. He has composed orchestral and chamber music—including a work that has been performed in European cities as well as in this country. In January of this year he was a "guest" conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

The symphony, written, we hear, four years ago, is full of vitality, at times in a yeasty manner. It shows the exuberance of youth, which, after all, is preferable to the scheming callousness of a more mature composer, arranging in cold blood his patterns and an "original" harmonic scheme, in which all that is unfamiliar is carefully sought out. Mr. Berezowsky's thematic material is pleasing; melodious without being lush. The chief theme is created in an interesting manner in its varied reappearances. The motive for violas has character; the scherzo is sufficiently piquant; the finale bringing in the chief theme with insistence in tumultuously exciting. The orchestration suits no doubt the prevailing hurrah-boys spirit of the symphony. One would gladly hear passages of delicacy; recognize a more discreet use of the orchestra. A more frequent dynamic contrasts; a keener search after beauty of emotional expression. But one should not expect too much, even from a young man of an indisputable musical nature, who has a flaming temperament as was shown even in his conducting. His symphony means much to him, and if at times he "over-conducted," not sparing even the score which in his enthusiasm he knocked from the desk; if certain pages of the work seemed unnecessarily flamboyant, yet the very large audience felt that Mr. Berezowsky had something to say that was worth while, and often said it effectively; it felt this and was so pleased with his fiery spirit that it recalled him several times and in no perfunctory manner.

Mr. Zighera played in Boston for the first time. He is a brother of the harp-player and a leading violoncellist of the orchestra. He has won recognition in Paris, London and other European cities. His tone is not large, nor particularly rich—one should not call it "sensuous" for the priggish Mendelssohn would haev shuddered if any violinist had thus disturbed his gentle and always agreeable concerts. Mr. Zighera showed facility and taste though in the opening movement he was inclined to be feverish; and Mendelssohn was placid in rapidity. Mr. Zighera's tone was at times acid, especially in forte passages. The audience liked him; applauded him warmly, and appreciated Dr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment. The concert ended brilliantly with the Caprice. The sixth and last concert will be on April 27th.

A "Bach" case of music and pictures of special interest in connection with the coming Bach festival is also on view.

TWO EVENTS AT MONDAY SYMPHONY

Berezowsky Conducts Own Work; Zighera Makes Debut

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In contradistinction to the general run of its fellows, the Symphony Concert of last evening, the last but one of the current Monday series, was marked by the performance of music altogether new to Boston. The piece in question was a Symphony, its composer's first, by Nicolai Berezowsky, a Russian in his 31st year, now living in New York, and Mr. Berezowsky himself conducted it in what the programme announced as its first performance.

SLOW DIVISION BEAUTIFUL

After the fashion of many another modern symphony, that of Mr. Berezowsky runs in a single movement, in which the several divisions of the traditional form are suggested. At the outset, and indeed through most of its length, this new symphony made a more than usually favorable impression. It was to be felt that Mr. Berezowsky wrote with a certain distinction of utterance, that he handled the orchestra well and that, unlike some other modern composers, he was not unmindful of its capacity for tonal effects of beauty. Throughout its length the Symphony displayed an unmistakable Russian influence. This was especially to be remarked in the elegiac slow division and in the exceedingly exuberant final section, in which the composer might be said to have "cut loose"—here there was suggestion of the manner if not of the matter of the dance of the infernal subjects of Katschei in the "Fire-Bird" music of Stravinsky.

Undeniably exciting to hear, this part of the Symphony nevertheless, evinces a certain falling off from the level maintained up to that point; the music here makes its effect chiefly by boisterousness and rhythmic insistence and it seems not unlikely that at some future time the composer will feel inclined to revise and if possible to dignify this portion of the work.

Leon Zighera, Violinist

Nor was this premiere the only event of the evening. Following the Symphony, Leon Zighera, violinist, newly arrived from France, made his American debut with the orchestra in which one of his brothers is first harp and another shares with Mr. Bedetti the first desk of the violoncellos. Mr. Zighera was heard as soloist in the Concerto of Mendelssohn, revealing a fluent technique, an unusually apt bow arm, admirable intonation, a generally agreeable tone and a manner of playing characterized by an exceeding verve that could yet summon for the slow movement of the Concerto the appropriate sentiment and refinement.

Brilliant performances of Beethoven's Third "Leonora" Overture, and of Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish Caprice, respectively, began and ended a more than usually interesting Monday evening concert.

ALLEGES HER "MARK" FORGED ON MORTGAGE

Mrs Carrie Jessie Files Bill in Equity

Mrs Carrie Jessie of Arlington, who does not write but signs with a cross as her legal mark or signature, yesterday filed a bill in equity in Middlesex Superior Court alleging that her "signature" was forged to mortgage documents filed in the Middlesex Regis-

...symphony, opus 10, won and richly deserved some of the heartiest applause that has greeted a new orchestral work in Symphony Hall in recent years. He has a lively rhythmic sense, a gift of melody, and the courage, too rare in this day of musical complexities and attempted austerities, to write simple, spontaneous music.

Polyphony and what the text book dub "development" do not apparently interest him. He has plenty of harmonic audacity, and the good taste to avoid banalities. His symphony is brief, condensing into a single movement the essential features of the conventional four movements.

Like all his generation he has obviously learned from Stravinsky how

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1931

Bach Festival By the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A Bach Festival, to be given through the last week of March, will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29. The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening, March 25, is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B-minor which will open the festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee club and Radcliffe Choral society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, and 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos, Nos. 2 and 5, and Suites Nos. 1 and 3. The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin nad Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D-minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Chlavichord." Mme. Patroni-Casadesus of the "Societ des Instruments Anciens," will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory and formerly organist with this orchestra.

Other events of the 50th anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven Festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of 50 years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

THE LEWISTON

News

ocial Events

P. DONALD C. PARTRIDGE

ENTERTAINED IN WASH'N

Rep. Elect Donald C. Partridge of Maine, who will succeed Senator-elect Wallace H. White of Maine in the House on March 4, was the guest of honor at a dinner given Wednesday night by Mr. and Mrs. White at their home on Tracey place. The guests were the members of the Maine delegation in the House; Beedy, Nelson and Snow, with their wives. Mrs. Partridge did not accompany Mr. Partridge to Washington.

* * *

ENGAGEMENT

Saturday ... postponed to

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

FEB 20 1931

Koussevitzky Plans Orchestra Festival

Boston Symphony to Play Special Programs in March Concerts

A Bach Festival to be given through the last week of March will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the Orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through thirty-seven years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B minor which will open the festival on Tuesday (March 24), and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the Orchestra for both works. Four Cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The Concerto for Two Violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered Chlavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory, and formerly organist with this orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FEB 20 1931

BACH FESTIVAL IN BOSTON MARCH 24-29

As a special feature of its fiftieth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Bach festival under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, through the following Sunday, March 29. The program for March 25 will be dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder, Major Henry L. Higginson. Bliss Perry will deliver a memorial address.

Participants with the Boston Symphony in this festival include the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Bach Cantata, of Boston; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Regina Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichordist, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

Bach's B minor Mass is scheduled both for March 24 and 28. On March 25, besides Professor Perry's address, the program includes organ and harpsichord numbers. On March 26 the second Brandenburg concerto, first orchestral suite, D minor piano concerto and the Magnificat will be heard; on the afternoon of March 27 the third orchestral suite, concerto for two violins and cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O Ewigkeit." On Saturday evening, March 28, the cantatas "Christus lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein feste Burg," fifth Brandenburg concerto and piano numbers will be performed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD

FEB 20 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Bach Festival the last week in March as the culminating feature of its half-century season, the performances to take place in Symphony Hall, Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

and Sunday, March 29. It will be given in two parts, commencing at 4.30 o'clock, lasting until 6.30, and recommencing at 8.30 o'clock.

On Wednesday, March 25, the featured work will be the Prelude and Fugue and Fantasia for Harpischord, Mme. Patorni-Casadesus being the soloist. Thursday, the 26th, the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 2" with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, will be heard in addition to the "Piano Concerto in D Minor," played by Alexander Borovsky, the "Magnificat" for chorus and orchestra and "Suite for Orchestra No. 1 in C Major." Two cantatas will be sung on Friday the 27th. "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit," and in addition one will hear the "Suite for Orchestra, No. 3 in D" and the "Concerto for Two Violins." Saturday night the cantatas "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein fest Burg" will be sung and also on the program will be the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 5" with solo piano, violin and flute. "Preludes and Fugues" for solo piano will be played. The festival closes Sunday the 29th with a repetition of the Mass.

One usually has to go to Bethlehem, Pa., for a Bach Festival but these fine programs, so near by, will give the opportunity for many music lovers in this vicinity to hear them. Last year the orchestra sponsored a Brahms Festival which was a great success and attracted listeners from many points.

Continued from Page 141

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1931

Bach Festival By the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A Bach Festival, to be given through the last week of March, will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29. The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening, March 25, is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B-minor which will open the festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee club and Radcliffe Choral society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, and 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos, Nos. 2 and 5, and Suites Nos. 1 and 3. The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin nad Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D-minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Chlavichord." Mme. Patroni-Casadesus of the "Societ des Instruments Anciens," will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory and formerly organist with this orchestra.

Other events of the 50th anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven Festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of 50 years ago.

TUESDAY, MARCH 17, 1931

MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening series took place last night in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore" No. 3. Berezowsky, Symphony No. 1, Op. 10 (played without pause; first performance; conducted by the composer). Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto (Leon Zighera, violinist). Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish themes.

There was a time in the history of this orchestra when any one of Weber's three greatest overtures was considered by conductors as a safe "filler" in any program. In recent years "Leonore" No. 3 has taken their place. A famous overture, to be sure, more dramatic than the opera "Fidelio," but like other works of Beethoven's it has been performed too often. There has been undue and injurious familiarity with it; so that audiences have come to take it for granted, and, no matter how brilliant the performance, are no longer thrilled by the trumpet's announcement off-stage, nor by the tumultuous rejoicing at the discomfiture of the wicked master of the prison. If this overture were to be performed only once in several years, its grandeur would be more fully realized. Yet when a performance is so eloquent as that of last night, one is tempted to wish a repetition at no distant day.

Nicolai Berezowsky, born at Leningrad in 1900, studied there and in Vienna. He came to New York in 1922 and joined, as a violinist, the Philharmonic Orchestra of that city. His "Hebrew" suite was played at a concert of that orchestra in 1928. He continued his studies in New York and gave a violin recital there. He has composed orchestral and chamber music—including a work that has been performed in European cities as well as in this country. In January of this year he was a "guest" conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

The symphony, written, we hear, four years ago, is full of vitality, at times in a yeasty manner. It shows the exuberance of youth, which, after all, is preferable to the scheming callousness of a more mature composer, arranging in cold blood his patterns and an "original" harmonic scheme, in which all that is unfamiliar is carefully sought out. Mr. Berezowsky's thematic material is pleasing; melodious without being lush. The chief theme is created in an interesting manner in its varied reappearances. The motive for violas has character; the scherzo is sufficiently piquant; the finale bringing in the chief theme with insistence in tumultuously exciting. The orchestration suits no doubt the prevailing hurrah-boys spirit of the symphony. One would gladly hear passages of delicacy; recognize a more discreet use of the orchestra. A more frequent dynamic contrasts; a keener search after beauty of emotional expression. But one should not expect too much, even from a young man of an indisputable musical nature, who has a flaming temperament as was shown even in his conducting. His symphony means much to him, and if at times he "over-conducted," not sparing even the score which in his enthusiasm he knocked from the desk; if certain pages of the work seemed unnecessarily flamboyant, yet the very large audience felt that Mr. Berezowsky had something to say that was worth while, and often said it effectively; it felt this and was so pleased with his fiery spirit that it recalled him several times and in no perfunctory manner.

Mr. Zighera played in Boston for the first time. He is a brother of the harp-player and a leading violoncellist of the orchestra. He has won recognition in Paris, London and other European cities. His tone is not large, nor particularly rich—one should not ex "sensuous" for the priggish Mendelssohn would haev shuddered if any violinist had thus disturbed his gentle and always agreeable concerts. Mr. Zighera showed facility and taste though in the opening movement he was inclined to be feverish; and Mendelssohn was placid in rapidity. Mr. Zighera's tone was at times acid, especially in forte passages. The audience like him; applauded him warmly, and appreciated Dr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment. The concert ended brilliantly with the Caprice. The sixth and last concert will be on April 27th.

TWO EVENTS AT MONDAY SYMPHONY

Berezowsky Conducts Own Work; Zighera Makes Debut

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In contradistinction to the general run of its fellows, the Symphony Concert of last evening, the last but one of the current Monday series, was marked by the performance of music altogether new to Boston. The piece in question was a Symphony, its composer's first, by Nicolai Berezowsky, a Russian in his 31st year, now living in New York, and Mr. Berezowsky himself conducted it in what the programme announced as its first performance.

SLOW DIVISION BEAUTIFUL

After the fashion of many another modern symphony, that of Mr. Berezowsky runs in a single movement, in which the several divisions of the traditional form are suggested. At the outset, and indeed through most of its length, this new symphony made a more than usually favorable impression. It was to be felt that Mr. Berezowsky wrote with a certain distinction of utterance, that he handled the orchestra well and that, unlike some other modern composers, he was not unmindful of its capacity for tonal effects of beauty. Throughout its length the Symphony displayed an unmistakable Russian influence. This was especially to be remarked in the elegiac slow division and in the exceedingly exuberant final section, in which the composer might be said to have "cut loose"—here there was suggestion of the manner if not of the matter of the dance of the infernal subjects of Katschei in the "Fire-Bird" music of Stravinsky.

Undeniably exciting to hear, this part of the Symphony nevertheless, evinces a certain falling off from the level maintained up to that point; the music here makes its effect chiefly by boisterousness and rhythmic insistence and it seems not unlikely that at some future time the composer will feel inclined to revise and if possible to dignify this portion of the work.

Leon Zighera, Violinist

Nor was this premiere the only event of the evening. Following the Symphony, Leon Zighera, violinist, newly arrived from France, made his American debut with the orchestra in which one of his brothers is first harp and another shares with Mr. Bedetti the first desk of the violoncellos. Mr. Zighera was heard as soloist in the Concerto of Mendelssohn, revealing a fluent technique, an unusually apt bow arm, admirable intonation, a generally agreeable tone and a manner of playing characterized by an exceeding verve that could yet summon for the slow movement of the Concerto the appropriate sentiment and refinement.

Brilliant performances of Beethoven's Third "Leonora" Overture, and of Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish Caprice, respectively, began and ended a more than usually interesting Monday evening concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1931

Bach Festival By the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A Bach Festival, to be given through the last week of March, will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29. The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening, March 25, is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B-minor which will open the festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee club and Radcliffe Choral society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, and 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos, Nos. 2 and 5, and Suites Nos. 1 and 3. The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin nad Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D-minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Chlavichord." Mme. Patroni-Casadesus of the "Societ des Instruments Anciens," will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory and formerly organist with this orchestra.

Other events of the 50th anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven Festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of 50 years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
FEB 20 1931

Koussevitzky Plans Orchestra Festival

Boston Symphony to Play Special Programs in March Concerts

A Bach Festival to be given through the last week of March will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the Orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through thirty-seven years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B minor which will open the festival on Tuesday (March 24), and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the Orchestra for both works. Four Cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The Concerto for Two Violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered Chlavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory, and formerly organist with this orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1931

Bach Festival By the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A Bach Festival, to be given through the last week of March, will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29. The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening, March 25, is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B-minor which will open the festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee club and Radcliffe Choral society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, and 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos, Nos. 2 and 5, and Suites Nos. 1 and 3. The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin nad Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D-minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Chlavichord." Mme. Patroni-Casadesus of the "Societ des Instruments Anciens," will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory and formerly organist with this orchestra.

Other events of the 50th anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven Festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of 50 years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
FEB 20 1931

News of Social Events

P. DONALD C. PARTRIDGE

ENTERTAINED IN WASH'N

Rep. Elect Donald C. Partridge of Maine, who will succeed Senator-elect Wallace H. White of Maine in the House on March 4, was the guest of honor at a dinner given Wednesday night by Mr. and Mrs. White at their home on Tracey place. The guests were the members of the Maine delegation in the House; Beedy, Nelson and Snow, with their wives. Mrs. Partridge did not accompany Mr. Partridge to Washington.

* * *

ENGAGEMENT

Saturday evening [illegible] postponed to

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
FEB 20 1931

ENGAGEMENT

The engagement of Miss Dorothy Pearl Bumpus to Richard Kenneth Merriam of Sabattus, formerly of Pittsfield, Mass., has just been announced by her parents, County Treasurer and Mrs. Harry E. Bumpus of Vining street, Auburn. Miss Bumpus was graduated from Bates College in 1928 and has been employed as head proof-reader of modern foreign languages at the Northeastern Press in Augusta. Mr. Merriam, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Merriam, is now with the Park Mill Corporation, of which his father is tho superintendent.

The wedding will take place sometime in the fall.

* * *

BETH JACOB WHIST POSTPONED ONE WEEK

Beth Jacob bridge and whist to have been held Saturday evening

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD
FEB 23 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Bach Festival the last week in March as the culminating feature of its half-century season, the performances to take place in Symphony Hall, Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
FEB 21 1931

Bach Festival in Boston.

A Bach festival of orchestral, choral and chamber music works will be given in Boston March 24-29 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Bach Cantata Club.

One of the features of the festival will be the two performances of the "Mass in B Minor," which will be given for the first time in Boston in its entirety. The soloists will be Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone, surely a splendid quartet. The Mass will be given on Tuesday, March 24, and Sunday, March 29. It will be given in two parts, commencing at 4.30 o'clock, lasting until 6.30, and recommencing at 8.30 o'clock.

On Wednesday, March 25, the featured work will be the Prelude and Fugue and Fantasia for Harpischord, Mme. Patorni-Casadesus being the soloist. Thursday, the 26th, the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 2" with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, will be heard in addition to the "Piano Concerto in D Minor," played by Alexander Borovsky, the "Magnificat" for chorus and orchestra and "Suite for Orchestra No. 1 in C Major." Two cantatas will be sung on Friday the 27th. "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit," and in addition one will hear the "Suite for Orchestra, No. 3 in D" and the "Concerto for Two Violins." Saturday night the cantatas "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein fest Burg" will be sung and also on the program will be the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 5" with solo piano, violin and flute. "Preludes and Fugues" for solo piano will be played. The festival closes Sunday the 29th with a repetition of the Mass.

One usually has to go to Bethlehem, Pa., for a Bach Festival but these fine programs, so near by, will give the opportunity for many music lovers in this vicinity to hear them. Last year the orchestra sponsored a Brahms Festival which was a great success and attracted listeners from many points.

Continued from Page 14

ALLEGES HER "MARK" FORGED ON MORTGAG

Mrs Carrie Jessie Files Bill in Equity

Mrs Carrie Jessie of Arlington, who does not write but signs with a cross as her legal mark or signature, yesterday filed a bill in equity in Middlesex Superior Court alleging that her "signature" was forged to mortgage documents filed in the Middlesex Regis-

A "Bach" case of music and pices of special interest in connecon with the coming Bach festival also on view.

HOROWITZ HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

GLOBE—MAR 20

Russian Pianist Applauded in Tchaikovsky Concerto

Vladimir Horowitz, the Russian pianist, whose previous appearances in Boston have been sensationally successful, was applauded with unusual vehemence at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert for his remarkably brilliant performance in Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor concerto. The audience stamped and cheered, recalling him a number of times.

The rest of Dr Koussevitzky's program included the overture and scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, a repetition of Honegger's new symphony, written for the Boston Symphony's anniversary, and first performed last month; and the dance of Salome, from Richard Strauss' opera.

Tchaikovsky's concerto is preeminently a show piece. It affords a virtuoso pianist and a first-rate orchestra a legitimate opportunity for the display of technique. Yet the music is neither dry nor dull in itself. Its melody may be banal, its rhythms may lack subtlety and refinement, but behind this music there is a composer whose emotions, if undisciplined, were far from rapid. Dr Koussevitzky excels in just such pieces as this. So does Mr Horowitz. Between them they gave an astonishing, even a magnificent interpretation, conveying the full frenzy of passion and conquering with apparent ease every difficulty. If such "stunts" as this are to be performed, they should always be done as superlatively as this one was yesterday.

Rhythmic Vitality

Honegger's symphony at a second hearing again impressed one by its rhythmic vitality and the audacities of its melody and harmony. This music is at times almost impudently unconventional. The composer still, perhaps, takes a boyish delight in startling the conservatives. But he has written with gusto, and with unflagging imaginative power. The finale is the weakest of the three movements. The adagio would gain by compression, though its rather short-breathed melodies are genuinely moving.

This symphony seems to be a masterpiece, though doubtless that word is too lightly used by reviewers these days. One imagines it has a chance of remaining in the standard orchestral repertory. The performance was clear and seemingly faithful to both the letter and the spirit of the score. Dr Koussevitzky has obviously, as is his wont with new music, spared no labor on preparing and rehearsing Honegger's music.

Of the two repertory pieces played, the dance from Strauss' "Salome" was the more brilliantly interpreted. What strikes one about this fragment torn from its operatic context is the astonishing brilliance of the scoring for orchestra, the complexities and sonorities of the music. One cannot hear in it the morbid passion of the daughter of Herodias. Like the play by Oscar Wilde, on which it is based, this "Salome" now seems the height of artifice rather than genuine art.

Beautiful Overture

Mendelssohn's beautiful overture, one of the works which prove him to be a great composer despite his detractors, was given a rather heavy handed and not perfectly accurate performance. From the opening chords of the wood wind, which the orchestra failed to attack cleanly, through a good deal of the piece the players were now and again not quite together. No doubt rehearsal time had been absorbed by the other numbers, and by the Bach festival in prospect.

The scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," played far more deftly and neatly than the overture, was very heartily applauded. Dr Koussevitzky bade the orchestra rise and bow at the end.

Next week's subscription concerts in the Friday and Saturday series are part of the Bach festival, though the general public cannot procure tickets. Hence the programs are devoted exclusively to the works of Bach, and the Saturday concert has a different set of pieces from those to be heard Friday. P. R..

PAGE 166 for HERALD Comment on Horovitz

Modernisms, Mendelssohn And Horovitz

TRANS.—MAR. 20

Chaikovsky's Piano-Concerto In the Grand Manner Evening of Styles

SUBSCRIBERS to the Symphony Concerts are a docile, understanding folk. Being told that the evening concert of this week would be shifted from Saturday to Thursday—to gain three clear days for preparation of the Bach Festival—they came to Symphony Hall, yesterday, in the usual numbers, if not in the usual sartorial splendor. In return for this good will they received a concert that pleased them much; that in one item quite transported them. It began with the Overture from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's fantasia, "A Midsummer Night's Dream." After a lengthy pause for the seating of the tardy, Dr. Koussevitzky went on to the Scherzo, which fills the first entr'acte in the comedy. His reason for the addition of this pendant was not too clear. It seemed, in fact, rather an anti-climax. Both pieces, however, won hearty applause—the more for the performance. Next followed a repetition of Honegger's Symphony, contributed to the jubilee year of the orchestra, first heard at a pair of concerts last month. If a considerable part of the audience no more than "bore with it," as many listened eagerly and clapped warmly. Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky is of the same mind as was Theodore Thomas when he was introducing Wagner to American ears. "They do not like him?" he said tersely. "They shall hear him until they do." The dance of Salome from Strauss's like-named opera ended the concert. It is frequent and dependable item in the current repertory; was received accordingly.

Immediately before climax had come in the performance of Chaikovsky's Piano-Concerto in B-flat minor, with Mr. Horovitz as pianist. Through five seasons it has not been heard at Symphony Hall. Mr. Horovitz, in particular, exdébut in the United States at New York. At each pause the audience out-New York. At each pause the audience outpoured plaudits. At the end shouts and stamping swelled them. The pianist lingered long over the conductor's hand; saluted the clapping orchestra; returned again and again. Nor did Dr. Koussevitzky go unrewarded—and the orchestra with him—when he resumed his place to begin Salome's dance. For the merit had been triply divided. Throughout conductor, pianist and orchestra had taken the Concerto in the grand manner; played above themselves. Someone said in the departing crowd that it was the last of such concertos to be written and to keep place in the repertory. Remembering the half-century upon its head, two that overheard tried to recall another and failed.

Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Horovitz took the Introduction broadly, intensively, sonorously. The pianist spaced out the sweeping melody; gave it ample contours, incisive rhythm, imperious march. The driving chords rang. The stride and the vigors of the orchestra matched the energies of the pianist. Together they gained a truly Chaikovskian suspense at the transition into the Allegro. Once embarked upon it, pianist and conductor passioned themselves for the composer's tumultuous rhetoric; sang the second melody not only "con spirito" but "con sentimento." Mr. Horovitz added fervor to feat in the manifold cadenza; with Dr. Koussevitzky drove the final measures fast and high to be climax to the upswelling whole. Twenty minutes of rhetorical magnificence. . . . Both were as eloquent as might be with the wistful tune of the slow movement; but quite ready to turn to the badinage and decoration of the pseudo-Scherzo. . . .

This accomplished with a light hand, they were free to wreak themselves upon the Finale, first in the repetitions and variations of the snapping folk-tune; then in the crescendo upon crescendo that epitomize the concerto, and drive it to the end boiling in a whirlpool of rhythmed sound. Ten, possibly fifteen, minutes more of rhetorical magnificence. It is the only way with Chaikovsky. Play him passionately, intensively, reverberantly and this Piano-Concerto—tumult of melody and rhetoric that it is, more duel than symphony between piano and orchestra—exceeds its literal self. Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Horovitz are pertervid believers. The grand style may still work its wonders.

It was, indeed, an evening for style. Set aside for the moment the unstaled freshness and fancy of Mendelssohn's invention and suggestion in the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and how perfectly every measure is written! To this day the chords for wind choir at the beginning and the end keep their loveliness. The text books on orchestration still cite them. The modern makers of light-footed, light-pointed Scherzi have not outdone this "fairy-music" of the eighteen-twenties. The main body of the Overture gains shape, volume and momentum; while we listeners forget the composer's skill in the interest of the progress. A turn of his finger and the charm of the sound takes us captive. Whether he had much or little to say, Mendelssohn had a most sensitive flair for wind instruments. (The flute-part in the Scherzo is crowning proof.) He laid as deft and fine a hand upon the strings. The brass was his discreet reserve.

Whatever the thought, the mood, the fleeting fancy, the passing humor, Mendelssohn gives it, through all this "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the one and only tonal vesture. At such perfect expression time gnaws in vain. The musical fashions pass by and leave not a dent behind. In Overture and Scherzo, moreover, Mendelssohn had something to express. Likely enough, the more clownish Shakspearean humors evade him. It was not in him to imagine these "mechanicals" at their fooleries. But when the wood of the fairies and the lovers is the field, he outbids Shakspeare on his own ground. Oberon and Titania—and how well or ill the players look such personages. "I know a bank whereon the wild thyme grows" . . . the actor's diction may be faulty or pleasurable. For speech and speakers, for fairy princes and fairy troop Mendelssohn had the magic of musical sound and to this day it prevails.

And, by good fortune last evening, an orchestra and a conductor to renew that spell, save only when they overswelled the full-throated measures; so distorted proportion. An hour later, they were busy with Salome's Dance according to Strauss, with his six horns, five clarinets, four kettledrums, what not out of the orchestral store-closet. The dance sways languorously; swirls fiercely; sounds with the lust of the flesh, the dreams of desire, the weariness of impotent longing. The orchestral imagination, the orchestral manipulation, are masterly. The whole dance is superlative "theater." The final flourish scunds equally for the triumphant Strauss and the triumphant Salome. Around the year 2010 their dance will be as old as is now the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Will orchestras still be playing it and audiences making response? Will it still keep musical pungency and theatric force as Mendelssohn's overture now preserves freshness, fancy and formal perfection? Perhaps the newcomers to Paradise will remember.

There is no arguing in these days about Honegger's Symphony. Aching ears and racked spirits do not listen to reason. For such hearers his modernisms leave only blind resentment behind; worse still as blind a disbelief in those who profess, honestly enough, to be stirred and won. Invite the dissenters to the rich, Rabelaisian mood, the gamesome vigors, of the Finale and they will retort that it is a vulgar music. Bid them to the gentle close in which Honegger turns away and sighs his music into silence, and they answer that it is catch-penny affectation. Remind them that the slow movement may be acrid to the ear, yet still excite and deepen emotion; that there is a new melody as well as an old—and they recoil with disgust. Tell them that the restless rhythms of the beginning are spur to the listening imagination; that the dissonances are savory and stimulating; that the whole movement drives forward and upward as though it would transmute into symphonic sound the brute-force of a mechanistic age. Forthwith they descant on the inherent spirituality of music.

Little use to answer that Honegger was of another mood and purpose; that by his design his accomplishment must be judged. Urge his right, like every other composer, to his own idiom—and the distressed call it "the mark of the beast." Suggest that it is no sin to write in the spirit of one's time, that such time-spirit may be unescapable—and the scornful depart to their ivory towers. Yet some of us will prefer to hear Honegger's Symphony as we look down Bromfield Street toward the modernist building that now fills and crowns the prospect. It is of our time and made in its image. As such we see and feel it. So may we also hear and feel Honegger's Symphony. Perhaps we deceive ourselves, gathering grapes from thorns and figs of thistles. But the savor is good upon our tongues—and in our ears. H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

From Symphony Hall

HERE in detail are the organ-pieces to be played by Mr. Wallace Goodrich on the second evening, Wednesday, March 25, of the Bach Festival: Fantasia in C minor; Adagio from the Toccata in C major; Fugue in C major; Chorale-Prelude, "Schmücke dich, O liebe Seele"; Fugue in G minor. The Chorale-Prelude, by the way, is one of the two scored for orchestra by Schönberg. As such, it has been played more than once at the Symphony Concerts.

As present plans stand, Dr. Koussevitzky will include Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode" in the Symphony Concerts of April 3 and 4. It is the last but one of the pieces commissioned for the jubilee year of the orchestra. The other, from Hindemith, will be played later in the month.

The final pair of concerts for young people is announced for the afternoons of Monday and Tuesday, April 6 and 7. Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin will conduct. Mr. Meyer, with stereopticon slides, will speak. Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice"; the Overture and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," are on the program.

On Duty

Horovitz

Pianist, Yesterday and Today, at the Symphony Concerts

Off Guard

Honegger

Composer, Yesterday and Today, at the Symphony Concerts

HOROWITZ TELLS PLAYING SECRET

Pianist Should Center on Interpretation, Declares Noted Young Russian

Adv. Mar. 29

Vladimir Horowitz, young Russian pianist, who first came from abroad in 1928 to win quick acclaim from music enthusiasts here gained marked notice for his swift technique.

Vladimir Horowitz

Horowitz is praised particularly for the speed with which his large hands travel double-octave scales. Asked to explain the secret of his technique, the young Russian said:

"The first concern of the ambitious student should be to make the mechanics of piano playing a comparatively simple matter that he may employ his energy for the artist interpretation of the composition. This latter phase of piano playing is the most vital in mastering the art.

"To read a composition intelligently; to punctuate it and phrase it properly; to give it true eloquence; to introduce the proper nuances and dynamic shadings; to give it its intended design and form; to convey to the audience the thoughts and emotions which the composer had in mind—this is the really difficult part of piano playing.

"As important as these phrases are, however, one's performances will be far from satisfactory if purely technical problems are not under one's complete control. Take, for example, executing chord passages which contain melody or accented notes within the chord. The line of the melody must be maintained as well as produced sonorously."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 1 - 1931

Boston Symphony to Play New Henegger Work

Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening

On Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Woolsey Hall, the event climaxing one of the finest music seasons that New Haven has ever enjoyed. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's great Russian leader, will conduct the concert, and the occasion takes on particular significance as this is the fiftieth anniversary year of the organization. Many of the programs that have been given this season have been planned to commemorate the reaching of the Boston Symphony's half-century milestone, and the list of numbers New Haven will hear was selected with this thought in mind.

tra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exactnig of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony Hall, the Orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the Orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty.

In his 84th year, the Orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarge public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The complete program and order of numbers for the concert is as follows:

Handel, Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 12; Honegger, Symphony, Allegro marcato, Adagio, Presto; intermission; Wagner, Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure;" Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin;" Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34, Alborada, Variations, Alborada, Scene and Gypsy Song, Fandango of the Asturias.

time in Boston, and was pronounced both a success and the masterpiece of the French composer up to this time.

Another important rendition is the Caprice on Spanish themes by Rimsky-Korsakov, one of the most brilliant of all orchestral pieces, and that it will be tremendously acclaimed there is no doubt.

Other numbers on the program include a concerto grosso for string orchestra by Handel, and the two Wagner pieces, one the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" and the other the Prelude to "Lohengrin."

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music. In 1881, the Major Henry L. Higginson realized first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orches-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 1 - 1931

Boston Orchestra to Play Strawinsky and Honegger

Toscanini to Conduct Bruckner's Seventh Symphony—Museum Concerts

Unusually interesting concerts will be given during the week to come by both the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony orchestras.

The latter organization, visiting New York for a fourth time this season, will be heard in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, and at these concerts it is Mr. Koussewitsky's intention to perform, for the first time in this city, Strawinsky's new Symphonie de Psaumes, a setting for chorus and orchestra of verses from the 38th, 39th and 150th Psalms. Strawinsky's most recent work, the Symphonie de Psaumes was composed in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the Boston Orchestra. It was first performed, however, in Brussels.

Another composition by a modern (again composed in honor of the Boston Orchestra's jubilee), Honegger's Symphony, will also receive its local premiere under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction, at the Thursday evening concert, but will not be repeated at the Saturday matinee. The complete programs for both concerts follow:

Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall:

Handel
Concerto Grosso in B minor, Op. 6, No. 2
Strawinsky.....Symphonie de Psaumes
Honegger .....Symphony
Ravel ......"La Valse"

Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall:

Handel
Concerto Grosso in G minor, Op. 6, No. 6
Strawinsky.....Symphonie de Psaumes
Hill.....Symphony No. 2, in C major
Rimsky-Korsakow.....Spanish Caprice

The Boston orchestra will have the assistance of the Schola Cantorum chorus in the performance of the Strawinsky Symphonie de Psaumes.

* * *

Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in February of 1927.

The complete program for the Wednesday, Friday and Saturday concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society follows:

Bruckner .....Seventh Symphony
Beethoven ..... Fifth Symphony

At today's matinee concert at the Metropolitan Opera House, Mr. Toscanini will conduct performances of Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Schumann's D minor Symphony, and the Fifth (New World) Symphony of Dvorak.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 1 - 1931

Serge Koussewitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on Friday evening of this week. The first half of the program to be performed is devoted to the music of Sibelius—to the tone-poem "Finlandia," and the Seventh Symphony of the great Finnish composer. Following an intermission, Mr. Koussewitsky and his orchestra will play Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'umqn Faune," the overture and bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" and Ravel's choreographic tone-poem, "La Valse." The concert will be the fourth in the current series of five given in Brooklyn under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
MAR 1 - 1931

Dr. Koussevitzky Gives Novelties At Carnegie Hall

Boston Symphony Gives First Performance Here of Stravinsky Work

On its fourth New York visit of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will play three numbers new to New York. Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus, will be given both next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, with the assistance of the Schola Cantorum.

The Stravinsky work is one of those commissioned by the Boston Symphony from prominent composers for performance during its fiftieth season. It is in three movements, connected by orchestral interludes. The text for the first is verses 13 and 14 of the 38th Psalm; for the second, the first four verses of the 39th Psalm, and for the third, the 90th Psalm. In the King James Version, these psalms are numbered 39th, 40th and 90th. The Latin text of the Vulgate is used. The symphony was composed in 1930 "to the Glory of God" and dedicated to the Boston Symphony; but the world premiere, owing to a postponement of the first performance in Boston, was given by the Brussels Philharmonic Society on December 13. The first performances by the Boston Symphony in Boston were on December 19 and 20, with the aid of the Cecilia Society. The symphony was repeated in Boston on February 20 and 21.

On Thursday evening, Dr. Koussevitzky also will offer another commissioned work, a symphony in three movements by Arthur Honegger. This was composed between December, 1929, and May, 1930, and published last year. Its first performance was in Boston on February 13. The movements are an allegro moderato, an adagio and a presto closing with a short andante.

The other novelty set for Saturday afternoon is the second symphony, in C major, by Edward Burlingame Hill, of Cambridge, Mass., who is a professor of music at Harvard University. Professor Hill's first symphony, in B flat, was played here by the Boston Symphony on April 12, 1928, and in a Stadium concert on July 9, 1929. His second symphony was first played last Friday and Saturday in Boston.

Tel. Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
FEB 22 1931

Who Should Decide About Engaging New Symphony Players?

By REDFERN MASON.

Time was when the organist who played for a society wedding thought himself lucky if he got his fee within six months. The poor fellow did not dare to dun his wealthy patron for fear of getting in the bad graces of the elect.

That is all changed today, thanks to the Musicians' Union and, before the organist sounds the first notes of the organ, the check has to be forthcoming.

It is the same with the Symphony. Thanks to an honest attempt on the part of the governors of the Musical Association and the officials of the Union to understand the situation thoroughly orchestra men receive a minimum living wage that is fairly satisfactory.

So far excellent. But there is more work to be done, and it seems as if the only way out of the difficulty is for the Union to approach the problem artistically as well as economically.

IF TOSCANINI WERE TO COME

Everyone knows that if Toscanini were invited to direct our Symphony he would exact sweeping changes in the personnel before he accepted the position.

If he were allowed his way, San Francisco would have an orchestra second to none. But, even supposing there were money enough available to pay the men he wanted, would he be allowed his way?

Not unless there were a change of heart among the rank and file of the Union. They might concede him the privilege of importing first chair men for some of the reed and brass divisions; but even that would have to be fought out and the fight might be prolonged and acrimonious.

For it is a fixed point in Union policy that no instrumentalist shall be imported if there is a competent man on the ground. But who is to be the judge of competency? For years Alfred Hertz could not give "Heldenleben" because, in his opinion, the players of brass instruments available were not equal to the task.

There are men of taste and brains in the Union, many of them; but in the debates of the organization the man who plays the saxophone in a jazz band has an equal vote with the concert master of the Symphony.

JAZZ PLAYERS OUTNUMBER

And, whereas the Symphony men only number about four score men, musicians who play dance music outnumber them many times.

This has created a situation so difficult that, in despair, the directors of the Boston Symphony deunionized the orchestra. They pay their men more than the Union scale; but they can engage whom they will and replace whom they will; and, to make the position of the men more desirable, they take care of the worn-out veterans out of the endowment fund.

There ought to be some way in which the desire of the Union to secure a satisfactory livelihood for their men and the desire of the Symphony to have the best possible orchestra may be conciliated.

For any Union to pass on the judgment of a Toscanini, for instance, seems subversive of artistic ideals. Men of the caliber of the great Italian are valuable because their taste is better than that of the great majority of men. But of what value is that worth, if their wishes are to be frustrated by the lack of vision of men who have never played in a Symphony in their life?

ARTISTIC OUTLOOK NECESSARY

It does seem as if, in this particular, the Musicians Union ought to examine its own conscience, and only allow those of its members to vote on Symphony matters who, by capacity and experience, are competent to render a wise decision.

There is nothing antagonistic to unionism in this attitude. On the contrary, if carefully considered, it will be found to forecast a unionism which shall stand for the best interests of the musical craft.

We have obligations towards the men who play in our Symphony and, so long as they do good work, they are entitled to good pay and perpetuity of office. But no man or woman ought to be allowed to remain in the ranks of the Symphony if he or she lowers the standard of its performances.

When the Los Angeles Philharmonic visited us, music lovers were not slow to perceive that, in certain choirs, their work was better than our own. Now Los Angeles has taken away from us some of our best players. We ought to be able to engage others equally good to take their place, and bring them from other places if necessary.

THE DIRECTOR MUST DECIDE

When there is a diversity of opinion as to the merit of local performers, the proper person to make the final decision is the director. That is one of the reasons why he is employed, and the supporters of the Symphony make their donations on the understanding that, as far as possible, all concerned will facilitate the realization of his ideals.

But if his wishes are to be negatived by men who belong to a sphere of music lower than symphony, why should people be subscribers? If the dance musicians insist on deciding questions that affect the interest of the Symphony, they may kill the goose that lays the golden eggs.

It is for the Union to classify its members and only let them vote on questions which they are competent to understand.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 1 - 1931

Boston Symphony to Play New Henegger Work

Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening

On Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Woolsey Hall, the event climaxing one of the finest music seasons that New Haven has ever enjoyed. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's great Russian leader, will conduct the concert, and the occasion takes on particular significance as this is the fiftieth anniversary year of the organization. Many of the programs that have been given this season have been planned to commemorate the reaching of the Boston Symphony's half-century milestone, and the list of numbers New Haven will hear was selected with this thought in mind.

A new symphony by Honegger, written especially for the orchestra's anniversary, is one of the principal numbers played here next Wednesday. The piece was recently played for the first time in Boston, and was pronounced both a success and the masterpiece of the French composer up to this time.

Another important rendition is the Caprice on Spanish themes by Rimsky-Korsakov, one of the most brilliant of all orchestral pieces, and that it will be tremendously acclaimed there is no doubt.

Other numbers on the program include a concerto grosso for string orchestra by Handel, and the two Wagner pieces, one the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" and the other the Prelude to "Lohengrin."

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music. In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony Hall, the Orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the Orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty.

In his 84th year, the Orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarge public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The complete program and order of numbers for the concert is as follows:

Handel, Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 12; Honegger, Symphony, Allegro marcato, Adagio, Presto; intermission; Wagner, Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure;" Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin;" Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34, Alborada, Variations, Alborada, Scene and Gypsy Song, Fandango of the Asturias.

... to Play ... and Honegger

Toscanini to Conduct Bruckner's Seventh Symphony—Museum Concerts

Unusually interesting concerts will be given during the week to come by both the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony orchestras.

The latter organization, visiting New York for a fourth time this season, will be heard in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, and at these concerts it is Mr. Koussewitsky's intention to perform, for the first time in this city, Strawinsky's new Symphonie de Psaumes, a setting for chorus and orchestra of verses from the 38th, 39th and 150th Psalms. Strawinsky's most recent work, the Symphonie de Psaumes was composed in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the Boston Orchestra. It was first performed, however, in Brussels.

Another composition by a modern (again composed in honor of the Boston Orchestra's jubilee), Honegger's Symphony, will also receive its local premiere under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction, at the Thursday evening concert, but will not be repeated at the Saturday matinee. The complete programs for both concerts follow:

Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall:

Handel
Concerto Grosso in B minor, Op. 6, No. 2
Strawinsky.....Symphonie de Psaumes
Honegger.....Symphony
Ravel.....'La Valse"

Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall:

Handel
Concerto Grosso in G minor, Op. 6, No. 6
Strawinsky.....Symphonie de Psaumes
Hill.....Symphony No. 2, in C major
Rimsky-Korsakow.....Spanish Caprice

The Boston orchestra will have the assistance of the Schola Cantorum chorus in the performance of the Strawinsky Symphonie de Psaumes.

* * *

Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in February of 1927.

The complete program for the Wednesday, Friday and Saturday concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society follows:

Bruckner.....Seventh Symphony
Beethoven.....Fifth Symphony

At today's matinee concert at the Metropolitan Opera House, Mr. Toscanini will conduct performances of Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Schumann's D minor Symphony, and the Fifth (New World) Symphony of Dvorak.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 1 - 1931

Serge Koussewitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on Friday evening of this week. The first half of the program to be performed is devoted to the music of Sibelius —to the tone-poem "Finlandia," and the Seventh Symphony of the great Finnish composer. Following an intermission, Mr. Koussewitsky and his orchestra will play Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'umqn Faune," the overture and bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" and Ravel's choreographic tone-poem, "La Valse." The concert will be the fourth in the current series of five given in Brooklyn under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
MAR 1 - 1931

Dr. Koussevitzky Gives Novelties At Carnegie Hall

Boston Symphony Gives First Performance Here of Stravinsky Work

On its fourth New York visit of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will play three numbers new to New York. Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus, will be given both next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, with the assistance of the Schola Cantorum.

The Stravinsky work is one of those commissioned by the Boston Symphony from prominent composers for performance during its fiftieth season. It is in three movements, connected by orchestral interludes. The text for the first is verses 13 and 14 of the 38th Psalm; for the second, the first four verses of the 39th Psalm, and for the third, the 90th Psalm. In the King James Version, these psalms are numbered 39th, 40th and 90th. The Latin text of the Vulgate is used. The symphony was composed in 1930 "to the Glory of God" and dedicated to the Boston Symphony; but the world premiere, owing to a postponement of the first performance in Boston, was given by the Brussels Philharmonic Society on December 13. The first performances by the Boston Symphony in Boston were on December 19 and 20, with the aid of the Cecilia Society. The symphony was repeated in Boston on February 20 and 21.

On Thursday evening, Dr. Koussevitzky also will offer another commissioned work, a symphony in three movements by Arthur Honegger. This was composed between December, 1929, and May, 1930, and published last year. Its first performance was in Boston on February 13. The movements are an allegro moderato, an adagio and a presto closing with a short andante.

The other novelty set for Saturday afternoon is the second symphony, in C major, by Edward Burlingame Hill, of Cambridge, Mass., who is a professor of music at Harvard University. Professor Hill's first symphony, in B flat, was played here by the Boston Symphony on April 12, 1928, and in a Stadium concert on July 9, 1929. His second symphony was first played last Friday and Saturday in Boston.

Tel. Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
FEB 22 1931

Who Should Decide About Engaging New Symphony Players?

By REDFERN MASON.

Time was when the organist who played for a society wedding thought himself lucky if he got his fee within six months. The poor fellow did not dare to dun his wealthy patron for fear of getting in the bad graces of the elect.

That is all changed today, thanks to the Musicians' Union and, before the organist sounds the first notes of the organ, the check has to be forthcoming.

It is the same with the Symphony. Thanks to an honest attempt on the part of the governors of the Musical Association and the officials of the Union to understand the situation thoroughly orchestra men receive a minimum living wage that is fairly satisfactory.

So far excellent. But there is more work to be done, and it seems as if the only way out of the difficulty is for the Union to approach the problem artistically as well as economically.

IF TOSCANINI WERE TO COME

Everyone knows that if Toscanini were invited to direct our Symphony he would exact sweeping changes in the personnel before he accepted the position.

If he were allowed his way, San Francisco would have an orchestra second to none. But, even supposing there were money enough available to pay the men he wanted, would he be allowed his way?

Not unless there were a change of heart among the rank and file of the Union. They might concede him the privilege of importing first chair men for some of the reed and brass divisions; but even that would have to be fought out and the fight might be prolonged and acrimonious.

For it is a fixed point in Union policy that no instrumentalist shall be imported if there is a competent man on the ground. But who is to be the judge of competency? For years Alfred Hertz could not give "Heldenleben" because, in his opinion, the players of brass instruments available were not equal to the task.

There are men of taste and brains in the Union, many of them; but in the debates of the organization the man who plays the saxophone in a jazz band has an equal vote with the concert master of the Symphony.

JAZZ PLAYERS OUTNUMBER

And, whereas the Symphony men only number about four score men, musicians who play dance music outnumber them many times.

This has created a situation so difficult that, in despair, the directors of the Boston Symphony deunionized the orchestra. They pay their men more than the Union scale; but they can engage whom they will and replace whom they will; and, to make the position of the men more desirable, they take care of the worn-out veterans out of the endowment fund.

There ought to be some way in which the desire of the Union to secure a satisfactory livelihood for their men and the desire of the Symphony to have the best possible orchestra may be conciliated.

For any Union to pass on the judgment of a Toscanini, for instance, seems subversive of artistic ideals. Men of the caliber of the great Italian are valuable because their taste is better than that of the great majority of men. But of what value is that worth, if their wishes are to be frustrated by the lack of vision of men who have never played in a Symphony in their life?

ARTISTIC OUTLOOK NECESSARY

It does seem as if, in this particular, the Musicians Union ought to examine its own conscience, and only allow those of its members to vote on Symphony matters who, by capacity and experience, are competent to render a wise decision.

There is nothing antagonistic to unionism in this attitude. On the contrary, if carefully considered, it will be found to forecast a unionism which shall stand for the best interests of the musical craft.

We have obligations towards the men who play in our Symphony and, so long as they do good work, they are entitled to good pay and perpetuity of office. But no man or woman ought to be allowed to remain in the ranks of the Symphony if he or she lowers the standard of its performances.

When the Los Angeles Philharmonic visited us, music lovers were not slow to perceive that, in certain choirs, their work was better than our own. Now Los Angeles has taken away from us some of our best players. We ought to be able to engage others equally good to take their place, and bring them from other places if necessary.

THE DIRECTOR MUST DECIDE

When there is a diversity of opinion as to the merit of local performers, the proper person to make the final decision is the director. That is one of the reasons why he is employed, and the supporters of the Symphony make their donations on the understanding that, as far as possible, all concerned will facilitate the realization of his ideals.

But if his wishes are to be negatived by men who belong to a sphere of music lower than symphony, why should people be subscribers? If the dance musicians insist on deciding questions that affect the interest of the Symphony, they may kill the goose that lays the golden eggs.

It is for the Union to classify its members and only let them vote on questions which they are competent to understand.

144

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

MAR 1 - 1931

Greenbaum Defends Union

Albert Greenbaum, secretary of the Musicians' Union, writes the following interesting letter on the subject of the San Francisco Symphony. This is not the whole of the communication, but the essence is there.

Dear Mr. Mason:

I have read with a great deal of interest your article in The Examiner of last Sunday, which bears the title, "Who Should Decide About Engaging New Symphony Players?" There is only one fault to find, and that is that the facts you present are not exactly correct.

No one knows what Mr. Toscanini would or would not do, if he were here. The only thing we can state with any degree of certainty is that it is an odds-on bet that the maestro could not be lured to our city. It does seem strange, however, that Mr. Toscanini's principal 'cellist, Alfred Wallenstein, is a former member of the San Francisco Symphony, and was rated so lightly that he was kept on the last stand of the 'cellist section and had to leave here to obtain any recognition whatsoever.

I recall that another member of Mr. Toscanini's orchestra, Victor Geoffrion, found it necessary to go to other fields, where his talents might receive due appreciation and fair remuneration. He also played in the San Francisco Symphony. And at this time there comes to my mind the name of Quinto Maganini, local flutist, who has made a splendid name in Eastern and European fields, both as an artist and composer. He, too, could find no recognition for his talents here.

These facts might lead to an impression that certain people high in the councils of the San Francisco Symphony were unable to recognize the talent and ability that were to be found close at hand, but could only appreciate those people who came from other localities.

In the same paragraph, you ask who is to judge of competency. That, I think, is a debatable point. Surely a conductor cannot expect to be the sole judge, because we have found in many cases that the conductor's judgment has not always been of the best.

Many conductors are biased by personal likes and dislikes, and it has been known that the wives of symphony conductors often influence their spouses in the choice of musicians. Why should an organization such as ours stand for the importation of men whom we deem inferior to those at home? Our organization has always welcomed, and always will welcome, outstanding instrumentalists, but we do not want the other kind.

Again, you say: "There are men of taste and brains in the Union, many of them; but in the debates of the organization the man who plays the saxophone in a jazz band has an equal vote with the concert master of the Symphony. And whereas the Symphony men only number about four-score men, musicians who play dance music outnumber them many times." There is not one word of truth in the above quotation. The jazz, or dance men, while they may have an equal vote, NEVER take any part in symphony matters, and do not exercise their right to vote. At all meetings pertaining to Symphony business no one takes any part in the discussions or in the voting except the Symphony men themselves.

Our board of directors handles all requests for importations. It is the Symphony men themselves who get the ears of the various members of the board and make strenuous objection to importations.

When musicians face the loss of a livelihood they lose sight of the artistic side and see only the economic angle.

You then refer to the deunionization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Despite your statement that they pay their men more than the Union scale, the fact remains that, outside of a few first chair men, none of the rank and file receives as high a salary as the Union symphony orchestras. Indeed, I have it on the best of authority that there are young men among the strings who are paid as little as $18 or $20 per week. And the Boston Symphony Orchestra now ranks as a second-rate organization. The really great orchestras of America are all Union.

I do want to make it plain at this time that our organization has never refused necessary importations, and I also want to make it clear to you that many of our good men have been forced to go to other cities to make a decent living. Scan the roster of the Los Angeles Orchestra and you will find the names of many excellent San Francisco musicians. You will find in other cities of the country some of our talented local musicians who could not get a chance here. I maintain that we have been most generous in permitting the importation of men for the Symphony.

We are not lacking in a desire to see our orchestra become one of the best in the country, and our organization will maintain the same liberal attitude in the future as in the past in the permitting of importations. I do submit, however, that the best talent cannot be attracted here if the niggardly and parsimonious policy of squeezing nickels is to continue on the part of the Symphony management.

In conclusion, I want to make it clear that we have much fine native talent that has never been given half a chance. Due to the advent of mechanical entertainment, many capable performers are now at liberty, men who would be an asset to the Symphony Society.

I know that you are not antagonistic to our organization, and for that reason I have taken the liberty of writing you, as the sporting thing to do.

ALBERT A. GREENBAUM.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

MAR 1 - 1931

Hub Symphony Unit Thursday

Koussevitzky to Offer 'Symphonie de Psaumes' by Stravinsky.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 5 and 7.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will present at both concerts the "Symphonie de Psaumes" by Igor Stravinsky. This is the Russian composer's latest work which was written especially for the fifieth anniversary of this orchestra and has had its first performance in Boston. Chorus from the Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross, conductor, will sing the vocal part. Honegger's recently completed symphony, which likewise was composed especially for the orchestra's anniversary and was first performed in Boston on February 13 and 14, also will be introduced to New York at the Thursday evening concert. The concert will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 for string orchestra and close with Ravel's "La Valse."

The matinee concert will open with another Concerto Grosso of Handel—No. 6 for String Orchestra—and, in addition to Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," will include a performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 1 - 1931

ENAMEL, WHITE, GREEN, IVORY, VALUE, $65; SALE, $39. 39-22 164TH ST., FLUSHING. INDEPENDENCE 3-3876. fe2

FURNITURE

FOR SALE—Newly furnished three-room apartment; very modern furniture; reason for selling, leaving town. 184 Clarkson ave., Apt. 3-K. Ingersoll 2-5336. ma3

HEAVY 4-piece parlor suite, rug, table, telephone stand with chair, Sterling piano, cabinet, 100 rolls, large bench, bed, etc. Call 539 Liberty ave., one flight up, right. ma3

SACRIFICING almost new handsome 10-piece dining room suite, also bedroom 10-piece suite with box spring and curled horse hair mattress. Midwood 8-7328. ma1

FISH STORE fixtures for sale, complete;

MAR 1 - 1931

Nathan Milstein will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra March 13 and 14 in Boston in the Brahms violin concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Haydn's symphony in D major, Steinert's "

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 3 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS FINE PROGRAM TOMORROW AT WOOLSEY

One of the finest programs ever arranged for a local appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night in Woolsey Hall, at which occasion Serge Koussevitzky, noted Russian leader of the famous organization, will conduct.

One of the numbers to be given will be a Symphony by Honegger, which was written especially for this, the 50th anniversary year of the Boston Symphony.

The full program will be as follows:
Handel, Concerto Gross for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 12.
Honegger ..... Symphony
I. Allegro marcato.
II. Adagio.
III. Presto.
Wagner—Ride of the Valykries from "Die Walkure"
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Rimsky-Korsakov—Caprics on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
I. Alborada.
II. Variations.
III. Alborada.
IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
V. Fandango of the Asturias.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 2 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SMITH TUESDAY NIGHT

Serge Koussevitsky to Conduct Sixth Number in Concert Course Series

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will give the sixth number in this season's Smith college concert series in John M. Greene hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The orchestra was founded in 1881 by H. L. Higginson, under the conductorship of George Henschel. Since then, under Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and others, it has steadily climbed to its place as one of the most famous orchestras in this country. Conductor Serge Koussevitsky has long been known in music circles. He was soloist for a time at the Russian Imperial theater and founded and directed the Koussevitsky Symphony orchestra of 85 pieces. Dr. Koussevitsky has been twice decorated by the Czar and has also received the Legion of Honor from France. Standing room will be on sale at the box office for one dollar.

The program is as follows:
Concerto grosso for string orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6 Handel
Capriccia for piano and orchestra Stravinsky
I. Presto
II. Andante rapsodico
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto (played without pause)
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" Wagner
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem Ravel
Soloist—Jesus Maria Savroma

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

MAR 3 - 1931

Smith College hony onight

l Present tra in ll.

rch 2—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, will give the sixth concert in the season's Smith College concert series in John M. Greene Hall on Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock.

The orchestra was founded in 1881 by H. L. Higginson, under the direction and conductorship of George Henschel. Since then, under Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and others, it has climbed steadily to its place as one of the most famous orchestras in this country. Conductor Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky has long been known in music circles. He was soloist for a time at the Hussian Imperial Theater and founded and directed the Koussevitsky Symphony of 85 players. Dr. Koussevitsky has twice been decorated by the Czar and has also received the Legion of Honor from France

The program for Tuesday evening is as follows:
Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6. Handel
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, Stravinsky
I. Presto.
II. Andante rapsodico.
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure," Wagner
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem, Ravel
Soloist, Jesus Maria Savroma.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 3 - 1931

Koussevitzky Changes Program

Serge Koussevitzky has substituted the prelude and finale from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" for the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for next Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The other members, as previously announced, will be Sibelius's "Finlandia" and seventh symphony, Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MAR 2 1931

Boston Symphony at College Tonight

Koussevitsky Will Present Famous Orchestra in Greene Hall.

NORTHAMPTON, March 3 — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, will give the sixth concert in the season's Smith College concert series in John M. Greene Hall this evening at 8 o'clock.

The orchestra was founded in 1881 by H. L. Higginson, under the direction and conductorship of George Henschel. Since then, under Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and others, it has climbed steadily to its place as one of the most famous orchestras in this country. Conductor Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky has long been known in music circles. He was soloist for a time at the Hussian Imperial Theater and founded and directed the Koussevitsky Symphony of 85 players. Dr. Koussevitsky has twice been decorated by the Czar and has also received the Legion of Honor from France.

The program for Tuesday evening is as follows:
Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6. Handel
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, Stravinsky
I. Presto.
II. Andante rapsodico.
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure," Wagner
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem. Ravel
Soloist, Jesus Maria Savroma.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

MAR 3 - 1931

PROGRAM ANNOUNCED FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

One of the finest programs ever arranged for a local appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night in Woolsey Hall, at which occasion Serge Koussevitzky, noted Russian leader of the famous organization, will conduct.

One of the numbers to be given will be a Symphony by Honegger, which was written especially for this, the 50th anniversary year of the Boston Symphony.

The full program will be as follows:
Handel ..... Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 12
Honegger ..... Symphony
I. Allegro marcato
II. Adagio
III. Presto
Wagner ..... Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure"
Wagner....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Rimsky-Korsako v..... Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
I. Alborada
II. Variations
III. Alborada
IV. Scene and Gypsy Songs
V. Fandango of the Asturias

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 3 - 1931

SYMPHONY TO PLAY TONIGHT AT SMITH

Boston Orchestra Will Give Sixth Concert in College Concert Series

Northampton, March 2—The Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitsky, will give the sixth concert in this season's Smith college concert series at John M. Greene hall tomorrow night at 8.

Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky was soloist for a time at the Russian Imperial theater and founded and directed the Koussevitsky symphony of 85 players. Dr Koussevitsky was twice decorated by the czar and has received the Legion of Honor from France.

The program for tomorrow follows:—
Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra Op. 6., No. 6 ..... Handel
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra Stravinsky
I. Presto
II. Andante rapsodico
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" Wagner
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem ..... Ravel
Soloist—Jesus Maria Savroma

144

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
MAR 1 - 1931

Greenbaum Defends Union

Albert Greenbaum, secretary of the Musicians' Union, writes the following interesting letter on the subject of the San Francisco Symphony. This is not the whole of the communication, but the essence is there.

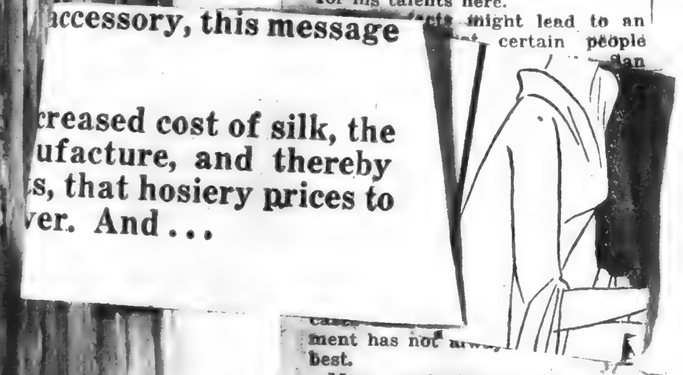
Dear Mr. Mason:

I have read with a great deal of interest your article in The Examiner of last Sunday, which bears the title, "Who Should Decide About Engaging New Symphony Players?" There is only one fault to find, and that is that the facts you present are not exactly correct.

No one knows what Mr. Toscanini would or would not do, if he were here. The only thing we can state with any degree of certainty is that it is an odds-on bet that the maestro could not be lured to our city. It does seem strange, however, that Mr. Toscanini's principal 'cellist, Alfred Wallenstein, is a former member of the San Francisco Symphony, and was rated so lightly that he was kept on the last stand of the 'cellist section and had to leave here to obtain any recognition whatsoever.

I recall that another member of Mr. Toscanini's orchestra, Victor Geoffrion, found it necessary to go to other fields, where his talents might receive due appreciation and fair remuneration. He also played in the San Francisco Symphony. And at this time there comes to my mind the name of Quinto Maganini, local flutist, who has made a splendid name in Eastern and European fields, both as an artist and composer. He, too, could find no recognition for his talents here.

[illegible] might lead to an [illegible] certain people [illegible]



[illegible] ment has not [illegible] best.

Many conductors are biased by personal likes and dislikes, and it has been known that the wives of symphony conductors often influence their spouses in the choice of musicians. Why should an organization such as ours stand for the importation of men whom we deem inferior to those at home? Our organization has always welcomed, and always will welcome, outstanding instrumentalists, but we do not want the other kind.

Again, you say: "There are men of taste and brains in the Union, many of them; but in the debates of the organization the man who plays the saxophone in a jazz band has an equal vote with the concert master of the Symphony. And whereas the Symphony men only number about four-score men, musicians who play dance music outnumber them many times." There is not one word of truth in the above quotation. The jazz, or dance men, while they may have an equal vote, NEVER take any part in symphony matters, and do not exercise their right to vote. At all meetings pertaining to Symphony business no one takes any part in the discussions or in the voting except the Symphony men themselves.

Our board of directors handles all requests for importations. It is the Symphony men themselves who get the ears of the various members of the board and make strenuous objection to importations.

When musicians face the loss of a livelihood they lose sight of the artistic side and see only the economic angle.

You then refer to the deunionization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Despite your statement that they pay their men more than the Union scale, the fact remains that, outside of a few first chair men, none of the rank and file receives as high a salary as the Union symphony orchestras. Indeed, I have it on the best of authority that there are young men among the strings who are paid as little as $15 or $20 per week. And the Boston Symphony Orchestra now ranks as a second-rate organization. The really great orchestras of America are all Union.

I do want to make it plain at this time that our organization has never refused necessary importations, and I also want to make it clear to you that many of our good men have been forced to go to other cities to make a decent living. Scan the roster of the Los Angeles Orchestra and you will find the names of many excellent San Francisco musicians. You will find in other cities of the country some of our talented local musicians who could not get a chance here. I maintain that we have been most generous in permitting the importation of men for the Symphony.

We are not lacking in a desire

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

Hub Symphony Unit Thursday

Koussevitzky to Offer 'Symphonie de Psaumes' by Stravinsky.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 5 and 7.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will present at both concerts the "Symphonie de Psaumes" by Igor Stravinsky. This is the Russian composer's latest work which was written especially for the fifieth anniversary of this orchestra and has had its first performance in Boston. Chorus from the Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross, conductor, will sing the vocal part. Honegger's recently completed symphony, which likewise was composed especially for the orchestra's anniversary and was first performed in Boston on February 13 and 14, also will be introduced to New York at the Thursday evening concert. The concert will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 for string orchestra and close with Ravel's "La Valse."

The matinee concert will open with another Concerto Grosso of Handel—No. 6 for String Orchestra—and, in addition to Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," will include a performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 1 - 1931

Music in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the fourth visit in Brooklyn of its fiftieth season to give a concert on Friday evening, March 6, in the Academy of Music.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will devote the first part of the program to the music of Jan Sibelius, the famous living Finnish composer. He will present the tone poem, "Finlandia," and the Symphony No. 7, in one movement, which is the latest that Sibelius has written. The program will otherwise consist of Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," after Mallarme's poem, and "Bacchanal, from "Tannhauser," by Wagner, and "La Valse," by Ravel.

Georges Barrere, the world's premier virtuoso of the flute, will give a recital at the Academy, under Institute auspices, next Sunday afternoon, March 8. His program follows: Concerto in D major, Mozart; Siciliane, Bach; Tambourin, Mondonville; Musette, Le Clair; Scene from "Orpheus," by Gluck; Nocturne and Valse, Chopin; Serenade, G. Rue; Madrigal, Wormser; Scherzo, Widor; Andantino, Faure; Pavane, Saint-Saens; "The Little Shepherd," Debussy; Allegretto, Godard. Alice Nichols will be at the piano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 1 - 1931

Nathan Milstein will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra March 13 and 14 in Boston in the Brahms violin concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Haydn's symphony in D major, Steinert's "Legend" [illegible] and [illegible] by

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 3 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS FINE PROGRAM TOMORROW AT WOOLSEY

One of the finest programs ever arranged for a local appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night in Woolsey Hall, at which occasion Serge Koussevitzky, noted Russian leader of the famous organization, will conduct.

One of the numbers to be given will be a Symphony by Honegger, which was written especially for this, the 50th anniversary year of the Boston Symphony.

The full program will be as follows:
Handel, Concerto Gross for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 12.
Honegger ..... Symphony
I. Allegro marcato.
II. Adagio.
III. Presto.
Wagner—Ride of the Valykries from "Die Walkure"
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Rimsky-Korsakov—Caprics on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
I. Alborada.
II. Variations.
III. Alborada.
IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
V. Fandango of the Asturias.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAR 2 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SMITH TUESDAY NIGHT

Serge Koussevitsky to Conduct Sixth Number in Concert Course Series

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will give the sixth number in this season's Smith college concert series in John M. Greene hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The orchestra was founded in 1881 by H. L. Higginson, under the conductorship of George Henschel. Since then, under Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and others, it has steadily climbed to its place as one of the most famous orchestras in this country. Conductor Serge Koussevitsky has long been known in music circles. He was soloist for a time at the Russian Imperial theater and founded and directed the Koussevitsky Symphony orchestra of 85 pieces. Dr. Koussevitsky has been twice decorated by the Czar and has also received the Legion of Honor from France. Standing room will be on sale at the box office for one dollar.

The program is as follows:
Concerto grosso for string orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6 Handel
Capriccia for piano and orchestra Stravinsky
I. Presto
II. Andante rapsodico
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto (played without pause)
Ride of the [illegible] 'Die
[illegible] ner
[illegible] om
[illegible] ner
[illegible] em
[illegible] vel
[illegible] na

Koussevitsky Will Present Famous Orchestra in Greene Hall.

NORTHAMPTON, March 2—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, will give the sixth concert in the season's Smith College concert series in John M. Greene Hall on Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock.

The orchestra was founded in 1881 by H. L. Higginson, under the direction and conductorship of George Henschel. Since then, under Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and others, it has climbed steadily to its place as one of the most famous orchestras in this country. Conductor Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky has long been known in music circles. He was soloist for a time at the Hussian Imperial Theater and founded and directed the Koussevitsky Symphony of 85 players. Dr. Koussevitsky has twice been decorated by the Czar and has also received the Legion of Honor from France

The program for Tuesday evening is as follows:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6, Handel
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, Stravinsky
I. Presto.
II. Andante rapsodico.
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure," Wagner
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem, Ravel
Soloist, Jesus Maria Savroma.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 3 - 1931

Koussevitzky Changes Program

Serge Koussevitzky has substituted the prelude and finale from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" for the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for next Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The other members, as previously announced, will be Sibelius's "Finlandia" and seventh symphony, Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
MAR 3 1931

Boston Symphony at College Tonight

Koussevitsky Will Present Famous Orchestra in Greene Hall.

NORTHAMPTON, March 3 — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, will give the sixth concert in the season's Smith College concert series in John M. Greene Hall this evening at 8 o'clock.

The orchestra was founded in 1881 by H. L. Higginson, under the direction and conductorship of George Henschel. Since then, under Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and others, it has climbed steadily to its place as one of the most famous orchestras in this country. Conductor Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky has long been known in music circles. He was soloist for a time at the Hussian Imperial Theater and founded and directed the Koussevitsky Symphony of 85 players. Dr. Koussevitsky has twice been decorated by the Czar and has also received the Legion of Honor from France.

The program for Tuesday evening is as follows:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6, Handel
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, Stravinsky
I. Presto.
II. Andante rapsodico.
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure," Wagner
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem, Ravel
Soloist, Jesus Maria Savroma.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER
MAR 3 - 1931

PROGRAM ANNOUNCED FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

One of the finest programs ever arranged for a local appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be [illegible] tomorrow night in Woolsey Hall, at which occasion Serge Koussevitzky, noted Russian leader of the famous organization, will conduct.

One of the numbers to be given will be a Symphony by Honegger, which was written especially for this, the 50th anniversary year of the Boston Symphony.

The full program will be as follows:
Handel ..... Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 12
Honegger ..... Symphony
I. Allegro marcato
II. Adagio
III. Presto
Wagner ..... Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure"
Wagner....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Rimsky-Korsako v..... Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
I. Alborada
II. Variations
III. Alborada
IV. Scene and Gypsy Songs
V. Fandango of the Asturias

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 3 - 1931

SYMPHONY TO PLAY TONIGHT AT SMITH

Boston Orchestra Will Give Sixth Concert in College Concert Series

Northampton, March 2—The Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitsky, will give the sixth concert in this season's Smith college concert series at John M. Greene hall tomorrow night at 8.

Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky was soloist for a time at the Russian Imperial theater and founded and directed the Koussevitsky symphony of 85 players. Dr Koussevitsky was twice decorated by the czar and has received the Legion of Honor from France.

The program for tomorrow follows:—
Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra Op. 6., No. 6 ..... Handel
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra Stravinsky
I. Presto
II. Andante rapsodico
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" Wagner
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem .... Ravel
Soloist—Jesus Maria Savroma

144

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

MAR 1 - 1931

Greenbaum Defends Union

Albert Greenbaum, secretary of the Musicians' Union, writes the following interesting letter on the subject of the San Francisco Symphony. This is not the whole of the communication, but the essence is there.

Dear Mr. Mason:

I have read with a great deal of interest your article in The Examiner of last Sunday, which bears the title, "Who Should Decide About Engaging New Symphony Players?" There is only one fault to find, and that is that the facts you present are not exactly correct.

No one knows what Mr. Toscanini would or would not do, if he were here. The only thing we can state with any degree of certainty is that it is an odds-on bet that the maestro could not be lured to our city. It does seem strange, however, that Mr. Toscanini's principal 'cellist, Alfred Wallenstein, is a former member of the San Francisco Symphony, and was rated so lightly that he was kept on the last stand of the 'cellist section and had to leave here to obtain any recognition whatsoever.

I recall that another member of Mr. Toscanini's orchestra, Victor Geoffrion, found it necessary to go to other fields, where his talents might receive due appreciation and fair remuneration. He also played in the San Francisco Symphony. And at this time there comes to my mind the name of Quinto Maganini, local flutist, who has made a splendid name in Eastern and European fields, both as an artist and composer. He, too, could find no recognition for his talents here.

[illegible] might lead to an [illegible] certain people [illegible] than ment has not always been the best.

Many conductors are biased by personal likes and dislikes, and it has been known that the wives of symphony conductors often influence their spouses in the choice of musicians. Why should an organization such as ours stand for the importation of men whom we deem inferior to those at home? Our organization has always welcomed, and always will welcome, outstanding instrumentalists, but we do not want the other kind.

Again, you say: "There are men of taste and brains in the Union, many of them; but in the debates of the organization the man who plays the saxophone in a jazz band has an equal vote with the concert master of the Symphony. And whereas the Symphony men only number about four-score men, musicians who play dance music outnumber them many times." There is not one word of truth in the above quotation. The jazz, or dance men, while they may have an equal vote, NEVER take any part in symphony matters, and do not exercise their right to vote. At all meetings pertaining to Symphony business no one takes any part in the discussions or in the voting except the Symphony men themselves.

Our board of directors handles all requests for importations. It is the Symphony men themselves who get the ears of the various members of the board and make strenuous objection to importations.

When musicians face the loss of a livelihood they lose sight of the artistic side and see only the economic angle.

You then refer to the deunionization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Despite your statement that they pay their men more than the Union scale, the fact remains that, outside of a few first chair men, none of the rank and file receives as high a salary as the Union symphony orchestras. Indeed, I have it on the best of authority that there are young men among the strings who are paid as little as $18 or $20 per week. And the Boston Symphony Orchestra now ranks as a second-rate organization. The really great orchestras of America are all Union.

I do want to make it plain at this time that our organization has never refused necessary importations, and I also want to make it clear to you that many of our good men have been forced to go to other cities to make a decent living. Scan the roster of the Los Angeles Orchestra and you will find the names of many excellent San Francisco musicians. You will find in other cities of the country some of our talented local musicians who could not get a chance here. I maintain that we have been most generous in permitting the importation of men for the Symphony.

We are not lacking in a desire

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

[illegible]

HubSymphony Unit Thursday

Koussevitzky to Offer 'Symphonie de Psaumes' by Stravinsky.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 5 and 7.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will present at both concerts the "Symphonie de Psaumes" by Igor Stravinsky. This is the Russian composer's latest work which was written especially for the fifieth anniversary of this orchestra and has had its first performance in Boston. Chorus from the Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross, conductor, will sing the vocal part. Honegger's recently completed symphony, which likewise was composed especially for the orchestra's anniversary and was first performed in Boston on February 13 and 14, also will be introduced to New York at the Thursday evening concert. The concert will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 for string orchestra and close with Ravel's "La Valse."

The matinee concert will open with another Concerto Grosso of Handel—No. 6 for String Orchestra—and, in addition to Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," will include a performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's Symphony in C-major, No. 2, to be heard for the first time in New York. The afternoon will close with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

[illegible] apartment
[illegible]son for selling, leaving town
[illegible]son ave., Apt. 3-K. Ingersoll 2-5336.
wil ma
lyn HEAVY 4-piece parlor suite, rug, table, telephone stand with chair, Sterling piano, cabinet, 100 rolls, large bench, cor bed, etc. Call 539 Liberty ave., one flight up, right. ma in SACRIFICING almost new handsome 10-piece dining room suite, also bedroom, 10-piece suite with box spring and curled the horse hair mattress. Midwood 8-7328. ma mu FISH STORE fixtures for sale, complete; ing no reasonable offer refused. Call Luxsen emburg 8-2490. ma the ATTRACTIVE, 3-piece fibre set, kitchen tables, chairs; also practically new me Freed-Eisemann Radio, 5 tubes; 2 Victhar trolas; reasonable. Esplanade 5-7987. ma wi NINE-PIECE WALNUT DINING ROOM the SUITE, GOOD CONDITION; VERY lar REASONABLE. PHONE NEWTOWN 9 7566. fe26-28 ma
THREE PIECE [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 1 - 1931

Nathan Milstein will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra March 13 and 14 in Boston in the Brahms violin concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Haydn's symphony in D major, Steinert's "Leggende Sinfonica" and "Two Hungarian Dances" by Brahms.

[illegible]HONY
[illegible] FINE PROGRAM
TOMORROW AT WOOLSEY

One of the finest programs ever arranged for a local appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night in Woolsey Hall, at which occasion Serge Koussevitzky, noted Russian leader of the famous organization, will conduct.

One of the numbers to be given will be a Symphony by Honegger, which was written especially for this, the 50th anniversary year of the Boston Symphony.

The full program will be as follows:
Handel, Concerto Gross for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 12.
Honegger ..... Symphony
I. Allegro marcato.
II. Adagio.
III. Presto.
Wagner—Ride of the Valykries from "Die Walkure"
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Rimsky-Korsakov—Caprics on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
I. Alborada.
II. Variations.
III. Alborada.
IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
V. Fandango of the Asturias.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 2 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SMITH TUESDAY NIGHT

Serge Koussevitsky to Conduct Sixth Number in Concert Course Series

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will give the sixth number in this season's Smith college concert series in John M. Greene hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The orchestra was founded in 1881 by H. L. Higginson, under the conductorship of George Henschel. Since then, under Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and others, it has steadily climbed to its place as one of the most famous orchestras in this country. Conductor Serge Koussevitsky has long been known in music circles. He was soloist for a time at the Russian Imperial theater and founded and directed the Koussevitsky Symphony orchestra of 85 pieces. Dr. Koussevitsky has been twice decorated by the Czar and has also received the Legion of Honor from France. Standing room will be on sale at the box office for one dollar.

The program is as follows:
Concerto grosso for string orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6 Handel
Capriccia for piano and orchestra Stravinsky
I. Presto
II. Andante rapsodico
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto (played without pause)
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" Wagner
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem Ravel
Soloist—Jesus Maria Savroma

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

MAR 3 - 1931

Smith College Boston Symphony at College Tonight

Koussevitsky Will Present Famous Orchestra in Greene Hall.

NORTHAMPTON, March 2—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, will give the sixth concert in the season's Smith College concert series in John M. Greene Hall on Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock.

The orchestra was founded in 1881 by H. L. Higginson, under the direction and conductorship of George Henschel. Since then, under Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and others, it has climbed steadily to its place as one of the most famous orchestras in this country. Conductor Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky has long been known in music circles. He was soloist for a time at the Hussian Imperial Theater and founded and directed the Koussevitsky Symphony of 85 players. Dr. Koussevitsky has twice been decorated by the Czar and has also received the Legion of Honor from France

The program for Tuesday evening is as follows:
Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6, Handel
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, Stravinsky
I. Presto.
II. Andante rapsodico.
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure," Wagner
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem, Ravel
Soloist, Jesus Maria Savroma.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 3 - 1931

Koussevitzky Changes Program

Serge Koussevitzky has substituted the prelude and finale from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" for the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for next Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The other members, as previously announced, will be Sibelius's "Finlandia" and seventh symphony, Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MAR 3 1931

Boston Symphony at College Tonight

Koussevitsky Will Present Famous Orchestra in Greene Hall.

NORTHAMPTON, March 3 — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, will give the sixth concert in the season's Smith College concert series in John M. Greene Hall this evening at 8 o'clock.

The orchestra was founded in 1881 by H. L. Higginson, under the direction and conductorship of George Henschel. Since then, under Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and others, it has climbed steadily to its place as one of the most famous orchestras in this country. Conductor Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky has long been known in music circles. He was soloist for a time at the Hussian Imperial Theater and founded and directed the Koussevitsky Symphony of 85 players. Dr. Koussevitsky has twice been decorated by the Czar and has also received the Legion of Honor from France.

The program for Tuesday evening is as follows:
Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6 Handel
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, Stravinsky
I. Presto.
II. Andante rapsodico.
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure," Wagner
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem. Ravel
Soloist, Jesus Maria Savroma.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

MAR 3 - 1931

PROGRAM ANNOUNCED FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

One of the finest programs ever arranged for a local appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tomorrow night in Woolsey Hall, at which occasion Serge Koussevitzky, noted Russian leader of the famous organization, will conduct.

One of the numbers to be given will be a Symphony by Honegger, which was written especially for this, the 50th anniversary year of the Boston Symphony.

The full program will be as follows:
Handel ..... Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 12
Honegger ..... Symphony
I. Allegro marcato
II. Adagio
III. Presto
Wagner ..... Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure"
Wagner....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Rimsky-Korsako v..... Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
I. Alborada
II. Variations
III. Alborada
IV. Scene and Gypsy Songs
V. Fandango of the Asturias

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 3 - 1931

SYMPHONY TO PLAY TONIGHT AT SMITH

Boston Orchestra Will Give Sixth Concert in College Concert Series

Northampton, March 2—The Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitsky, will give the sixth concert in this season's Smith college concert series at John M. Greene hall tomorrow night at 8.

Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky was soloist for a time at the Russian Imperial theater and founded and directed the Koussevitsky symphony of 85 players. Dr Koussevitsky was twice decorated by the czar and has received the Legion of Honor from France.

The program for tomorrow follows:—
Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra Op. 6., No. 6 ..... Handel
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra ..... Stravinsky
I. Presto
II. Andante rapsodico
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto
Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" ..... Wagner
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem ..... Ravel
Soloist—Jesus Maria Savroma

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS CONCERT AT SMITH COLLEGE

Koussevitzky's Musicians Give One of Most Remarkable Orchestral Programs Ever Heard There

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, March 3—The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, made its annual appearance here this evening in a concert at John M. Greene hall in the Smith college course. These concerts have been notably good this season, but tonight's performance is likely to stand at the top. It was one of the most remarkable orchestra concerts ever heard here, and showed that the famous Boston organization has again won the primacy which at one time seemed threatened. In sheer virtuosity it is hard to see how tonights program could be surpassed. Its musical interest was if anything increased by a last moment change in the program by which the prelude and "Love death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" was substituted for the "Bacchanale" from the same composer's "Tannhaeuser." The latter has recently been played here by another orchestra, which was sufficient reason for the shift, but in any case the "Tristan" music made a richer and more thrilling concert and fitted well enough into the general scheme, which gave a large place to orchestra virtuosity.

The concert opened soberly and sedately enough with one of those splendid concerti grossi by Handel, this time the one in G minor, opus 6, No. 6, for string orchestra, the superb array of strings seeming to fill the whole stage so that one might wonder how the full orchestra could later be got on. And what a magnificent string tone was revealed in Handel's sonorous, melodious and expressive music! Dr Koussevitzky conducted it ideally, on very simple broad lines and very quietly without superfluous gesture, seemingly leaving to his musicians the utmost freedom. Both in the ensembles for solo instruments and in the imposing tonal masses with which these were contrasted the performance was of the utmost beauty and perfection.

After this came the most striking novelty of the evening, Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra—not a very new work but not heard here before and fascinating in its novel orchestral effects. The piano, beautifully played by Jesus Maria Sanroma of Boston, was in the center, surrounded by a chamber music group of solo instruments, including a violin, viola, 'cello and bass seated apart from their groups, and outside and around this nucleus was the general orchestral mass. Stravinsky has shown great skill, boldness and originality even in so secondary a matter as doing unusual things with unusual instrumental groupings, and in this work he combines the piano with the orchestra in a manner to a great extent quite new and highly effective, the combinations with small groups strongly contrasted in color and shifting swiftly from the bizarre to the beautiful, making the score fascinating. But it is a work for virtuoso, orchestra; its difficulty must be great.

The second half of the program opened with the "Tristan" music, in which a great effect was made, all the greater perhaps, for tempi at times a little slower than is usual in the opera. Here the great mass of the orchestra may have had some influence; certainly the cast waves of tone rolled up on the melancholy sands with tremendous emotional weight and though massive the movement never seemed to drag.

The change of program perhaps made Debussy's eclogue "The Afternoon of a Faun" sound thinner and slighter than would have been the case after the "Bacchanale," but it was exquisitely played and its delicate colors and romantic atmosphere made it, as always, a favorite. But the most brilliant and showy part of the concert came in the closing number, Ravel's choregraphic poem, "Le Valse." This remarkable work, which had a vogue some years ago when it was new, may have a fresh run as a result of the sudden popularity of the same composer's "Bolero."

In some respects they are alike, using dance rhythms for an overwhelming and dazzling orchestral effect, but the "Valse" is not so much of a well defined stunt as the sustained crescendo of the "Bolero." On the other hand it is a no less astonishing piece of orchestration and wears much better than the "Victory Ball" which was a product of the same period and an exploitation of the same general idea. The performance tonight had tremendous force and vitality and sent the audience away almost breathless with this fine thrill. But thrilling as the concert was it was of great beauty as well and is memorable.

SALEM, MASS.
NEWS

MAR 4 1931

FOREIGN NEWS

Sir George Henschel, 81-year-old musician and composer, last night in London conducted the British Broadcasting Company Symphony orchestra in the same program which he conducted at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra half a century ago. Despite his age, the noted musician conducted the long program so brilliantly that at its conclusion the members of the large radio orchestra burst into prolonged and enthusiastic applause. The closing number was Wagner's overture to "Die Meistersinger."

TIME TO CLEAN UP

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 4 - 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN A THRILLING CONCERT

Beautiful Music Magnificently Conducted Makes Concert High Point of Series

It was with distinctly joyous expectation (which even the chamber concert of the afternoon had not dampened) that one attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, for the program included numbers which not only were particularly interesting in themselves, but which also promised to show the orchestra at its best—Handel, Stravinsky, Debussy. And all anticipations were fulfilled; the audience exhibited thundering approval. It was a thrilling concert of beautiful music magnificently conducted.

Every moment was alive and absorbing—beyond critical analyzation. The Handel "Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in G minor," which opened the program, is a marvelous piece of writing for strings, and it was played with a control of phrasing and a resonant repose that was entirely satisfying. In fact, the stringed instruments possess a unanimity of tone color that is amazing.

The new Stravinsky work—the "Capriccio"—probably aroused greater discussion, but there were so many interesting things to watch in the scoring, and the rhythms were so propelling, that one scarcely had time to be critical. It is stylized music with attention to form and economy of instrumentation, but it is virile, rhythmic, scintillating and the orchestral effects are both original and fascinating, even though one may not like certain things such as the occasional hurdy-gurdy effect. The piano solo, brittle and percussive, is well embedded in the scheme of the whole, but its intricacies are by no means lost. Mr. Sanroma played it brilliantly.

The "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," which followed, seems to me to be the greatest of Wagner's music, the more so when it is conducted as it was last evening, with controlled intensity which works toward the tremendous climax. The placing of the Wagner here between the sharply contrasting styles of Stravinsky and Debussy is an example of the perfectly arranged program.

And so, it seems, the "Prelude a l'apres, midi d'un Faune" is from the best of Debussy, inimitably performed.

"La Valse," a choregraphic poem, was a charming and effective conclusion.

The concert has been, this year, the high point of the John M. Greene hall series. G. L. F.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BURLINGTON, VT.
Free Press
MAR 4 1931

LONDON, March 3. (AP)—Sir George Henschel, 81-year-old musician and composer, tonight conducted the British broadcasting company symphony orchestra in the program which he conducted at the opening concert of the Boston symphony orchestra half a century ago.

SYMPHONY FROM BOSTON IN TOP FORM AT SMITH

With Koussevitsky Directing, Gives Finest Concert in Valley's Season; Sanroma Pianist

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, March 3—There are 12 major orchestras in the United States and tonight the greatest of them all, the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, played in John M. Green Hall, Smith College. The Smith College Concert Court has had a wide variety of fine concerts this season but the concert tonight was the finest of all, indeed, it was the finest concert we have heard in the Connecticut Valley this season and that includes concerts by the Detroit, Cleveland and Philadelphia symphony orchestras.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is in top form this season and is celebrating its 50th anniversary which will culminate the last of this month with a gigantic Bach festical in Boston. Always a purveyor of interesting and novel programs, Dr. Koussevitsky arranged for tonight's program one of exceptional interest and merit.

It opened calmly enough with the "Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6, G Minor," one of the 12 concertos for strings written by Handel. The ethereal beauty of the string choirs was manifested throughout the concerto.

Especial interest centered in the first hearing here of the "Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra" by Stravinsky. Jesus Maria Sanroma was the pianist. The work is sheer fantasy and one may imagine all sorts of delightful stories although Pierre de Lapommeraye, after hearing it, evolved a charming story of Harlequin, Petrouchka, Punchinello and Columbine. This work reveals Stravinsky in his happiest, most mellow mood, quite devoid of aggressive polyphony, but elegant and scintillating.

The piano plays an important part in this work, not so much as a solo instrument but as a part of the orchestra. Mr. Sanroma is a skilled pianist and was the recipient of much applause for his splendid work. The Capriccio was received with the greatest enthusiasm and both the pianist and Dr. Koussevitsky were called out repeatedly.

The great moment of the evening, to one listener at least, came with the superb reading of the Prelude and Lielestod from "Tristan and Isolde." It was a magnificient achievement. This greatest love song of all time has never been equalled and it is doubtful if tonight's interpretation by Dr. Koussevitsky could be bettered.

In striking contrast, a contrast few program makers would dare allow, was the "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" by Debussy. There were many in the audience who remembered the storm of criticism this work aroused when it was first given in this country in 1902 in Boston. Column after column was written about it and every phase of disapprobation was used concerning it. Tonight it seemed as harmless and twice as pleasant as the Handel work. It was played magnificiently, Dr. Koussevitsky bringing out every shade and nuance. Each member of the orchestra is a virtuoso else such superb playing would not be possible.

The closing number was the "The Waltz," a choregraphic poem by Ravel This was played by the Detroit Symphony at Mt. Holyoke College earlier in the season. One could not help remembering, as one listened, Ravel's "Bolera" and Schelling's "Victory Ball." It is the gayest kind of music, the gaiety hightened by sudden flashes of melancholy and brooding, and it demands the same tremendous climaxes as are heard in the Bolero. It was given a virtuoso performance, thrilling in its intensity. The work completely captured the audience and had they had their way the orchestra would be playing yet, but very wisely Dr. Koussevitsky allowed no encores for encores could not have helped but provide an anticlimax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

MAR 4 1931

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving concerts in Northampton, New Haven, New York and Brooklyn. The next regular concerts, therefore, will come next week, when another violinist, Nathan Milstein will be assisting artist, playing the Brahms Concerto in D major, Opus 77.

There was opportunity last Friday afternoon to hear the orchestra in Edward Burlingame Hill's new Symphony in C major, which was then given its first performance. This work, I am told, was not written for the anniversary year of the orchestra, but was dedicated to Professor Spalding of the Harvard department of music of the faculty of which the composer is also a member. There is the composer's word for it that it has no descriptive background. It is absolute rather than program music.

His own comments on the music draw attention to his intent to keep to the traditional forms, since he felt that he lacked sufficient experience to experiment. A single hearing of the symphony suggested that if it failed to impress the audience deeply, the trouble may be just there. For while Mr. Hill did follow traditional forms in the structure, working out and developing his musical material in the established fashion, expanding it into the customary four movements, it was also apparent that he had not been unobservant of the less conservative trend in current music. With the modern idiom, as it seemed to one hearer at least, he did experiment, though admittedly after our cautious New England fashion.

The result, therefore, struck one as something in the nature of a musical compromise. Dr. Koussevitzky, evidently had spared no pains in its preparation. Passages in the Scherzo and in the slow movement seemed the most expressive. By report the whole went with better effect at the second performance on Saturday evening. After a single hearing of a new work it is wiser to record impressions rather than to draw conclusions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 4 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

Playing a program of unusual beauty, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard tonight at Woolsey Hall, the great organization of 110 musicians being conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Selections by Handel, Honegger, Wagner and Rimsky-Korsakov will be rendered, and much interest may be attached to each number.

The symphony to be played is by Honegger, and was written by the great French composer especially for this, the Orchestras 50th anniversary year. It was recently given in Boston, where it was pronounced a success and the masterpiece of its composer up to this time.

Rimsky-Korsakovs Caprice on Spanish Themes is also a brilliant orchestral piece, and should meet with great success. The Wagner numbers will be the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" and the Prelude to "Lohengrin", while the Handel offering will be a Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra.

The concert will commence promptly at 8:30.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 4 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE TONIGHT

Playing a program of usual beauty, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard tonight at Woolsey Hall, the great organization of 110 musicians being conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Selections by Handel, Honeger, Wagner and Rimsky-Korsakov will be rendered and much interest may be attached to each member.

The symphony to be played is by Honeger and was written by the great French composer especially for this, the orchestra's 50th anniversary year. It was recently given in Boston, where it was pronounced a success and the masterpiece of its composer up to this time.

Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish Themes is also a brilliant orchestral piece, and should meet with great success. The Wagner numbers will be the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" and the Prelude to "Lohengrin," while the Handel offering will be a Concerto Grosso for string orchestra.

The concert will commence at 8:30.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER
MAR 5 - 1931

MUSICAL MOMENTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By Miles Kastendieck

Every year the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arouses unusual interest among those who look forward to hearing this great organization of musicians. Seldom, if ever, is an audience disappointed. Even if the program is not always gratifying, the playing under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is of such sterling quality that the evening is memorably spent. The concert in Woolsey Hall last night was one of those occasions which calls for the highest tribute to both the conductor and the members of the orchestra.

Opening the program was a Handel Concerto Grosso that is a favorite of Dr. Koussevitsky. It is a stunning work; Handel at his best. Sometimes it seems that there can be nothing more impressive than an ensemble of stringed instruments under perfect control. Dr. Koussevitsky conducts this work con amore and the majesty and dignity of his interpretation bore out the intrinsic nobility of this work of art.

The second number was composed especially for the 50th anniversay of the orchestra which is being celebrated this month. Honegger, the composer, might well

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 5 - 1931

steam-spitting manner which he so triumphantly used in that piece. The manner was obviously present in both the first and third movements of this new symphony. It is extremely novel and likeable but it has a limit—that of machine-like monotony. The second movement of pastoral quality had several attractive sliding harmonies for the woodwinds. The strongest appeal in the symphony as a whole, lies in its rhythmic variety.

Two Wagner numbers: The Ride of the Valkyries and the prelude to "Lohengrin" were performed in a striking manner.

In the Prelude the ethereal effect was sustained by beautiful violin work. What a tremendous composition this is with the descent of the Holy Grail so magnificently presented in the music! The performance was worthy of the piece.

The brilliant "Caprice on Spanish Themes" of Rimsky-Korsakov completed the program. This work depends on orchestral color for its effects and stands as a fine tribute to the composer's mastery of instrumentation. It offered a spirited ending to an excellent concert.

Again the appearance of the Boston Symphony marks the conclusion for the present season of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series under the management of Mr. Daggett Lee. The remarkable attendance at all the concerts reflects much credit on his planning of an artistically varied series. And it is with anticipation of an equally satisfactory artists' course that we can look forward to another year.

Boston Symphony Delights Vast Throng At Woolsey Hall Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, now celebrating the 50th anniversary of its foundation and under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, gave its annual concert at Woolsey hall last evening. It was a completely sold-out house, with hundreds of seats added and the stage with its 110 players was equally taxed to capacity.

Again this notable organization gave evidence of its superb solidarity of tone, unanamity of attack and release and obvious attention to the minutest detail.

Koussevitzky leads with uncanny precision and emotion. One is compelled with the idea that he "lives" his music.

The obsorbing and outstanding feature of the program was a symphony written by Arthur Honegger in commemoration of the 50th year of the existence of the Boston Symphony and its conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky. It is the latest of a great many works Honegger has invested with modernism and eccentricity. Much of it is made up of wailing and bewildering dissonances which might be descriptive of an inferno with its tortures and screechings. The effect is accomulatingly exhilarating, but seems to let up greatly in the last movement only to be saved by a masterly constructed climax with eccentric but effectiv einstrumentation.

The capious critic found cold comfort last evening for everything went along the lines of impeccability. The Handel concerto for strings was a marvel of beauty; and we may ask when have we heard such a stirirng delineation of the "Ride of Valkyries" or such exquisite coloring as portrayed in the Prelude to "Lohengrin"?

A group of Spanish themes arranged by Runsky-Korsakov closed the sumptuous symphonic feast.

Mr. Doggett M. Lee, the manager of this excellent series, of which the Boston Symphony was the last, may feel justly proud of this season's achievements.

E. A. L.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 5 - 1931

Boston Symphony Scores Big Hit in Woolsey Concert

Capacity Audience Expresses Enthusiasm Often and Loudly—Koussevitzky, Conductor, Brilliant

Even in a series so notable as the Woolsey Hall concerts have been this year, last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a distinctly unusual event. An audience, obviously alert and expectant, filled the hall to the doors, expressed its enthusiasm often and loudly, lingered to recall the conductor many times, while an orchestra that was on its mettle was at one with its leader in creating a performance of superb virtuosity.

From the moment Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, turned his impeccably tailored shoulders on the audience and launched his first eye-filling gesture toward the band, to the final outburst of applause, it was an evening of anticipation fulfilled.

For beginning there was a Handel Concerto Grosso, opus 6, No. 12, typically Handelian in the broad, suave progress, the long curve of its melodies. The silken tone of the Bostonian strings gave ravishing voice to the music, while Dr. Koussevitzky, working his will on the players, gave a reading of the piece that mirrored and illuminated its manifold beauties. At least one reviewer who had decided in advance that he was bored with Handel underwent an abrunpt and striking change of mind.

The principal offering of the evening was Honegger's new symphony, finished less than a year ago. This proved o be a work of genuine distinction, written wiht a vital imaginatio and fine craftsmanship, but open, perhaps, to the not particularly damnin charge of bein gunimportant.

It is a true piece of modern music hard-boiled, disillusioned, as unsentimental as a glass of gin and bitters—the work of a sharply fatidiou minc The first movement is keen-edged an witty, filled with stridency and the bit of?dmaist B,ecittan af cmfw y cmfwya of discord, bu it sweeps on logically economically, and pungently to its unexpected conclusion. The second movment is in a less acrid vein, filled wit charming and easily ferceptible melod; at times seeming to be touched by th "blues" influence. There are moments in this movement when it is sard to nemember taat Honegger was one of the six infants terribles cf Paris; this is the sort of thing, one reflects, that George Gershwin would like to write if he could. The final movement, too, was in the composer's more amiable mood, again giving the lie to those who say that modernists can write no melody.

Even though this symphony may never give the Brahms symphonies a run for their money, it may safely be judged a minor masterpiece in kind.

In the "Ride of the Valkyries," Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave a performance long to be remembered for its vividness, and in the "Lohengrin" Prelude there was a miraculous tone that glowed and shimmered, transfiguring the music into rapt and exultant beauty.

For final number, there was Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol," magnificently performed. It is frankly stunt music, but when stunts are as well conceived and as brilliantly executed as this, they are worth hearing, and purely as an exhibition of orchestration, this Caprice is dazzling. The solo parts in this pieces were especially notable, with the flute playing of Georges Laurent a miracle of beauty. Throughout the evening, the concertmaster, Richard Burgin, played his solos with a sensitiveness and musicianship that deserve critical huzzahs.

It was an altogether brilliant conclusion to a series which has been remarkably successful, and one for which Mr. Daggett Lee, the manager, deserves the grateful thanks of the entire musical public of New Haven.

J. L. Shute.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION STAR
MAR 5 - 1931

Sir George Henschel conducts symphony orchestra in London at age of 81 in same program which he conducted at opening of Boston Symphony 50 years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 6 - 1931

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Gives Novelties.

By OLIN DOWNES.

A series of brilliant performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall, included first New York presentations of Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra with chorus—the choral parts sung by members of the Schola Cantorum—and Honegger's Symphony, both these works having been composed for the fiftieth anniversary year of the famous organization. They were estimated by the very representative audience which attends these concerts. In view of the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky will repeat Stravinsky's composition tomorrow afternoon, comment upon it may be deferred until then.

Honegger's symphony is written with that composer's wonted skill, energy and complete command of the modern poly-harmonic style. It is glib, brilliant writing in its modern vein. To the writer's mind there is very little in it. The three movements of the symphony are short and often effective. In the first movement certain violent rhythms acknowledge Stravinsky's existence. The slow movement, broad in outline, is stronger than the first. The last movement is gay, and butter would not melt in the mouth of the suave and conventional ending. Like too many other compositions of Honegger, one of the most gifted composers of his generation in Paris, this symphony is plausible and a pasticcio of styles—Stravinsky, Honegger himself of the "Pacific," and suddenly the affected innocence of the conclusion. The symphony brings home to us in dexterous fashion certain technical tendencies of the day in music, but conviction and integrity of purpose seem absent from it.

Perhaps to soften the effect of a large dose of contemporaneous Stravinsky and Honegger Mr. Koussevitzky began his program with Handel's "Concerto grosso" for string orchestra in B minor and ended it with Ravel's "Valse." In each instance the orchestra discoursed the music superbly. The freshness and nobility of Handel's score sustained the listener through much that followed. The performance of Ravel's "Valse" was one of matchless certainty and esprit. We doubt if another orchestra and another conductor can equal last night's performance for its glorious swing, beauty of tone and sheer daazzling virtuosity. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men sported with the music, while the interpretation had the dash of mockery and sardonic laughter which inhabit these pages. For this is at once a caricature and apotheosis of the waltz and another example of Ravel's uncanny genius in the use of orchestral instruments. No wonder that the audience was delighted by this bravura music and performance. The whole evening was one of the highest excellence as far as the playing is concerned. The quality of the music is another story.

N.Y. HER. TRIBUNE MARCH 6

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

Stravinsky Turns Psalmist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Jubilee

Fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; assisted by Chorus of the Schola Cantorum.

PROGRAM

1. Handel.....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, Op. 6, No. 12
4. Ravel....."La Valse," Choregraphic Poem
2. Stravinsky....."Symphonie de Psaumes," for Orchestra with Chorus
   Chorus: Schola Cantorum of New York, Hugh Ross, Conductor
   (First time in New York)
3. Honegger.....Symphony
   (First time in New York)
4. Ravel...."La Valse," Choregraphic Poem

GOD is worshiped by artists in many ways. For some, as for Bach, there was the way of simple prayer and intimate communion: the way that in his case was magically transmuting, for it gave us music which escapes from its pietistic century into a timeless existence of its own, a life of the spirit that is independent of the unstable theologies of man.

Others, finding God in Nature, might be moved to give Blake's answer to the questioner who asked, "When the sun rises, do you not see a round disk of fire, something like a guinea?"—"No! I see an innumerable company of the heavenly host, crying 'Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord God Almighty.'" It was thus that Beethoven often worshiped, and Bruckner, and those other mystics for whom the beauty and wonder of the visible earth were august revelations of the Divine. Stirred by the miracle of the dawn, by shadows in pools, by the evening light upon the hills, the peace that falls within the valley, they saw these things as, in Wordsworth's phrase, "the garment of God."

* * *

Others, again, worship by the bringing of gifts of the imagination, offering the beauty of songs and words, the loveliness of colors and contours and designs—as those who followed to Bethlehem the annunciatory Star, bearing frankincense and myrrh, silver and wrought bronze, chalcedonies from the Indies, and pearls from Kushan, and garments stiff with gold, adorned with sapphires where their seams were fastened. Of such are the liberal Kings of art, the Magi of tributary beauty—Handel and Wagner and Brahms.

* * *

And there is the way of Mr. Stravinsky—Stravinsky, the romantic poet of "L'Oiseau de Feu," the bitter, ironic jester of "Petrouchka," the sophisticated savage of the "Sacre," the copyist of bygone styles who has played the sedulous ape to Bach and Handel, Beethoven and Glinka and Tchaikovsky: Stravinsky, the restless experimentalist, whose feet have now, it seems, been set upon the rock of the Psalmist, and into whose mouth a new song has been put.

For we are now confronted with Stravinsky the man of primitive faith, an Old Testament Stravinsky, setting, for orchestra and chorus, passages from the Psalms of David, by kind encouragement of Dr. Koussevitzky, as an offering to the current celebration by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of its fiftieth anniversary. The result, a "Symphonie de Psaumes," was put before us Thursday night, for the first time here, by the great organization that stoops to conquer us from time to time in the abandoned precincts of Fifty-seventh Street.

* * *

Stravinsky chose verses from three of the Psalms, using the text of the Vulgate. In the King James's version, the Psalms that provoked the imagination of the composer are the Thirty-ninth (verses 12-13); the Fortieth (verses 1-3) and the Hundred and Fiftieth (entire). In the first, the Psalmist utters his prayer and his entreaty—and makes immortal beauty with the marvellous line, "Hold not thy peace at my tears." In the second, he proclaims his joy over the Lord's response, for he has been rescued from the horrible pit and set upon a rock. The third is the magnificent exhortation to praise the Lord with trumpet and psaltery and harp, with timbrel and dance, "upon the high-sounding cymbals."

* * *

The musical forces used by Stravinsky comprise an orchestra robbed of violins and violas, but equipped, among other instruments, with five flutes, four oboes and two pianos. The chorus is mixed and in four parts.

Igor Stravinsky

Whose new "Symphony of Psalms" was heard Thursday night

For the three contrasting moods of the symphony—prayer, thanksgiving, praise—Stravinsky has found original and puissant utterance. He has foregone, as one would have expected, the obvious approaches to his text. The musical clichés of lamentation, of thanksgiving, of jubilant praise, have no place in his expressional scheme. He has done what the fructifying artist always does in subjecting to his imagination a standardized subject-matter—has discovered in it fresh aspects and implications, hidden depths and surfaces; has made it yield him what the seventeenth century would have called "an excellent strangeness."

* * *

"Before I go hence, and be no more," sings the Psalmist at the end of his entreaty; and the long-held notes of Stravinsky's chorus, the grave harmonies of the orchestra, effuse no facile pathos, but an age-old austerity of grief.

For the verses of thanksgiving (set at the beginning as an astonishing double fugue for orchestra and chorus), he finds a music of intricate and subtle poignance, perhaps the most searching page that Stravinsky has yet given us. The Psalmist recalls the horrors of the pit and of the miry clay, and his anguished waiting for release. His speech is somber with remembered pain; and the acid, astringent tones of the woodwind, the spareness and sharpness of the musical idea, its refusal of the easily delectable, mirror the poet's thought.

* * *

In the last division, the Psalmist's hymn of praise, there are superb outbursts—as when the singer remembers the trumpets and organs and stringed instruments that should exalt the Lord: there is music of splendor, music of imperial voice and vesture, "arrased with purple like the house of kings."

But the most deeply touching of the symphony's movements is that remarkable E flat passage near the end in which, as you await a mighty outburst at "praise him upon the loud cymbals," the music is suddenly stilled, and the voices, in a page that haunts the ear and the mind, evoke the awe of the worshipper before the Sanctuary. And the concluding Alleluia, too, is hushed, as at the thought of the supreme beneficence . . . "He hath made everything beautiful in his time: also he hath set eternity in their heart."

* * *

Stravinsky, in short, has given us a masterpiece. It is his excelling work. For its exhibition last night, in a justly revealing performance, there can be naught but gratitude to the great orchestra which achieved it.

* * *

Of Honegger's new symphony there will be occasion to speak at another time. Last night was Stravinsky's.

Throng Hears Boston Symphony

Koussevitsky Offers Stravinsky and Honegger Compositions at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came down like wolves on the fold last night and their cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold of Stravinsky and Honegger. The large audience assembled in Carnegie Hall realized that the moderns were upon them and surrendered gracefully to the call of the Russian's "Symphonie de Psaumes" and the Swiss Frenchman's symphony in three movements. Both conpositions were written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston orchestra, which has filled the winter and is now enriching the spring with novelties, some destined to survive the heats of summer and some to wither under the pitiless sun of July.

Mr. Stravinsky, who was born near Leningrad, lives in Nice, and makes music without a country, wrote his symphony of psalms in 1930 "to the glory of God" and dedicated it to the Bostonians. It is a choral work, calling into service last night the Schola Cantorum, and consists of settings of three excerpts from the Book of Psalms presented in the text of the Latin Vulgate. The scoring is characteristic; it calls for numerous wind instruments, two pianos, harp, cellos and basses. The violins and violas of the conventional orchestra are omitted.

Stravinsky has adventured into many musical territories and has evolved several styles. It may be that, like Solomon, he has begun to have qualms and possibly like Solomon, he therefore writes psalms. Yet whatever else may be said about his wanderings from "The Fire Bird" to the "Sacred du Printemps," back to Bach and forward again to "Exaudi orationem meam, Domine" and "Alleluia," it is clear that at bottom his musical credo has never materially altered. One heard him again last night sounding strange polyphonies with wind instruments, challenging the ear with strident staccato chords and weaving his spells with the magic of conflicting keys. Abrupt contrasts of forte and piano were not wanting nor melodic fragments seemingly intruded for the sole purpose of becoming lost in the tonal jungle.

Nevertheless there remained the final conviction that a mind possessed of authority and a hand trained to high skill had been at work. Some of the choral writing was striking in its effectiveness and it had a firmness of texture evoking admiration. The departure from the conventional treatment of the old exclamatory "Alleluia" was noteworthy. Stravinsky gave us a very tender setting in sustained tones sung piano. The close of the work was impressive. But it must be added that a searching examination of the composition cannot be attempted after a single hearing, which left this auditor uncertain whether there was something more or a great deal less than appeared on the surface. The music was very well done. The chorus of the Schola Cantorum discharged its difficult task with high honor.

About the Honegger symphony there need be less hesitation in utterance. The work is divided into allegro marcato, adagio and presto, the last concluding with a brief andante tranquillo. The opening movement is rudely and aggressively rhythmic, almost as much so as the celebrated "Pacific 231." One might be listening to the charge of heavy brigade; but the horses do it better. The modernist is always in trouble when he writes an adagio. His abhorrence of the effete lyric line of the classicists and romanticists leaves him with little to work upon save broken ejaculations and harmonies sharper than a serpent's tooth.

In the finale Honegger abandoned much of the machinery of his guild and launched recklessly into a good old-fashioned scherzando in which he did pretty much everything from Beethoven to Rimsky-Korsakov, and then wound up with some antique sentiment of which even Joachim Raff might not have been ashamed. When Mr. Koussevitzky went on safari in the happy hunting grounds of European composition in search of fare for this fiftieth anniversary banquet, he naturally looked for big game among the new monsters of modern music; but what he exhibited to us last night appeared to be no more savage than the paint and feathers of a war dance.

The concert began with Handel's B minor concerto grosso for strings and ended with Ravel's "La Valse."

NEW STRAVINSKY "PSALMS" HEARD

MAR 6. TELEGRAM

Boston Orchestra Introduces Symphony Here.

N.Y.

By PITTS SANBORN.

When Serge Koussevitsky comes over to Carnegie Hall with his famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has a way of regaling us New Yorkers with interesting programs.

Last evening he introduced to us Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" for orchestra and chorus beside a purely orchestral symphony by Arthur Honegger, both composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which occurred last autumn.

The other pieces offered were Handel's concerto grosso for string orchestra in B minor, op. 6, No. 12, and Ravel's choregraphic poem "La Valse."

The first performance anywhere of the Stravinsky composition took place at Brussels on December 11, 1930, given by the Brussels Philharmonic Society. On December 19 the Boston Symphony gave it in Boston. Last evening the Boston orchestra was assisted by the Schola Cantorum of New York.

The text of the "Symphony of Psalms" is taken from the Latin Vulgate (Stravinsky has gone in heavily for Latin in recent years.) In the King James version it comprises "Hear my prayer O Lord" and "I waited patiently for the Lord," from the thirty-ninth and the fortieth psalms, and the whole of the last psalm (150).

The Bostonians are to repeat this work tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall. After that performance more may be written about it. Yet even now one may safely maintain that it is the most important of Stravinsky's recent compositions and that the latter part of the 150th psalm is among the most genuinely beautiful things that he has ever composed.

Honegger's symphony, which the composer finished last May, is more problematical. It seemed also less important. However, repetition will serve to settle that point.

Ravel's "La Valse" has been played here many times, yet I doubt whether this "dance on a volcano" was ever set forth in more brilliant fashion than last evening.

The audience, of capacity size, was most enthusiastic.

147

Music

N. Y. Post

By Oscar Thompson

MARCH 6.

New Symphonies by Stravinsky and Honegger Are Introduced to Manhattan Adherents of the Boston Symphony

N.Y.Post Orch.

BOSTON has been celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of its illustrious orchestra. Composers of the eminence of Igor Stravinsky, Arthur Honegger and Albert Roussel have written symphonies expressly for these jubilational proceedings. With a large-heartedness that speaks for itself, Serge Koussevitzky and his associated celebrants have permitted New York to share in this anniversary repast, by bringing the choicest of the newly prepared refections to the very doors of their Manhattan admirers. No one here had to go to Boston to consume or be consumed by the Roussel symphony. It was served expeditiously in Carnegie Hall some weeks ago, though opinions were not unanimous that it was piping hot. The new Stravinsky and Honegger works were not denied those [illegible] to devour them. Their turn came last night. Two such large bites of modernity in one evening engendered no visible or audible dismay. Musical digestions would seem to be hardier today than ever before.

With the two first performances in New York went also projections by the Bostonians of a Handel Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 12, in B minor, and Ravel's ironically irisated fantasy, "La Valse"—no trifling program. Mr. Koussevitzky's flair for Ravel was perhaps more obvious than his particular penchant for Handel, but beyond that we can have no opinion that would run contrary to a general impression that all the numbers were played with keen insight and with much skill in surmounting those difficulties peculiar to the playing of the music of the hour.

The Stravinsky symphony, styled by him "Symphonie de Psaumes," is a choral symphony. When it was performed in Boston on December 19 last (six days after the Brussels Philharmonic Society had stolen a march on the institution for which the work was composed by giving a first public performance) the Cecilia, Society chorus of that city assisted. Last night's collaborative body was the Schola Cantorum, and Mr. Koussevitzky saw to it that Hugh Ross, conductor of the organization, shared in the bow-taking. Beyond noting that the choral singing progressed smoothly to its conclusion, nothing urgent is to be said of this phase of the performance, in view of the lack of any basis for comparisons and of a fuller familiarity with the work itself.

ONCE more the orientation of Stravinsky has veered. This symphony is no more like "Apollon Musagettes" than that work is like "Le Sacre du Printemps," or "Œdipus Rex" is like the Symphonies for Wind Instruments. Here is no "back to Tchaikovsky"; no evocation of past graces of Versailles. Ancient Jewry is contemplated—but contemplated, so it seems to us, from afar. Verses from the psalms, with the Vulgate text, are set in such a manner as to provide three choral-symphonic movements. Their verbal moods are successively of supplication ("Hear My Prayer, O Lord"), gratitude and resignation ("I Waited Patiently for the Lord") and, finally, jubilation ("Alleluia—Praise Ye the Lord"). Stravinsky did not go about treading any such climactic ascent from deepest depression to fiery exultation as might have been expected from, let us say, Ernest Bloch. His Hebraic questings are not of the flaming, prophetic order. He builds cumulatively but does not depart from his stance of reverie. He yields to no excitement, he kindles none. His devotions have in them a reflective remoteness that makes the religious side of the work—composed as it is "to the Glory of God" and "dedicated to the Boston Symphony"—decidedly secondary to the musical considerations involved.

Chorally, this is a work of moving masses, dependent for contrast (at first hearing, at least) on dynamic and harmonic changes rather than on alternations of pace. Gone is the Stravinsky obsession for rhythm. The three movements are not sharply differentiated; each seems an entity in itself. The treatment of the voices changes, however, from a dark and hollow suggestion at the outset, to something of starry choiring later on. The vocal parts are processional, as of a gentle multitude moving on, steadily and surely, but not of any very weighty momentum. Against this advancing mass, the orchestra fashions figures that are mostly hard-edged, the wood winds in their more biting timbres predominating, and with two pianos given much the some sort of decorative figuration as the clarinets, flutes or bassoons. There are distinctive odd and striking details, but for us they were the bright thoughts of an extraordinary technician who had approached his problem of making a symphony of the psalms by way of the head rather than the heart. We much prefer the pagan Stravinsky to the psalmist. We would have him moujik, not Levite. This symphony seems to us a work deficient in red blood, much lucubrated, very moderately inspired.

The Honegger Symphony deserves no such extended consideration. It is athletic, brutal, pseudo-idyllic and Rabelaisian by turns, expending much energy on those rougher combinations of sound that presumably came into being because the young bloods thought the world jaded and surfeited with all harmonious relationships, and sounding rhythmic tattoos of an aggressive and muscular fierceness. Save in the Adagio and the tranquil close appended to the otherwise rowdy final movement, the effect of the work was entirely physical, and the exceptions, though contrast gave them a suggestion of glamour they did not possess, were scarcely to be regarded as attaining anything of spiritual beauty by virtue of the cessation they brought of the prevailing harshness and violence of this aggressive but barren score.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
MAR 6 1931

Throng Hears Boston Symphony

Koussevitsky Offers Stravinsky and Honegger Compositions at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came down like wolves on the fold last night and their cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold of Stravinsky and Honegger. The large audience assembled in Carnegie Hall realized that the moderns were upon them and surrendered gracefully to the call of the Russian's "Symphonie de Psaumes" and the Swiss Frenchman's symphony in three movements. Both conpositions were written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston orchestra, which has filled the winter and is now enriching the spring with novelties, some destined to survive the heats of summer and some to wither under the pitiless sun of July.

Mr. Stravinsky, who was born near Leningrad, lives in Nice, and makes music without a country, wrote his symphony of psalms in 1930 "to the glory of God" and dedicated it to the Bostonians. It is a choral work, calling into service last night the Schola Cantorum, and consists of settings of three excerpts from the Book of Psalms presented in the text of the Latin Vulgate. The scoring is characteristic; it calls for numerous wind instruments, two pianos, harp, cellos and basses. The violins and violas of the conventional orchestra are omitted.

Stravinsky has adventured into many musical territories and has evolved several styles. It may be that, like Solomon, he has begun to have qualms and possibly like Solomon, he therefore writes psalms. Yet whatever else may be said about his wanderings from "The Fire Bird" to the "Sacred du Printemps," back to Bach and forward again to "Exaudi orationem meam, Domine" and "Alleluia," it is clear that at bottom his musical credo has never materially altered. One heard him again last night sounding strange polyphonies with wind instruments, challenging the ear with strident staccato chords and weaving his spells with the magic of conflicting keys. Abrupt contrasts of forte and piano were not wanting nor melodic fragments seemingly intruded for the sole purpose of becoming lost in the tonal jungle.

Nevertheless there remained the final conviction that a mind possessed of authority and a hand trained to high skill had been at work. Some of the choral writing was striking in its effectiveness and it had a firmness of texture evoking admiration. The departure from the conventional treatment of the old exclamatory "Alleluia" was noteworthy. Stravinsky gave us a very tender setting in sustained tones sung piano. The close of the work was impressive. But it must be added that a searching examination of the composition cannot be attempted after a single hearing, which left this auditor uncertain whether there was something more or a great deal less than appeared on the surface. The music was very well done. The chorus of the Schola Cantorum discharged its difficult task with high honor.

About the Honegger symphony there need be less hesitation in utterance. The work is divided into allegro marcato, adagio and presto, the last concluding with a brief andante tranquillo. The opening movement is rudely and aggressively rhythmic, almost as much so as the celebrated "Pacific 231." One might be listening to the charge of heavy brigade;" but the horses do it better. The modernist is always in trouble when he writes an adagio. His abhorrence of the effete lyric line of the classicists and romanticists leaves him with little to work upon save broken ejaculations and harmonies sharper than a serpent's tooth.

In the finale Honegger abandoned much of the machinery of his guild and launched recklessly into a good old-fashioned scherzando in which he did pretty much everything from Beethoven to Rimsky-Korsakov, and then wound up with some antique sentiment of which even Joachim Raff might not have been ashamed. When Mr. Koussevitzky went on safari in the happy hunting grounds of European composition in search of fare for this fiftieth anniversary banquet, he naturally looked for big game among the new monsters of modern music; but what he exhibited to us last night appeared to be no more savage than the paint and feathers of a war dance.

The concert began with Handel's B minor concerto grosso for strings and ended with Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
MAR 6 - 1931

E
IC

two of those novelties were heard here last evening, when the jubilating Boston Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzy, gave a concert in its [illegible] series at Carnegie Hall, and presented "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra and chorus, by Igor Stravinsky, and just a plain symphony, by Arthur Honegger.

Time was when we felt something of wicked curiosity and a twinge of fear at the prospect of encountering new works hot from the pens of the modernistic composers. However, those exciting days are past, and now we face the latest symphonic music pluckily and even a bit patronizingly.

Stravinsky's name is no longer whispered with awe; we have his number since he capitulated to the classics, crawled "back to Bach," to the Psalms and the Oedipus Rex. He gave up whoopee and went pious.

His "Symphonie de Psaumes" (Psalms) is in three movements (connected by orchestral interludes) the first presenting the text of the 13th and 14th verses of the 38th Psalm; the second employing the first four verses of the 39th Psalm; the third embracing the 90th Psalm. The latin text of the Vulgate is used. In the King James version, these Psalms are numbered 39th, 40th and 90th.

This Stravinsky score was composed in 1930, "To the Glory of God," and dedicated to the Boston Orchestra — a very flattering affiliation. The presence of a chorus in a symphony is no new departure; it was first introduced in his No. 9 by a talented fellow named Beethoven.

"Symphonie de Psaumes" is not a symphony at all, be it told. The reduced orchesta without violins and including two pianos) plays a lean role. The chief musical factor is the chorus. It sings in a good imitation of the ancient harmonic modes, and the instrumental accompaniment displays the same austerity. Economy of means and absence of color distinguish the composition from start to finish. There is more euphony in the vocal score than in the mildly modernistic orchestral part.

The glory of God, as expressed by this music, seems to be in Stravinsky's mind rather than in his art.

I know a dozen composers, including some Americans, who [illegible] to tonalize such a subject with more exaltation and convincing religious fervor—and with more interesting music—than are evidenced in this "Psalms Symphony." It is vapid music. Far more compelling was Stravinsky when he had the courage of his own cacophony.

Honegger's symphony, also composed in 1930, has three movements. In this work one naturally looks for traces of the tonal realist who constructed those vivid tone-poems, "Pacific 231" and "Rugby." Instead, there was rigorous and relentless counterpoint, carried through logically at any and all costs, producing resultant clashes of harmony and theme that seem to be Honegger's delight, more than melodic appeal or any surrender to sentiment.

The second movement began with a semblance of romantic concession, but immediately followed again the composer's typical demonstrations of mere line and musical mathematics. This symphony is not the kind which the public will clamor to hear again.

In both the foregoing numbers, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with full devotion and his players acquitted themselves with chaste tone and faultless technic. The Schola Cantorum sang its Stravinsky measures, with their difficult intervals, most admirably.

Opening the program was Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 6, B minor, in which Mr. Koussevitzky permitted some of the suspensions to be blurred by unrelated harmonies that ran together. The closing number, Ravel's "La Valse," afforded the only moments of musical sensuousness during an evening that put amazingly slight demand upon the emotions of the listeners

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL
MAR 6 - 1931

Stravinsky's Psalms Symphony Heard At Premiere

By IRVING WEIL.

A new work of major proportions by Igor Stravinsky, without much question the outstanding composer of the day, unfailingly arouses the keenest curiosity. Carnegie Hall was accordingly packed last night, for Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra were giving a first performance in New York of the Russian's "Symphony of Psalms." It was received with apparently mixed feelings, although there was a good deal of hearty enough applause after it was finished.

The symphony was commissioned by the Boston Orchestra and is one of a number by numerous contemporaries so written forming a kind of festival of new music to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the band. The work was completed last Summer and is inscribed "To the Glory of God," with a dedication to Boston's orchestra.

At first thought is seems a bit strange that the man who wrote the utterly pagan and ruthless music of "The Rite of Spring" and the equally pagan and barbaric music of "The Marriage Rite" should suddenly have turned modern mystic. But, after listening to "The Symphony of Psalms," one finds Stravinsky's progression, or evolution, to be not at all so odd.

THIRD PHASE OF TRILOGY.

For this "Symphony of Psalms," although itself curiously repressed and impersonal in its mysticism, discloses a large touch of rhythmic barbarity and may well be regarded as the third phase of a trilogy which began with "The Rite of Spring." Here, as a fact, is really a sequence of mysticism, a triple dedication in music—first, to the rite of creation; next, to the rite of procreation, and lastly to the Creator of life itself.

In his latest work, Stravinsky has based his music on a choral treatment of parts of three of the Psalms, settings of the Latin texts of the Vulgate. These correspond, in the King James version, to Psalms 39, 40 and 150—the first the cry of the penitent to the Lord, the second his [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
MAR 6 - 1931

High Notes of the

MUSIC WORLD

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

IT IS ALWAYS a pleasure to welcome Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony to town. That fine organization always gives good value, and even those hearers who do not belong to the particular cult that worships the Boston Symphony above all other orchestras get their full meed of enjoyment out of it.

Last night, beginning the current visit to this city with a Carnegie Hall concert, Dr. Koussevitzky had the chorus of the Schola Cantorum to assist his musicians, and presented a programme of classical and modernistic music that was a real joy.

The concert opened with the lovely Haendel Concerto Grosso for strings, one of the most delightful numbers of the period in which Haendel wrote and which always evokes enthusiasm in the bosom of this reviewer. The strong section of the orchestra played it supremely well and the audience greeted it rapturously.

Following that the musicians dived into a programme of modernism, of Ravel, Stravinsky and Honegger. It was in the "Symphonie des Psaumes" of the great Russian composer that Hugh Ross directed his magnificent chorus, and the effects were remarkable. Ravel was represented by two "Valses," both choreographic poems, both highly modernistic, both wholly delightful.

Honegger's Symphony was heard for the first time in New York, is a short number of three movements. It is a brilliant piece written strictly in the modernistic manner, and those who like that manner will be apt to like it.

Needless to say, the playing and direction were perfect. The orchestra plays to-night in Brooklyn and to-morrow we will give a more extended account of that concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 6 - 1931

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

Dr. Koussevitzky in New Haven.

Dr. Koussevitzky of Harvard and [illegible]chestra, [illegible]of Yale [illegible]t, last [illegible]th the [illegible]l band [illegible]en one [illegible]phony [illegible]y good [illegible] were [illegible], Ger- [illegible]emem- [illegible]er who [illegible]ry day [illegible]n con- [illegible]ere all [illegible]s been [illegible]ool of [illegible]. Well, [illegible]anters [illegible]y eve- [illegible]r Lee [illegible]scrape [illegible]all to [illegible]e; but [illegible]d we [illegible]ly, by [illegible]; after [illegible]use a [illegible]e wife [illegible]ert at [illegible] seat- [illegible]im to [illegible] him; [illegible] yours [illegible]pleas- [illegible]y un- [illegible]cert— [illegible]hich I [illegible]hestra [illegible]hough [illegible]ducing [illegible]as "a [illegible]e was [illegible]a the [illegible]y (in [illegible]t the [illegible]lude) [illegible]phere [illegible]There [illegible] brass [illegible]e was [illegible]ss in [illegible]d-odd [illegible]figure sensuous quality that the upper strings would inevitably have brought to it. He misprises their subjectively romantic implications.

One believes, indeed, that his aim has been to evoke in his music something sub-human, so as to give the impression of the vastly remote spiritual distance that separates the penitent from his Creator. And he seeks to achieve this by making the expression of the penitent consistently impersonal. To such an extent he has strikingly succeeded.

LESS VIRILE.

Nonetheless, "The Symphony of Psalms" is far less virile and original music than either of its mystic predecessors. At times, in fact, it reveals a hand grown imitative and almost feeble; and at its best, during the rather laboriously built up mood of exaltation in the middle movement, Stravinsky merely begins rewriting the characteristic bludgeoning rhythm and polytonal harmonies of "The Rite of Spring."

The performance last night made one suspect that the symphony was often being haltingly unfolded. The chorus of the Schola Cantorum sang the vocal part but seemed to be not sure of its ground.

Mr. Koussevitzky also presented a first performance of Arthur Honegger's new symphony, likewise especially written for the Boston Orchestra, but this sounded as though the composer had got aboard his famous old locomotive, "Pacific, 231," for a second trip and this time didn't quite know where he wanted to go. The program additionally held a Handel concerto grosso and Maurice Ravel's "The Waltz."

[illegible] Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 12 Dr. Koussevitzky showed the quality of his string orchestra's tone in magnificent fulness and richness, with every touch of melody, every shade of the gay humors that abound in the work brought out at its best. Here was the the perfection of smoothness in string tone with a maximum of power when required by the reading —and smoothness and power do not always abide in harmony in the String family!

Then came the Honegger Symphony—composed in celebration of the orchestra's present, fiftieth, season; and though I am quite sure that some readers may feel that I am not a strict modernist in music I will admit that my going to the concert on that bad Wednesday evening was really based on a desire to hear that symphony. And I'm glad I heard it.

For Honegger, in a brief passage at the end of his work, has written music of surpassing loveliness—music that falls like a benediction, beautifully and sincerely pronounced at the close of a stormy, efficient discussion by men competent but unrefined, [illegible] was [illegible]ly [illegible] wholly [illegible] know [illegible]icking [illegible]saying [illegible]he old [illegible]e had [illegible]ention [illegible] turn [illegible] them [illegible]k. But [illegible]es, he [illegible]ack to [illegible]dience [illegible]rtainly [illegible]e first [illegible]r as I [illegible]hood— was [illegible]ural in applause, much of which was for the finale only as to enjoyment, but all of which must have recognized the artistry of the playing of the whole work.

Honegger begins his symphony, holds it throughout, in fact, in brilliant rhythmic values. Indeed the first movement is distinctly and solely, in my opinion, a study of rhythm. Dissonance so abounds as to make one doubtful ever again of reaching the quiet Harbor of Harmony; the strident brass wanders at will, the woodwinds shriek, there is confusion not only confounded but even a shorter and an uglier word.

In the adagio there are hints of the pipes, but not the pipes of peace. There is excellent symphonic structure here, doubtless,—for there is no gainsaying the composer's skill—but one trembles to think how close to madness the whole thing would lie were the music to be played by anything but a band of artists under masterly control.

In an adagio movement the hearer, because of long association with the name, seeks beauty. And here and there, in scattered measures of this symphony there are traces of the beauty that older music-lovers knew; but the dissonances predominate, and the final presto comes on with a rush and a sweep of clatter always rythmic but almost terrible save in other few, scattered, measures. And then the beauty of the changed mood, the going backward perhaps, some people might call it in the age of music but upward, nevertheless, to the climax.

The Koussevitzky reading of the Wagner numbers—"The Ride of the Valkyries" and the "Lohengrin" prelude—are well known to all music-lovers. There is a rush and a sweep in the first of tremendous power. One feels motion in the broadcast sense; the picture that the music paints for the mind transcends any that the stage can give, even with the music. it seems to me—granting the reading of the scores in the brilliance of the advanced tempo that Koussevitzky uses for concert purposes. It is no human or even god-like horsemanship that one sees; there is no sound of real hoofes in mad flight that one hears. All is of the imagination; yet all is made real in the power of the music given out in just the right measure of the imagination. And the climax in the tumult of the full orchestra is of effectiveness almost appalling.

Then the Prelude, exquisitely dreamy in the tones of the subdued strings, rising in its great crescendo and then dying away to the murmur of its beginnings—and here again was wonderful playing, by masters of their instruments under a master of them all.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes" followed the Wagner numbers and, brilliant and interesting and brilliantly played as it was, it suffered in contrast with its predecessors. Dr. Koussevitzky is a great program-maker but I cannot help thinking that he would have built up a greater cumulative effect for the second part of his New Haven program had he elected to play the Rimsky-Korsakoff pieces directly after the intermission with the "Lohengrin" and "Walkeure" numbers to follow.

But what a concert that was in New Haven Wednesday night!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

MAR 6 1931

T[O]NIGHT

to Hear Tonight

LECTIONS IN THIS TIME TABLE

Time	Station	Time	Station
8:30		10:15
8:45		10:30
9:00		10:45
9:15		11:00
9:30		11:15
9:45		11:30
10:00		11:45

usual Events

r Walker. WOR, 422 meters;

under the pitiless sun of July.

Mr. Stravinsky, who was born near Leningrad, lives in Nice, and makes music without a country, wrote his symphony of psalms in 1930 "to the glory of God" and dedicated it to the Bostonians. It is a choral work, calling into service last night the Schola Cantorum, and consists of settings of three excerpts from the Book of Psalms presented in the text of the Latin Vulgate. The scoring is characteristic; it calls for numerous wind instruments, two pianos, harp, cellos and basses. The violins and violas of the conventional orchestra are omitted.

Stravinsky has adventured into many musical territories and has evolved several styles. It may be that, like Solomon, he has begun to have qualms and possibly like Solomon, he therefore writes psalms. Yet whatever else may be said about his wanderings from "The Fire Bird" to the "Sacred du Printemps," back to Bach and forward again to "Exaudi orationem meam, Domine" and "Alleluia," it is clear that at bottom his musical credo has never materially altered. One heard him again last night sounding strange polyphonies with wind instruments, challenging the ear with strident staccato chords and weaving his spells with the magic of conflicting keys. Abrupt contrasts of forte and piano were not wanting nor melodic fragments seemingly intruded for the sole purpose of becoming lost in the tonal jungle.

Nevertheless there remained the final conviction that a mind possessed of authority and a hand trained to high skill had been at work. Some of the choral writing was striking in its effectiveness and it had a firmness of texture evoking admiration. The departure from the conventional treatment of the old exclamatory "Alleluia" was noteworthy. Stravinsky gave us a very tender setting in sustained tones sung piano. The close of the work was impressive. But it must be added that a searching examination of the composition cannot be attempted after a single hearing, which left this auditor uncertain whether there was something more or a great deal less than appeared on the surface. The music was very well done. The chorus of the Schola Cantorum discharged its difficult task with high honor.

About the Honegger symphony there need be less hesitation in utterance. The work is divided into allegro marcato, adagio and presto, the last concluding with a brief andante tranquillo. The opening movement is rudely and aggressively rhythmic, almost as much so as the celebrated "Pacific 231." One might be listening to the charge of heavy brigade;' but the horses do it better. The modernist is always in trouble when he writes an adagio. His abhorrence of the effete lyric line of the classicists and romanticists leaves him with little to work upon save broken ejaculations and harmonies sharper than a serpent's tooth.

In the finale Honegger abandoned much of the machinery of his guild and launched recklessly into a good old-fashioned scherzando in which he did pretty much everything from Beethoven to Rimsky-Korsakov, and then wound up with some antique sentiment of which even Joachim Raff might not have been ashamed. When Mr. Koussevitzky went on safari in the happy hunting grounds of European composition in search of fare for this fiftieth anniversary banquet, he naturally looked for big game among the new monsters of modern music; but what he exhibited to us last night appeared to be no more savage than the paint and feathers of a war dance.

The concert began with Handel's B minor concerto grosso for strings and ended with Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

MAR 6 - 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS NO WHOOPEE IN MODERN MUSIC

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

To celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its existence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is holding all kinds of tonal high jinks this season.

There have been festive celebrations in its home town; a Beethoven course given on tour; conductors invited from Europe to direct special concerts, and foreign composers commissioned to write honorary new works dedicated to the glory of the orchestral golden jubilee.

Two of those novelties were heard here last evening, when the jubilating Boston Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzy, gave a concert in its regular series at Carnegie Hall, and presented "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra and chorus, by Igor Stravinsky, and just a plain symphony, by Arthur Honegger.

Time was when we felt something of wicked curiosity and a twinge of fear at the prospect of encountering new works hot from the pens of the modernistic composers. However, those exciting days are past, and now we face the latest symphonic music pluckily and even a bit patronizingly.

Stravinsky's name is no longer whispered with awe; we have his number since he capitulated to the classics, crawled "back to Bach," to the Psalms and the Oedipus Rex. He gave up whoopee and went pious.

His "Symphonie de Psaumes" (Psalms) is in three movements (connected by orchestral interludes) the first presenting the text of the 13th and 14th verses of the 38th Psalm; the second employing the first four verses of the 39th Psalm; the third embracing the 90th Psalm. The latin text of the Vulgate is used. In the King James version, these Psalms are numbered 39th, 40th and 90th.

This Stravinsky score was composed in 1930, "To the Glory of God," and dedicated to the Boston Orchestra — a very flattering affiliation. The presence of a chorus in a symphony is no new departure; it was first introduced in his No. 9 by a talented fellow named Beethoven.

"Symphonie de Psaumes" is not a symphony at all, be it told. The reduced orchesta without violins and including two pianos) plays a lean role. The chief musical factor is the chorus. It sings in a good imitation of the ancient harmonic modes, and the instrumental accompaniment displays the same austerity. Economy of means and absence of color distinguish the composition from start to finish. There is more euphony in the vocal score than in the mildly modernistic orchestral part.

The glory of God, as expressed by this music, seems to be in Stravinsky's mind rather than in his art.

I know a dozen composers, in[clu]ding some Americans, who [are] able to tonalize such a sub[ject] with more exaltation and con[vin]cing religious fervor—and with more interesting music—than are evidenced in this "Psalms Symphony." It is vapid music. Far more compelling was Stravinsky when he had the courage of his own cacophony.

Honegger's symphony, also composed in 1930, has three movements. In this work one naturally looks for traces of the tonal realist who constructed those vivid tone-poems, "Pacific 231" and "Rugby." Instead, there was rigorous and relentless counterpoint, carried through logically at any and all costs, producing results clashes of harmony and the that seem to be Honegger's light, more than melodic peal or any surrender to sentiment.

The second movement with a semblance of romance, concession, but immediately followed again the com typical demonstrations of line and musical mathematics. This symphony is not the kind which the public will clamor to hear again.

In both the foregoing numbers, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with full devotion and his players acquitted themselves with chaste tone and faultless technic. The Schola Cantorum sang its Stravinsky measures, with their difficult intervals, most admirably.

Opening the program was Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 6, B minor, in which Mr. Koussevitzky permitted some of the suspensions to be blurred by unrelated harmonies that ran together. The closing number, Ravel's "La Valse," afforded the only moments of musical sensuousness during an evening that put amazingly slight demand upon the emotions of the listeners

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL

MAR 6 - 1931

Stravinsky's Psalms Symphony Heard At Premiere

By IRVING WEIL.

A new work of major proportions by Igor Stravinsky, without much question the outstanding composer of the day, unfailingly arouses the keenest curiosity. Carnegie Hall was accordingly packed last night, for Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra were giving a first performance in New York of the Russian's "Symphony of Psalms." It was received with apparently mixed feelings, although there was a good deal of hearty enough applause after it was finished.

The symphony was commissioned by the Boston Orchestra and is one of a number by numerous contemporaries so written forming a kind of festival of new music to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the band. The work was completed last Summer and is inscribed "To the Glory of God," with a dedication to Boston's orchestra.

At first thought is seems a bit strange that the man who wrote the utterly pagan and ruthless music of "The Rite of Spring" and the equally pagan and barbaric music of "The Marriage Rite" should suddenly have turned modern mystic. But, after listening to "The Symphony of Psalms," one finds Stravinsky's progression, or evolution, to be not at all so odd.

THIRD PHASE OF TRILOGY.

For this "Symphony of Psalms," although itself curiously repressed and impersonal in its mysticism, discloses a large touch of rhythmic barbarity and may well be regarded as the third phase of a trilogy which began with "The Rite of Spring." Here, as a fact, is really a sequence of mysticism, a triple dedication in music—first, to the rite of creation; next, to the rite of procreation, and lastly to the Creator of life itself.

In his latest work, Stravinsky has based his music on a choral treatment of parts of three of the Psalms, settings of the Latin texts of the Vulgate. These correspond, in the King James version, to Psalms 39, 40 and 150—the first the cry of the penitent to the Lord, the second his grateful peace upon the Lord's heed to his cry, and the last an Alleluia of praise. And these make up the three movements of the symphony.

Stravinsky's orchestra, for the instrumental substance that becomes part of what the chorus sings, is an orchestra with violins and violas left out. His purpose in this, one feels, is the obliteration from his work of the highly sensuous quality that the upper strings would inevitably have brought to it. He misprises their subjectively romantic implications.

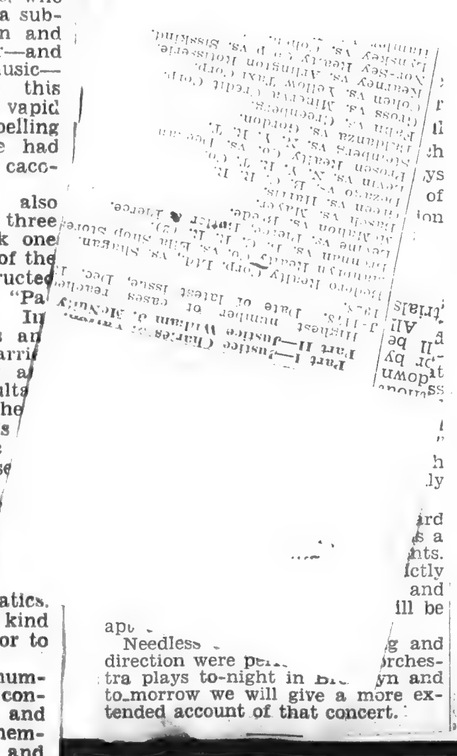
One believes, indeed, that his aim has been to evoke in his music something sub-human, so as to give the impression of the vastly remote spiritual distance that separates the penitent from his Creator. And he seeks to achieve this by making the expression of the penitent consistently impersonal. To such an extent he has strikingly succeeded.

LESS VIRILE.

Nonetheless, "The Symphony of Psalms" is far less virile and original music than either of its mystic predecessors. At times, in fact, it reveals a hand grown imitative and almost feeble; and at its best, during the rather laboriously built up mood of exaltation in the middle movement, Stravinsky merely begins rewriting the characteristic bludgeoning rhythm and polytonal harmonies of "The Rite of Spring."

The performance last night made one suspect that the symphony was often being haltingly unfolded. The chorus of the Schola Cantorum sang the vocal part but seemed to be not sure of its ground.

Mr. Koussevitzky also presented a first performance of Arthur Honegger's new symphony, likewise especially written for the Boston Orchestra, but this sounded as though the composer had got aboard his famous old locomotive, "Pacific, 231," for a second trip and this time didn't quite know where he wanted to go. The program additionally held a Handel concerto grosso and Maurice Ravel's "The Waltz."



Needless [to] say, the [Boston] orchestra plays to-night in Brooklyn and to-morrow we will give a more extended account of that concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAR 6 - 1931

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

Dr. Koussevitzky in New Haven.

Dr. Koussevitzky of Harvard and [the] chestra, [of] Yale [it], last [with] the [full] band [when] one [symphony] [a] good

[were], Ger[many] [remember] who [every] day [in] con[cert] all [has] been [pool] of . Well, [chanters] [every] eve[ning] Lee [to] scrape [all] to [me]; but [would] we [fully] by after [house] a [the] wife [Concert] at seat[ing] him to him; yours pleas[antly] un[der]

[Con]cert—[which] I [orchestra] though [introducing] as "a [piece] was [in] the [play] (in [at] the [prelude] [atmosphere] There brass [piece] was [dress] in [old]-odd figure

Beginning [with] the Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 12 Dr. Koussevitzky showed the quality of his string orchestra's tone in magnificent fulness and richness, with every touch of melody, every shade of the gay humors that abound in the work brought out at its best. Here was the the perfection of smoothness in string tone with a maximum of power when required by the reading —and smoothness and power do not always abide in harmony in the String family!

—

Then came the Honegger Symphony—composed in celebration of the orchestra's present, fiftieth, season; and though I am quite sure that some readers may feel that I am not a strict modernist in music I will admit that my going to the concert on that bad Wednesday evening was really based on a desire to hear that symphony. And I'm glad I heard it.

For Honegger, in a brief passage at the end of his work, has written music of surpassing loveliness—music that falls like a benediction, beautifully and sincerely pronounced at the close of a stormy, efficient discussion by men competent but unrefined, successfully up-to-date but wholly uninteresting. Frankly I do not know whether the composer was sticking his tongue in his cheek and saying to his admirers, "See me fool the old mossbacks now," or whether he had been calling his followers' attention to something to make them turn around so that he could give them a playful, though sincere, kick. But anyway, in those final measures, he has written measures that go back to the Age of Beauty. The audience Wednesday evening—that certainly had not been impressed with the first part of the symphony in so far as I could observe in my neighborhood—was liberal in applause, much of which was for the finale only as to enjoyment, but all of which must have recognized the artistry of the playing of the whole work.

—

Honegger begins his symphony, holds it throughout, in fact, in brilliant rhythmic values. Indeed the first movement is distinctly and solely, in my opinion, a study of rhythm. Dissonance so abounds as to make one doubtful ever again of reaching the quiet Harbor of Harmony; the strident brass wanders at will, the woodwinds shriek, there is confusion not only confounded but even a shorter and an uglier word.

In the adagio there are hints of the pipes, but not the pipes of peace. There is excellent symphonic structure here, doubtless,—for there is no gainsaying the composer's skill—but one trembles to think how close to madness the whole thing would lie were the music to be played by anything but a band of artists under masterly control.

In an adagio movement the hearer, because of long association with the name, seeks beauty. And here and there, in scattered measures of this symphony there are traces of the beauty that older music-lovers knew; but the dissonances predominate, and the final presto comes on with a rush and a sweep of clatter always rythmic but almost terrible save in other few, scattered, measures. And then the beauty of the changed mood, the going backward perhaps, some people might call it in the age of music but upward, nevertheless, to the climax.

—

The Koussevitzky reading of the Wagner numbers—"The Ride of the Valkyries" and the "Lohengrin" prelude—are well known to all music-lovers. There is a rush and a sweep in the first of tremendous power. One feels motion in the broadcast sense; the picture that the music paints for the mind transcends any that the stage can give, even with the music. it seems to me—granting the reading of the scores in the brilliance of the advanced tempo that Koussevitzky uses for concert purposes. It is no human or even god-like horsemanship that one sees; there is no sound of real hooves in mad flight that one hears. All is of the imagination; yet all is made real in the power of the music given out in just the right measure of the imagination. And the climax in the tumult of the full orchestra is of effectiveness almost appalling.

Then the Prelude, exquisitely dreamy in the tones of the subdued strings, rising in its great crescendo and then dying away to the murmur of its beginnings—and here again was wonderful playing, by masters of their instruments under a master of them all.

—

The Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes" followed the Wagner numbers and, brilliant and interesting and brilliantly played as it was, it suffered in contrast with its predecessors. Dr. Koussevitzky is a great program-maker but I cannot help thinking that he would have built up a greater cumulative effect for the second part of his New Haven program had he elected to play the Rimsky-Korsakoff pieces directly after the intermission with the "Lohengrin" and "Walkeure" numbers to follow.

But what a concert that was in New Haven Wednesday night!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
MAR 6 1931

TONIGHT

to Hear Tonight

LECTIONS IN THIS TIME TABLE

Time	Station	Time	Station
8:30		10:15
8:45		10:30
9:00		10:45
9:15		11:00
9:30		11:15
9:45		11:30
10:00		11:45

usual Events

r Walker. WOR, 422 meters;

under the pitiless sun of July.

Mr. Stravinsky, who was born near Leningrad, lives in Nice, and makes music without a country, wrote his symphony of psalms in 1930 "to the glory of God" and dedicated it to the Bostonians. It is a choral work, calling into service last night the Schola Cantorum, and consists of settings of three excerpts from the Book of Psalms presented in the text of the Latin Vulgate. The scoring is characteristic; it calls for numerous wind instruments, two pianos, harp, cellos and basses. The violins and violas of the conventional orchestra are omitted.

Stravinsky has adventured into many musical territories and has evolved several styles. It may be that, like Solomon, he has begun to have qualms and possibly like Solomon, he therefore writes psalms. Yet whatever else may be said about his wanderings from "The Fire Bird" to the "Sacred du Printemps," back to Bach and forward again to "Exaudi orationem meam, Domine" and "Alleluia," it is clear that at bottom his musical credo has never materially altered. One heard him again last night sounding strange polyphonies with wind instruments, challenging the ear with strident staccato chords and weaving his spells with the magic of conflicting keys. Abrupt contrasts of forte and piano were not wanting nor melodic fragments seemingly intruded for the sole purpose of becoming lost in the tonal jungle.

Nevertheless there remained the final conviction that a mind possessed of authority and a hand trained to high skill had been at work. Some of the choral writing was striking in its effectiveness and it had a firmness of texture evoking admiration. The departure from the conventional treatment of the old exclamatory "Alleluia" was noteworthy. Stravinsky gave us a very tender setting in sustained tones sung piano. The close of the work was impressive. But it must be added that a searching examination of the composition cannot be attempted after a single hearing, which left this auditor uncertain whether there was something more or a great deal less than appeared on the surface. The music was very well done. The chorus of the Schola Cantorum discharged its difficult task with high honor.

About the Honegger symphony there need be less hesitation in utterance. The work is divided into allegro marcato, adagio and presto, the last concluding with a brief andante tranquillo. The opening movement is rudely and aggressively rhythmic, almost as much so as the celebrated "Pacific 231." One might be listening to the charge of heavy brigade;' but the horses do it better. The modernist is always in trouble when he writes an adagio. His abhorrence of the effete lyric line of the classicists and romanticists leaves him with little to work upon save broken ejaculations and harmonies sharper than a serpent's tooth.

In the finale Honegger abandoned much of the machinery of his guild and launched recklessly into a good old-fashioned scherzando in which he did pretty much everything from Beethoven to Rimsky-Korsakov, and then wound up with some antique sentiment of which even Joachim Raff might not have been ashamed. When Mr. Koussevitzky went on safari in the happy hunting grounds of European composition in search of fare for this fiftieth anniversary banquet, he naturally looked for big game among the new monsters of modern music; but what he exhibited to us last night appeared to be no more savage than the paint and feathers of a war dance.

The concert began with Handel's B minor concerto grosso for strings and ended with Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
MAR 6 - 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS NO WHOOPEE IN MODERN MUSIC

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

To celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its existence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is holding all kinds of tonal high jinks this season.

There have been festive celebrations in its home town; Beethoven course given on tour; conductors invited from Europe to direct special concerts, and foreign composers commissioned to write honorary new works dedicated to the glory of the orchestral golden jubilee.

Two of those novelties were heard here last evening, when the jubilating Boston Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzy, gave a concert in its regular series at Carnegie Hall, and presented "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra and chorus, by Igor Stravinsky, and just a plain symphony, by Arthur Honegger.

Time was when we felt something of wicked curiosity and a twinge of fear at the prospect of encountering new works from the pens of the modernistic composers. However those exciting days are past and now we face the latest symphonic music pluckily and even a bit patronizingly.

Stravinsky's name is no longer whispered with awe; we have his number since he capitulated to the classics, crawled "back to Bach," to the Psalms and the Oedipus Rex. He gave up whoopee and went pious.

His "Symphonie de Psaumes" (Psalms) is in three movements (connected by orchestral interludes) the first presenting the text of the 13th and 14th verses of the 38th Psalm; the second employing the first four verses of the 39th Psalm; the third embracing the 90th Psalm. The latin text of the Vulgate is used. In the King James version, these Psalms are numbered 39th, 40th and 90th.

This Stravinsky score was composed in 1930, "To the Glory of God," and dedicated to the Boston Orchestra — a very flattering affiliation. The presence of a chorus in a symphony is no new departure; it was first introduced in his No. 9 by a talented fellow named Beethoven.

"Symphonie de Psaumes" is not a symphony at all, be it told. The reduced orchesta without violins and including two pianos) plays a lean role. The chief musical factor is the chorus. It sings in a good imitation of the ancient harmonic modes, and the instrumental accompaniment displays the same austerity. Economy of means and absence of color distinguish the composition from start to finish. There is more euphony in the vocal score than in the mildly modernistic orchestral part.

The glory of God, as expressed by this music, seems to be in Stravinsky's mind rather than in his art.

I know a dozen composers, in[illegible] some Americans, who [illegible] to tonalize such a subject with more exaltation and convincing religious fervor—and with more interesting music—than are evidenced in this "Psalms Symphony." It is vapid music. Far more compelling was Stravinsky when he had the courage of his own cacophony.

Honegger's symphony, also composed in 1930, has three movements. In this work one naturally looks for traces of the tonal realist who constructed those vivid tone-poems, "Pacific 231" and "Rugby." Instead, there was rigorous and relentless counterpoint, carried through logically at any and all costs, producing results of clashes of harmony and the that seem to be Honegger's light, more than melodic peal or any surrender to sentiment.

The second movement [illegible] with a semblance of romantic concession, but immediately followed again the complex typical demonstrations of line and musical mathematics. This symphony is not the kind which the public will clamor to hear again.

In both the foregoing numbers, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with full devotion and his players acquitted themselves with chaste tone and faultless technic. The Schola Cantorum sang its Stravinsky measures, with their difficult intervals, most admirably.

Opening the program was Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 6, B minor, in which Mr. Koussevitzky permitted some of the suspensions to be blurred by unrelated harmonies that ran together. The closing number, Ravel's "La Valse," afforded the only moments of musical sensuousness during an evening that put amazingly slight demand upon the emotions of the listeners

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL
MAR 6 - 1931

although itself curiously rep[illegible] and impersonal in its mysticism, discloses a large touch of rhythmic barbarity and may well be regarded as the third phase of a trilogy which began with "The Rite of Spring." Here, as a fact, is really a sequence of mysticism, a triple dedication in music—first, to the rite of creation; next, to the rite of procreation, and lastly to the Creator of life itself.

In his latest work, Stravinsky has based his music on a choral treatment of parts of three of the Psalms, settings of the Latin texts of the Vulgate. These correspond, in the King James version, to Psalms 39, 40 and 150—the first the cry of the penitent to the Lord, the second his grateful peace upon the Lord's heed to his cry, and the last an Alleluia of praise. And these make up the three movements of the symphony.

Stravinsky's orchestra, for the instrumental substance that becomes part of what the chorus sings, is an orchestra with violins and violas left out. His purpose in this, one feels, is the obliteration from his work of the highly

Needless [illegible] and direction were pe[illegible] orchestra plays to-night in Br[illegible]yn and to-morrow we will give a more extended account of that concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 6 - 1931

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

Dr. Koussevitzky in New Haven.

Dr. Koussevitzky of Harvard and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stopped off at New Haven, of Yale and the State of Connecticut, last Wednesday evening and, with the able support of his wonderful band of artists, gave said New Haven one of the most brilliant of symphony concerts that it has been my good fortune to attend.

Patrons of Parsons's—there were such people, once upon a time, Geraldine, long, long ago,—will remember Manager Lee of the theater who came up from New Haven every day for part of a season and then concluded he liked to remain there all the time, and since then has been the manager of the Yale School of Music concerts in Woolsey Hall. Well, when a couple of us Couranters reached New Haven Wednesday evening for the concert, Manager Lee had to get carpenters in to scrape off the inside walls of the hall to make room for two more people; but he managed it somehow and we heard the concert. Incidentally, by the way, I got a very good seat after there weren't any more, because a kindly young music-lover, whose wife was unable to come to the concert at the last minute, gave his extra seat-check to an usher and told him to send someone to sit down with him; which someone eventuated into yours very truly; and I had a very pleasant musical evening with my unknown host.

—

But to get back to the concert—and it was a concert to which I would gladly return,—the orchestra was in magnificent form although the weather outside was producing what is so often referred to as "a bad night for strings"; and there was only one small tonal lapse in the whole program, which certainly (in the case of a final harmonic at the close of the "Lohengrin" Prelude) could be charged to the atmosphere and not to an artist-violinist. There was loveliest work of wood and brass and strings but above all there was that feeling of absolute oneness in everything between the hundred-odd players and that one dynamic figure on the director's platform.

—

Beginning with the Handel Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 12 Dr. Koussevitzky showed the quality of his string orchestra's tone in magnificent fulness and richness, with every touch of melody, every shade of the gay humors that abound in the work brought out at its best. Here was the the perfection of smoothness in string tone with a maximum of power when required by the reading—and smoothness and power do not always abide in harmony in the String family!

—

Then came the Honegger Symphony—composed in celebration of the orchestra's present, fiftieth, season; and though I am quite sure that some readers may feel that I am not a strict modernist in music I will admit that my going to the concert on that bad Wednesday evening was really based on a desire to hear that symphony. And I'm glad I heard it.

For Honegger, in a brief passage at the end of his work, has written music of surpassing loveliness—music that falls like a benediction, beautifully and sincerely pronounced at the close of a stormy, efficient discussion by men competent but unrefined, successfully up-to-date but wholly uninteresting. Frankly I do not know whether the composer was sticking his tongue in his cheek and saying to his admirers, "See me fool the old mossbacks now," or whether he had been calling his followers' attention to something to make them turn around so that he could give them a playful, though sincere, kick. But anyway, in those final measures, he has written measures that go back to the Age of Beauty. The audience Wednesday evening—that certainly had not been impressed with the first part of the symphony in so far as I could observe in my neighborhood—was liberal in applause, much of which was for the finale only as to enjoyment, but all of which must have recognized the artistry of the playing of the whole work.

—

Honegger begins his symphony, holds it throughout, in fact, in brilliant rhythmic values. Indeed the first movement is distinctly and solely, in my opinion, a study of rhythm. Dissonance so abounds as to make one doubtful ever again of reaching the quiet Harbor of Harmony; the strident brass wanders at will, the woodwinds shriek, there is confusion not only confounded but even a shorter and an uglier word.

In the adagio there are hints of the pipes, but not the pipes of peace. There is excellent symphonic structure here, doubtless,—for there is no gainsaying the composer's skill—but one trembles to think how close to madness the whole thing would lie were the music to be played by anything but a band of artists under masterly control.

In an adagio movement the hearer, because of long association with the name, seeks beauty. And here and there, in scattered measures of this symphony there are traces of the beauty that older music-lovers knew; but the dissonances predominate, and the final presto comes on with a rush and a sweep of clatter always rythmic but almost terrible save in other few, scattered, measures. And then the beauty of the changed mood, the going backward perhaps, some people might call it in the age of music but upward, nevertheless, to the climax.

—

The Koussevitzky reading of the Wagner numbers—"The Ride of the Valkyries" and the "Lohengrin" prelude—are well known to all music-lovers. There is a rush and a sweep in the first of tremendous power. One feels motion in the broadcast sense; the picture that the music paints for the mind transcends any that the stage can give, even with the music, it seems to me—granting the reading of the scores in the brilliance of the advanced tempo that Koussevitzky uses for concert purposes. It is no human or even god-like horsemanship that one sees; there is no sound of real hooves in mad flight that one hears. All is of the imagination; yet all is made real in the power of the music given out in just the right measure of the imagination. And the climax in the tumult of the full orchestra is of effectiveness almost appalling.

Then the Prelude, exquisitely dreary in the tones of the subdued strings, rising in its great crescendo and then dying away to the murmur of its beginnings—and here again was wonderful playing, by masters of their instruments under a master of them all.

—

The Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes" followed the Wagner numbers and, brilliant and interesting and brilliantly played as it was, it suffered in contrast with its predecessors. Dr. Koussevitzky is a great program-maker but I cannot help thinking that he would have built up a greater cumulative effect for the second part of his New Haven program had he elected to play the Rimsky-Korsakoff pieces directly after the intermission with the "Lohengrin" and "Walkeure" numbers to follow.

But what a concert that was in New Haven Wednesday night!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 7 - 1931

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra chose to exhibit themselves at the Academy of Music last evening in just about as altogether enjoyable a concert as music-loving Brooklynites might wish to hear. It was their fourth appearance here this season and, in devoting one-half of the program to the too seldom heard Sibelius, they offered last night's large audience something for which it was very obviously grateful.

"Finlandia," the contemporary Finn's symphonic poem (Op. 26, No. 7), and his Symphony No. 7 (Op. 105) provided media through which the orchestra's pre-eminent virtues were brought into striking and brilliant evidence. The brass choirs and string figurations frequently appearing in both scores were outstanding examples of perfection in the performance. The symphony is rather strangely constructed in having, primarily, no key designation, opening in A minor and ending in C major. Its oddness is extended through a somewhat peripatetic journey from one key to another until it meets an abrupt conclusion on a curiously suspended C major tonic chord. Even after many hearings it is difficult to become accustomed to or agree upon the merits of so anti-climactic and clumsy a finish to a work of such surpassing general excellence.

The second group furnished opportunity for the forming of contrasting opinions of Mr. Koussevitzky. It contained one of his favorites. Debussy's Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun." Mr. Koussevitzky makes of the Frenchman's fabulous faun a fairy tale animal, with eyes of an odalisque, who sleeps benignly and peacefully. The picture of its awakening is conveyed by an imputation of sprightliness, but the conductor preserves through sheerness and gossamer weavings the veil of mysticism under which the faun endeavors to comprehend the unreality of its dreams. Mr. Koussevitzky adeptly defines the subtle shading and fineness of outline so essential to the interpretation of this musical myth.

But the Prelude and Finale from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" is what we have to complain of. The gigantic climax toward which the Prelude builds from the very first strain was approached almost lethargically. We felt all through it a tenseness and inwardly urged the conductor on to increased forcefulness. But the graded crescendi were too long delayed and the climax, as well as the second one in the Liebestod, fell far short of anything like puissance. Mr. Koussevitzky's Wagner was the one disappointment of last night's concert.

Ravel's "La Valse," repeated from the program given by the orchestra Thursday in Manhattan, completed the performance.

B. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 7 1931

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, paid its fourth visit of the season to New York this week, giving a concert in Carnegie hall Thursday evening. Another concert is being given this afternoon. Three numbers new to New York audiences are on the program. Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus is on both the Thursday and Saturday programs. The Schola Cantorum is co-operating in the presentation of this unique work. This work was given in Boston recently on the occasion of the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the orchestra. Another new number given Tursday evening was a "Symphony" by Arthur Honneger. Another novelty, given only this afternoon, is "Second Symphony" by Edward Burlingame Hill, who is a professor of music at Harvard university.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 7 1931

Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Amy Evans, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone, have been engaged to assist the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Bach festival to be held in that city, beginning on March 22.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
MAR 7 - 1931

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

DR. Serge Koussevitzky selected a programme of atonal and cacaphonic music for his fourth and penultimate concert of the season in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music last night, a programme that showed to the very best advantage the excellencies of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but that left unsatisfied many a soul that yearns for melody and beauty.

There may be something in this new music that commends it to certain classes of people over the old-fashioned idea of music that lays stress on beauty, that soothes and stimulates and excites, but we have not yet been won over to the cult. There is not, to our way of thinking, any substitute for beauty and charm. After a programme, for example, like that Mr. Toscanini is presenting during the current week, a modernistic programme has no meaning for us. Possibly we are all wrong; that is the way critics used to talk about Wagner.

Dr. Koussevitzky presented two Sibelius numbers, the first the "Finlandia" tone-poem, the one (to us) bright spot in the evening's concert. There most certainly is beauty and dignity and even majesty in this song of praise for his native country, and it was played exquisitely. But there followed the Symphony No. 7, in one movement, which, despite certain moments of colossal beauty is mainly an arid waste. We hesitate to admit it, but it was a bore.

The magnificent "Liebestod" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" is one of the world's greatest pieces of music, but again, in our opinion, it is marred by the over-long and the arid prelude that destroys all the enjoyment of the beauty that follows it. The final numbers were again strictly modernistic, the prelude to Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," which, in our opinion, is plain crazy, and Ravel's interesting "La Valse."

This last, played in perfect waltz time, is one of the most curious pieces of music we know. Somehow or other it seems to suggest melody and beauty, and never quite attains it. It may be described in this way: Take a necktie of beautiful pattern and attractive colors and turn it inside out. The pattern is there, and so are the colors, but you can't quite see yourself wearing that necktie inside out. That's the way Ravel's "La Valse" affected us. Why not write straightforwardly, instead of inside out?

The playing of the orchestra, of course, approached perfection. The usual large audience was enthusiastic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 8 - 1931

MUSIC

Stravinsky Symphony Repeated.

By OLIN DOWNES.

When Igor Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" was performed for the first time in New York last Thursday night by Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and singers from the Schola Cantorum, it gained a much warmer reception than other late works of this composer.

Wisely Mr. Koussevitzky repeated the "Symphonie" at the Boston Symphony concert given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and the response was warmer than at the first performance. A second hearing of the "Symphonie de Psaumes" reverses in a considerable measure the estimate this writer held of Stravinsky's present stage as a composer. The emptiness and apparent insincerity of the late Stravinsky have again and again repelled him, and nothing seemed more empty, futile and labored than the Capriccio for piano and orchestra, played with the aid of Jesus Sanroma, pianist, at a previous visit of the Boston Symphony to this city. The "Symphony of Psalms," however, impresses first of all by its sincerity. It is evident that the composer is deeply in earnest, that he has sought a special simplicity and primitive accent in this score with, for once, truly significant results.

The first of the Psalms is for us the most beautiful and most sustained in its flight. The second is a harder nut to crack at an early acquaintance, and we are not as confident of its value. The third Psalm (Psalm CL) ends superbly, although the choral parts are not devoid in certain measures of an approach to sentimentalism and conventionality. The ending is very impressive, and the link is evident between this music and that of "Sacre du printemps," in spite of the fact that as concerns subject-matter the two works are so far apart, and likewise far part in idiom. This leads to the hope that Stravinsky has not left his genuinely creative period behind him. The performance of the "Symphonie" was again of the very first quality.

Stravinsky's work was followed by Edward Burlingame Hill's symphony, a work well and pleasantly composed, bearing out truthfully the author's profession of a composition owing nothing to any source, poetical or dramatic, outside the art of music itself. This is genuinely a symphony which resolves itself into architecture of tone and impresses solely by its form and its tonal beauties. The last two of the four movements of the symphony are at first hearing the strongest. Modern harmonic tendencies, in chords of somewhat acidulous elements and polyharmonic effects are present, but the achievement of the symphony is its unstudied frankness and honesty of purpose. Mr. Hill was called to the platform to acknowledge with Mr. Koussevitzsky the applause of his symphony. A glittering and very brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Rhapsody" ended the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
MAR 8 - 1931

ony lere tzky mposer ved at Concert Sings
tra in Music ns ting the yesterday on con-
gie Hall,

...pecially for a rehearing of Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" and for a first New York hearing of Edward Burlingame Hill's second symphony, in C major, which had had its world premiere in Boston on February 27. Dr. Koussevitzky prefaced those works of the present decade with Handel's concerto grosso in G minor, Op. 6, No. 6, and closed he program with Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice.

A praiseworthy feature of Dr. Koussevitzky's Boston program making has always been the attention which he has paid to the local group of American composers, those who live in Boston or in the neighborhood. Professor Hill, who has long been a member of Harvard University's music department, is one of the foremost of these, a thorough musician, well acquainted with symphonic forms and with the symphony orchestra.

As in the case of his first symphony, which was introduced here by the Boston Symphony three years ago, Professor Hill has limited himself to a concise analytic note on the work, appending no quotations and disclaiming any descriptive background. And, as he implies, his second symphony is absolute music.

In many ways this symphony is an admirable work. Its musical ideas, indeed, do not soar to Brahmsian or Wagnerian heights, but the work merits a place well toward the front among the new music heard here in recent years, and deserves further hearing. Professor Hill's themes are well defined and ably handled, with the not common merit of conciseness. There is a considerable, if not an invariably prevalent imaginative appeal. In style the symphony, like its predecessor, is mainly conservative, although with moments, here and there, of latter-day harmonies, and, especially in the first movement and the graceful scherzo, indicates a more marked disclosure of musical homogeneity and individuality. In the slow movement, the third of the four, a few Debussyesque touches are recognizable.

The work was well received and Professor Hill was called upon first to bow from his box an dthen to mount the stage. The Stravinsky symphony, as on Thursday, was received with relatively modern enthusiasm, but, like the American work, it received an excellent performance. Hugh Ross's Schola Cantorum singers profited by their further acquaintance with the provocative Stravinsky music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
MAR 8 - 1931

Edward Hill Symphony Shows Vast Originality

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

At the Carnegie Hall matinee yesterday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the chief feature of interest was a new symphony, C major, by Edward Burlingame Hill, American composer.

This is the second work in that form by Mr. Hill and he has succeeded in creating an opus of striking worth and a large measure of originality.

Although his musical education was conservative and even academic, Mr. Hill, now fifty-nine years old, has not been deaf to the modern voice in tonal expression (he even wrote a jazz concerto for two pianos), and his new symphony makes plenty of concession to modern tendencies in harmony and rhythmic variety.

The Hill themes are significant, their musical treatment is accomplished with skill, and the orchestration shows fine deftness as well as opulence in coloring. The symphony was warmly received.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, repeated from last Thursday's program here, Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 6, and Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," and as en extra contribution, added Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice."

The Stravinsky music impressed me again as empty, labored and renewed proof of the decline of a once fresh and daring talent of the modernistic order.

* * *

At Town Hall there was an afternoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and the chorus of the Schola Cantorum of New York provided a superb performance of the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL-POST
MAR 9 - 1931

MUSIC FANS GET TWO BIG EVENTS

Stravinsky's New "Symphony of Psalms" and Toscanini's Bruckner Concert Excel.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Incontestably, two of the big events of music in New York have occurred in these last days—Mr. Toscanini's leading with the Philharmonic-Symphony of Bruckner's seventh symphony, and the first local performances of Stravinsky's new "Symphony of Psalms," by the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Your reporter deems these events so important that he went to Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, and again yesterday afternoon, in the interest of the repetition of the works in question.

Voices have been raised protesting that Mr. Toscanini has taken a liberty with Bruckner without appearing to. They contend that he has mistakenly been too faithful to Bruckner's own metronomic instructions, which Bruckner naively marked wrongly.

The present writer feels by no means competent to pass judgment

...to them. To him Mr. Toscanini's reading was incomparably coherent and convincing, as well as of a matchless tonal splendor.

By the way, among Brucknerians, has anyone pointed out the similarity between the theme of the F major moderato in the adagio, supposedly dedicated to the memory of Richard Wagner, to the duet between courtesan and aesthete in the first act of Massenet's "Thais"? It is doubtless a mere coincidence, since Massenet was probably unacquainted with the scores of Bruckner.

Your reporter is persuaded that the Davidic symphony of the Russian composer is unmistakably his masterpiece, at least since the time of his writing "Petrouchka" and the "Consecration of the Spring," which date back eighteen years or more.

The first section, with the plea that sums up the pessimism of the Old Testament, "O spare me, that I may recover strength: before I go hence, and be no more," is noteworthy for its austerity, its undemonstrative simplicity.

The following section, "I waited patiently for the Lord, and he inclined unto me and heard my cry," is a marvel of quiet, restrained song.

The concluding "Alleluela" (Psalm CL), for all its jubilation, is a rejoicing within the secrecy of one's soul.

Stravinsky's attitude toward these texts, his feeling for them, are unique and engrossing, and the orchestral coloring, without aid of violins and violas, once more proves him to be unsurpassed master of instrumentation.

Mr. Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony [illegible], and the chorus of the Schola Cantorum of New York provided a superb performance of the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL
MAR 9 - 1931

Koussevitzky Gives Native Symphony A Premiere

By IRVING WEIL.

The quantity of new music from across the Atlantic that Serge Koussevitzky has been sponsoring during the current season of the Boston Orchestra has not, apparently, made him deaf to the native product. Of all foreign conductors, he is indeed the most hospitable toward the work of Americans. At the latest visit of the Bostonians to Carnegie Hall, he produced the Second Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill for a New York premiere.

Professor Hill has for a number of years been a member of the music department of Harvard. Moreover, he is 58 years old. It was not surprising, therefore, that this C-major symphony of his should be found to be conservative in scheme and in means of expression. In fact, in his own brief notes on his own work he quite disarms criticism on this account by declaring that "I have kept to the traditional forms, thinking I had not had sufficient experience to experiment."

MUSIC HIS SOLE AIM.

The traditional forms are those usual to the four-movement symphony, with the customary announcement and development of appropriate thematic material. The composer has sought to create absolute music, evolved for its own sake alone, on a strictly musical basis—it has no story or symbolism and it seeks to evoke no psychological or other extra musical significance.

Possibly that is a little the trouble with it. For absolute music in these days must be enormously important as music in order to provoke any arresting concern in it. And it is naturally, therefore, much harder to write than any other sort. Any glib and facile youngster can—and quite too often does—devise an eccentric "program" to fit some equally eccentric instrumentation and grinding polytonal harmony to it. It is an engaging sincerity and courage that sticks to the traditions of absolute music.

And Professor Hill's symphony held these qualities, as well as a number of others. It was honest music and one could listen to it with interest as the exfoliation of a mind in which taste, judgment and orderly skill played their part. The music, to be sure, was somewhat downright at times and reminiscent at others (especially the professor's dash of modernist harmony), but it was, on the whole, well worth playing.

COMPOSER IN BOX.

The composer was present in one of the boxes and bowed to the applause which, however, continued for a time and he finally appeared on the stage to acknowledge it.

Mr. Koussevitzky repeated Igor Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," which gave one precisely the same impression at a second hearing that it had at the first, last Thursday—an impression that was set forth at length in this place at the time. Another Handel concerto grosso and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice Completed the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 7 - 1931

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra chose to exhibit themselves at the Academy of Music last evening in just about as altogether enjoyable a concert as music-loving Brooklynites might wish to hear. It was their fourth appearance here this season and, in devoting one-half of the program to the too seldom heard Sibelius, they offered last night's large audience something for which it was very obviously grateful.

"Finlandia," the contemporary Finn's symphonic poem (Op. 26, No. 7) and his Symphony No. 7 (Op. 105) provided media through which the orchestra's pre-eminent virtues were brought into striking and brilliant evidence. The brass choirs and string figurations frequently appearing in both scores were outstanding examples of perfection in the performance. The symphony is rather strangely constructed in having, primarily, no key designation, opening in A minor and ending in C major. Its oddness is extended through a somewhat peripatetic journey from one key to another until it meets an abrupt conclusion on a curiously suspended C major tonic chord. Even after many hearings it is difficult to become accustomed to or agree upon the merits of so anti-climactic and clumsy a finish to a work of such surpassing general excellence.

The second group furnished opportunity for the forming of contrasting opinions of Mr. Koussevitzky. It contained one of his favorites. Debussy's Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun." Mr. Koussevitzky makes of the Frenchman's fabulous faun a fairy tale animal, with eyes of an odalisque, who sleeps benignly and peacefully. The picture of its awakening is conveyed by an imputation of sprightliness, but the conductor preserves through sheerness and gossamer weavings the veil of mysticism under which the faun endeavors to comprehend the unreality of its dreams. Mr. Koussevitzky adeptly defines the subtle shading and fineness of outline so essential to the interpretation of this musical myth.

But the Prelude and Finale from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" is what we have to complain of. The gigantic climax toward which the Prelude builds from the very first strain was approached almost lethargically. We felt all through it a tenseness and inwardly urged the conductor on to increased forcefulness. But the graded crescendi were too long delayed and the climax, as well as the second one in the Liebestod, fell far short of anything like puissance. Mr. Koussevitzky's Wagner was the one disappointment of last night's concert.

Ravel's "La Valse," repeated from the program given by the orchestra Thursday in Manhattan, completed the performance. B. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 7 1931

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, paid its fourth visit of the season to New York this week, giving a concert in Carnegie hall Thursday evening. Another concert is being given this afternoon. Three numbers new to New York audiences are on the program. Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus is on both the Thursday and Saturday programs. The Schola Cantorum is co-operating in the presentation of this unique work. This work was given in Boston recently on the occasion of the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the orchestra. Another new number given Tursday evening was a "Symphony" by Arthur Honneger. Another novelty, given only this afternoon, is "Second Symphony" by Edward Burlingame Hill, who is a professor of music at Harvard university.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 7 1931

Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Amy Evans, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone, have been engaged to assist the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Bach festival to be held in that city, beginning on March 22.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

7 - 1931

brother of Regina and Geraldine Kearney, died yesterday at his home, 595 Tenth street. He was born in New York City fifty-two years ago and had been a resident of Brooklyn for many years. He was employed by the Brooklyn Union Gas Company for thirty-five years. He was president of the Brooklyn Diocesean Holy Name Society and a member of the Holy Name Society of the Church of St. Saviour. He was also a member of Brooklyn Lodge, 22. B. P. O. Elks and the C. B. L. The funeral will be held at 10:30 A. M. Monday with requiem mass at the Church of St. Saviour. Interment will be at Holy Cross Cemetery under direction of James L. Lynam's Sons, 503A Fourth avenue.

OTTO LANG died Friday in Greenpoint Hospital. He is survived by one son and three daughters, Mrs. Madaline Rummel, Elizabeth Madaia and Margaret Madaia. Funeral will take place on Tuesday at 9:30 A. M., with solemn requiem mass at the Church of St. Mary, corner of Leonard and Maujer streets. Interment will be at St. John's Cemetery under direction of [illegible] as the way critics used to talk about Wagner.

Dr. Koussevitzky presented two Sibelius numbers, the first the "Finlandia" tone-poem, the one (to us) bright spot in the evening's concert. There most certainly is beauty and dignity and even majesty in this song of praise for his native country, and it was played exquisitely. But there followed the Symphony No. 7, in one movement, which, despite certain moments of colossal beauty is mainly an arid waste. We hesitate to admit it, but it was a bore.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 8 - 1931

MUSIC

Stravinsky Symphony Repeated.

By OLIN DOWNES.

When Igor Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" was performed for the first time in New York last Thursday night by Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and singers from the Schola Cantorum, it gained a much warmer reception than other late works of this composer.

Wisely Mr. Koussevitzky repeated the "Symphonie" at the Boston Symphony concert given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and the response was warmer than at the first performance. A second hearing of the "Symphonie de Psaumes" reverses in a considerable measure the estimate this writer held of Stravinsky's present stage as a composer. The emptiness and apparent insincerity of the late Stravinsky have again and again repelled him, and nothing seemed more empty, futile and labored than the Capriccio for piano and orchestra, played with the aid of Jesus Sanroma, pianist, at a previous visit of the Boston Symphony to this city. The "Symphony of Psalms," however, impresses first of all by its sincerity. It is evident that the composer is deeply in earnest, that he has sought a special simplicity and primitive accent in this score with, for once, truly significant results.

The first of the Psalms is for us the most beautiful and most sustained in its flight. The second is a harder nut to crack at an early acquaintance, and we are not as confident of its value. The third Psalm (Psalm CL) ends superbly, although the choral parts are not devoid in certain measures of an approach to sentimentalism and conventionality. The ending is very impressive, and the link is evident between this music and that of "Sacre du printemps," in spite of the fact that as concerns subject-matter the two works are so far apart, and likewise far part in idiom. This leads to the hope that Stravinsky has not left his genuinely creative period behind him. The performance of the "Symphonie" was again of the very first quality.

Stravinsky's work was followed by Edward Burlingame Hill's symphony, a work well and pleasantly composed, bearing out truthfully the author's profession of a composition owing nothing to any source, poetical or dramatic, outside the art of music itself. This is genuinely a symphony which resolves itself into architecture of tone and impresses solely by its form and its tonal beauties. The last two of the four movements of the symphony are at first hearing the strongest. Modern harmonic tendencies, in chords of somewhat acidulous elements and polyharmonic effects are present, but the achievement of the symphony is its unstudied frankness and honesty of purpose. Mr. Hill was called to the platform to acknowledge with Mr. Koussevitzsky the applause of his symphony. A glittering and very brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Rhapsody" ended the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

MAR 8 - 1931

Hill Symphony Is Played Here By Koussevitzky

Work of Boston Composer Is Warmly Received at Carnegie Hall Concert

Schola Cantorum Sings

Heard With Orchestra in Stravinsky Psalm Music

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in its fourth Saturday afternoon concert of the season at Carnegie Hall, gave opportunity for a rehearing of Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" and for a first New York hearing of Edward Burlingame Hill's second symphony, in C major, which had had its world premiere in Boston on February 27. Dr. Koussevitzky prefaced those works of the present decade with Handel's concerto grosso in G minor, Op. 6, No. 6, and closed he program with Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice.

A praiseworthy feature of Dr. Koussevitzky's Boston program making has always been the attention which he has paid to the local group of American composers, those who live in Boston or in the neighborhood. Professor Hill, who has long been a member of Harvard University's music department, is one of the foremost of these: a thorough musician, well acquainted with symphonic forms and with the symphony orchestra.

As in the case of his first symphony, which was introduced here by the Boston Symphony three years ago, Professor Hill has limited himself to a concise analytic note on the work, appending no quotations and disclaiming any descriptive background. And, as he implies, his second symphony is absolute music.

In many ways this symphony is an admirable work. Its musical ideas, indeed, do not soar to Brahmsian or Wagnerian heights, but the work merits a place well toward the front among the new music heard here in recent years, and deserves further hearing. Professor Hill's themes are well defined and ably handled, with the not common merit of conciseness. There is a considerable, if not an invariably prevalent imaginative appeal. In style the symphony, like its predecessor, is mainly conservative, although with moments, here and there, of latter-day harmonies, and, especially in the first movement and the graceful scherzo, indicates a more marked disclosure of musical homogeneity and individuality. In the slow movement, the third of the four, a few Debussyesque touches are recognizable.

The work was well received and Professor Hill was called upon first to bow from his box an dthen to mount the stage. The Stravinsky symphony, as on Thursday, was received with relatively modern enthusiasm, but, like the American work, it received an excellent performance. Hugh Ross's Schola Cantorum singers profited by their further acquaintance with the provocative Stravinsky music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

MAR 8 - 1931

HOW [illegible] WILL NOT BE UN

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

At the Carnegie Hall matinee yesterday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the chief feature of interest was a new symphony, C major, by Edward Burlingame Hill, American composer.

This is the second work in that form by Mr. Hill and he has succeeded in creating an opus of striking worth and a large measure of originality.

Although his musical education was conservative and even academic, Mr. Hill, now fifty-nine years old, has not been deaf to the modern voice in tonal expression (he even wrote a jazz concerto for two pianos), and his new symphony makes plenty of concession to modern tendencies in harmony and rhythmic variety.

The Hill themes are significant, their musical treatment is accomplished with skill, and the orchestration shows fine deftness as well as opulence in coloring. The symphony was warmly received.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, repeated from last Thursday's program here, Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 6, and Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," and as en extra contribution, added Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice."

The Stravinsky music impressed me again as empty, labored and renewed proof of the decline of a once fresh and daring talent of the modernistic order.

* * *

At Town Hall there was an af-

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL-POST

NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 9 - 1931

MUSIC FANS GET TWO BIG EVENTS

Stravinsky's New "Symphony of Psalms" and Toscanini's Bruckner Concert Excel.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Incontestably, two of the big events of music in New York have occurred in these last days—Mr. Toscanini's leading with the Philharmonic-Symphony of Bruckner's seventh symphony, and the first local performances of Stravinsky's new "Symphony of Psalms," by the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Your reporter deems these events so important that he went to Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, and again yesterday afternoon, in the interest of the repetition of the works in question.

Voices have been raised protesting that Mr. Toscanini has taken a liberty with Bruckner without appearing to. They contend that he has mistakenly been too faithful to Bruckner's own metronomic instructions, which Bruckner naively marked wrongly.

The present writer feels by no means competent to pass judgment on that point. What he does feel is that Mr. Toscanini's tempi in certain passages of the first movement, and the last movement ironed out various difficulties, and imparted to those movements a sustained interest that no other conductor of his experience had been able to impart to them. To him Mr. Toscanini's reading was incomparably coherent and convincing, as well as of a matchless tonal splendor.

By the way, among Brucknerians, has anyone pointed out the similarity between the theme of the F major moderato in the adagio, supposedly dedicated to the memory of Richard Wagner, to the duet between courtesan and aesthete in the first act of Massenet's "Thais"? It is doubtless a mere coincidence, since Massenet was probably unacquainted with the scores of Bruckner.

Your reporter is persuaded that the Davidic symphony of the Russian composer is unmistakably his masterpiece, at least since the time of his writing "Petrouchka" and the "Consecration of the Spring," which date back eighteen years or more.

The first section, with the plea that sums up the pessimism of the Old Testament, "O spare me, that I may recover strength: before I go hence, and be no more," is noteworthy for its austerity, its undemonstrative simplicity.

The following section, "I waited patiently for the Lord, and he inclined unto me and heard my cry," is a marvel of quiet, restrained song.

The concluding "Allelueia" (Psalm CL), for all its jubilation, is a rejoicing within the secrecy of one's soul.

Stravinsky's attitude toward these texts, his feeling for them, are unique and engrossing, and the orchestral coloring, without aid of violins and violas, once more proves him to be unsurpassed master of instrumentation.

Mr. Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony [illegible], and the chorus of the Schola Cantorum of New York provided a superb performance of the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL

MAR 9 - 1931

Koussevitzky Gives Native Symphony A Premiere

By IRVING WEIL.

The quantity of new music from across the Atlantic that Serge Koussevitzky has been sponsoring during the current season of the Boston Orchestra has not, apparently, made him deaf to the native product. Of all foreign conductors, he is indeed the most hospitable toward the work of Americans. At the latest visit of the Bostonians to Carnegie Hall, he produced the Second Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill for a New York premiere.

Professor Hill has for a number of years been a member of the music department of Harvard. Moreover, he is 58 years old. It was not surprising, therefore, that this C-major symphony of his should be found to be conservative in scheme and in means of expression. In fact, in his own brief notes on his own work he quite disarms criticism on this account by declaring that "I have kept to the traditional forms, thinking I had not had sufficient experience to experiment."

MUSIC HIS SOLE AIM.

The traditional forms are those usual to the four-movement symphony, with the customary announcement and development of appropriate thematic material. The composer has sought to create absolute music, evolved for its own sake alone, on a strictly musical basis—it has no story or symbolism and it seeks to evoke no psychological or other extra musical significance.

Possibly that is a little the trouble with it. For absolute music in these days must be enormously important as music in order to provoke any arresting concern in it. And it is naturally, therefore, much harder to write than any other sort. Any glib and facile youngster can—and quite too often does—devise an eccentric "program" to fit some equally eccentric instrumentation and grinding polytonal harmony to it. It is an engaging sincerity and courage that sticks to the traditions of absolute music.

And Professor Hill's symphony held these qualities, as well as a number of others. It was honest music and one could listen to it with interest as the exfoliation of a mind in which taste, judgment and orderly skill played their part. The music, to be sure, was somewhat downright at times and reminiscent at others (especially the professor's dash of modernist harmony), but it was, on the whole, well worth playing.

COMPOSER IN BOX.

The composer was present in one of the boxes and bowed to the applause which, however, continued for a time and he finally appeared on the stage to acknowledge it.

Mr. Koussevitzky repeated Igor Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," which gave one precisely the same impression at a second hearing that it had at the first, last Thursday—an impression that was set forth at length in this place at the time. Another Handel concerto grosso and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice Completed the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 7 - 1931

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra chose to exhibit themselves at the Academy of Music last evening in just about as altogether enjoyable a concert as music-loving Brooklynites might wish to hear. It was their fourth appearance here this season and, in devoting one-half of the program to the too seldom heard Sibelius, they offered last night's large audience something for which it was very obviously grateful.

"Finlandia," the contemporary Finn's symphonic poem (Op. 26, No. 7), and his Symphony No. 7 (Op. 105) provided media through which the orchestra's pre-eminent virtues were brought into striking and brilliant evidence. The brass choirs and string figurations frequently appearing in both scores were outstanding examples of perfection in the performance. The symphony is rather strangely constructed in having, primarily, no key designation, opening in A minor and ending in C major. Its oddness is extended through a somewhat peripatetic journey from one key to another until it meets an abrupt conclusion on a curiously suspended C major tonic chord. Even after many hearings it is difficult to become accustomed to or agree upon the merits of so anti-climactic and clumsy a finish to a work of such surpassing general excellence.

The second group furnished opportunity for the forming of contrasting opinions of Mr. Koussevitzky. It contained one of his favorites. Debussy's Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun." Mr. Koussevitzky makes of the Frenchman's fabulous faun a fairy tale animal, with eyes of an odalisque, who sleeps benignly and peacefully. The picture of its awakening is conveyed by an imputation of sprightliness, but the conductor preserves through sheerness and gossamer weavings the veil of mysticism under which the faun endeavors to comprehend the unreality of its dreams. Mr. Koussevitzky adeptly defines the subtle shading and fineness of outline so essential to the interpretation of this musical myth.

But the Prelude and Finale from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" is what we have to complain of. The gigantic climax toward which the Prelude builds from the very first strain was approached almost lethargically. We felt all through it a tenseness and inwardly urged the conductor on to increased forcefulness. But the graded crescendi were too long delayed and the climax, as well as the second one in the Liebestod, fell far short of anything like puissance. Mr. Koussevitzky's Wagner was the one disappointment of last night's concert.

Ravel's "La Valse," repeated from the program given by the orchestra Thursday in Manhattan, completed the performance.

B. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 7 1931

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, paid its fourth visit of the season to New York this week, giving a concert in Carnegie hall Thursday evening. Another concert is being given this afternoon. Three numbers new to New York audiences are on the program. Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus is on both the Thursday and Saturday programs. The Schola Cantorum is co-operating in the presentation of this unique work. This work was given in Boston recently on the occasion of the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the orchestra. Another new number given Tursday evening was a "Symphony" by Arthur Honneger. Another novelty, given only this afternoon, is "Second Symphony" by Edward Burlingame Hill, who is a professor of music at Harvard university.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 7 1931

Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Amy Evans, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone, have been engaged to assist the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Bach festival to be held in that city, beginning on March 22.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
7 - 1931

brother of Regina and Geraldine Kearney, died yesterday at his home, 595 Tenth street. He was born in New York City fifty-two years ago and had been a resident of Brooklyn for many years. He was employed by the Brooklyn Union Gas Company for thirty-five years. He was president of the Brooklyn Diocesean Holy Name Society and a member of the Holy Name Society of the Church of St. Saviour. He was also a member of Brooklyn Lodge, 22, B. P. O. Elks and the C. B. L. The funeral will be held at 10:30 A. M. Monday with requiem mass at the Church of St. Saviour. Interment will be at Holy Cross Cemetery under direction of James L. Lynam's Sons, 503A Fourth avenue.

OTTO LANG died Friday in Greenpoint Hospital. He is survived by one son and three daughters, Mrs. Madaline Rummel, Elizabeth Madaia and Margaret Madaia. Funeral will take place on Tuesday at 9:30 A. M., with solemn requiem mass at the Church of St. Mary, corner of Leonard and Maujer streets. Interment will be at St. John's Cemetery under direction of [illegible] the way critics used to talk about Wagner.

Dr. Koussevitzky presented two Sibelius numbers, the first the "Finlandia" tone-poem, the one (to us) bright spot in the evening's concert. There most certainly is beauty and dignity and even majesty in this song of praise for his native country, and it was played exquisitely. But there followed the Symphony No. 7, in one movement, which, despite certain moments of colossal beauty is mainly an arid waste. We hesitate to admit it, but it was a bore.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 8 - 1931

MUSIC

Stravinsky Symphony Repeated.

By OLIN DOWNES.

When Igor Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" was performed for the first time in New York last Thursday night by Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and singers from the Schola Cantorum, it gained a much warmer reception than other late works of this composer.

Wisely Mr. Koussevitzky repeated the "Symphonie" at the Boston Symphony concert given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and the response was warmer than at the first performance. A second hearing of the "Symphonie de Psaumes" reverses in a considerable measure the estimate this writer held of Stravinsky's present stage as a composer. The emptiness and apparent insincerity of the late Stravinsky have again and again repelled him, and nothing seemed more empty, futile and labored than the Capriccio for piano and orchestra, played with the aid of Jesus Sanroma, pianist, at a previous visit of the Boston Symphony to this city. The "Symphony of Psalms," however, impresses first of all by its sincerity. It is evident that the composer is deeply in earnest, that he has sought a special simplicity and primitive accent in this score with, for once, truly significant results.

The first of the Psalms is for us the most beautiful and most sustained in its flight. The second is a harder nut to crack at an early acquaintance, and we are not as confident of its value. The third Psalm (Psalm CL) ends superbly, although the choral parts are not devoid in certain measures of an approach to sentimentalism and conventionality. The ending is very impressive, and the link is evident between this music and that of "Sacre du printemps," in spite of the fact that as concerns subject-matter the two works are so far apart, and likewise far part in idiom. This leads to the hope that Stravinsky has not left his genuinely creative period behind him. The performance of the "Symphonie" was again of the very first quality.

Stravinsky's work was followed by Edward Burlingame Hill's symphony, a work well and pleasantly composed, bearing out truthfully the author's profession of a composition owing nothing to any source, poetical or dramatic, outside the art of music itself. This is genuinely a symphony which resolves itself into architecture of tone and impresses solely by its form and its tonal beauties. The last two of the four movements of the symphony are at first hearing the strongest. Modern harmonic tendencies, in chords of somewhat acidulous elements and polyharmonic effects are present, but the achievement of the symphony is its unstudied frankness and honesty of purpose. Mr. Hill was called to the platform to acknowledge with Mr. Koussevitzky the applause of his symphony. A glittering and very brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Rhapsody" ended the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
MAR 8 - 1931

All Pledges Met By President, RepublicansSay

Vast Legislative Program Completed in Two Years, National Committee Says

Only Minor Bills Defeated

Review Points to Passage of Entire Relief Program

Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in its fourth Saturday afternoon concert of the season at Carnegie Hall, gave opportunity for a rehearing of Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" and for a first New York hearing of Edward Burlingame Hill's second symphony, in C major, which had had its world premiere in Boston on February 27. Dr. Koussevitzky prefaced those works of the present decade with Handel's concerto grosso in G minor, Op. 6, No. 6, and closed he program with Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice.

A praiseworthy feature of Dr. Koussevitzky's Boston program making has always been the attention which he has paid to the local group of American composers, those who live in Boston or in the neighborhood. Professor Hill, who has long been a member of Harvard University's music department, is one of the foremost of these; a thorough musician, well acquainted with symphonic forms and with the symphony orchestra.

As in the case of his first symphony, which was introduced here by the Boston Symphony three years ago, Professor Hill has limited himself to a concise analytic note on the work, appending no quotations and disclaiming any descriptive background. And, as he implies, his second symphony is absolute music.

In many ways this symphony is an admirable work. Its musical ideas, indeed, do not soar to Brahmsian or Wagnerian heights, but the work merits a place well toward the front among the new music heard here in recent years, and deserves further hear-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
MAR 8 - 1931

B[illegible]OW

WILL NOT BE UN

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

At the Carnegie Hall matinee yesterday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the chief feature of interest was a new symphony, C major, by Edward Burlingame Hill, American composer.

This is the second work in that form by Mr. Hill and he has succeeded in creating an opus of striking worth and a large measure of originality.

Although his musical education was conservative and even academic, Mr. Hill, now fifty-nine years old, has not been deaf to the modern voice in tonal expression (he even wrote a jazz concerto for two pianos), and his new symphony makes plenty of concession to modern tendencies in harmony and rhythmic variety.

The Hill themes are significant, their musical treatment is accomplished with skill, and the orchestration shows fine deftness as well as opulence in coloring. The symphony was warmly received.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, repeated from last Thursday's program here, Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 6, and Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," and as en extra contribution, added Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice."

The Stravinsky music impressed me again as empty, labored and renewed proof of the decline of a once fresh and daring talent of the modernistic order.

* * *

At Town Hall there was an af-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL-POST
MAR 8 - 1931

HERE AND THERE

A TEMPTING invitation has come to this department. It requests our presence at a Bach festival to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra on March 24, 25, 26, 27, 28 and 29. This festival is planned to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra and to honor Henry L. Higginson, its founder.

The program includes orchestral, choral and chamber music of Johann Sebastian Bach. Besides the orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzkly, the ensembles will be Harvard Glee club, Radcliffe Choral society and Bach Cantata club.

Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer, Richard Crooks, Fraser Gange, Alexander Borovsky, Mme. Patorni-Casadeus and Wallace Goodrich have been engaged as soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAR 9 - 1931

MUSIC FANS GET TWO BIG EVENTS

Stravinsky's New "Symphony of Psalms" and Toscanini's Bruckner Concert Excel.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Incontestably, two of the big events of music in New York have occurred in these last days—Mr. Toscanini's leading with the Philharmonic-Symphony of Bruckner's seventh symphony, and the first local performances of Stravinsky's new "Symphony of Psalms," by the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Your reporter deems these events so important that he went to Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, and again yesterday afternoon, in the interest of the repetition of the works in question.

Voices have been raised protesting that Mr. Toscanini has taken a liberty with Bruckner without appearing to. They contend that he has mistakenly been too faithful to Bruckner's own metronomic instructions, which Bruckner naively marked wrongly.

The present writer feels by no means competent to pass judgment on that point. What he does feel is that Mr. Toscanini's tempi in certain passages of the first movement, and the last movement ironed out various difficulties, and imparted to those movements a sustained interest that no other conductor of his experience had been able to impart to them. To him Mr. Toscanini's reading was incomparably coherent and convincing, as well as of a matchless tonal splendor.

By the way, among Brucknerians, has anyone pointed out the similarity between the theme of the F major moderato in the adagio, supposedly dedicated to the memory of Richard Wagner, to the duet between courtesan and aesthete in the first act of Massenet's "Thais"? It is doubtless a mere coincidence, since Massenet was probably unacquainted with the scores of Bruckner.

Your reporter is persuaded that the Davidic symphony of the Russian composer is unmistakably his masterpiece, at least since the time of his writing "Petrouchka" and the "Consecration of the Spring," which date back eighteen years or more.

The first section, with the plea that sums up the pessimism of the Old Testament, "O spare me, that I may recover strength: before I go hence, and be no more," is noteworthy for its austerity, its undemonstrative simplicity.

The following section, "I waited patiently for the Lord, and he inclined unto me and heard my cry," is a marvel of quiet, restrained song.

The concluding "Allelueia" (Psalm CL), for all its jubilation, is a rejoicing within the secrecy of one's soul.

Stravinsky's attitude toward these texts, his feeling for them, are unique and engrossing, and the orchestral coloring, without aid of violins and violas, once more proves him to be unsurpassed master of instrumentation.

Mr. Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony [illegible], and the chorus of the Schola Cantorum of New York provided a superb performance of the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL
MAR 9 - 1931

Koussevitzky Gives Native Symphony A Premiere

By IRVING WEIL.

The quantity of new music from across the Atlantic that Serge Koussevitzky has been sponsoring during the current season of the Boston Orchestra has not, apparently, made him deaf to the native product. Of all foreign conductors, he is indeed the most hospitable toward the work of Americans. At the latest visit of the Bostonians to Carnegie Hall, he produced the Second Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill for a New York premiere.

Professor Hill has for a number of years been a member of the music department of Harvard. Moreover, he is 58 years old. It was not surprising, therefore, that this C-major symphony of his should be found to be conservative in scheme and in means of expression. In fact, in his own brief notes on his own work he quite disarms criticism on this account by declaring that "I have kept to the traditional forms, thinking I had not had sufficient experience to experiment."

MUSIC HIS SOLE AIM.

The traditional forms are those usual to the four-movement symphony, with the customary announcement and development of appropriate thematic material. The composer has sought to create absolute music, evolved for its own sake alone, on a strictly musical basis—it has no story or symbolism and it seeks to evoke no psychological or other extra musical significance.

Possibly that is a little the trouble with it. For absolute music in these days must be enormously important as music in order to provoke any arresting concern in it. And it is naturally, therefore, much harder to write than any other sort. Any glib and facile youngster can—and quite too often does—devise an eccentric "program" to fit some equally eccentric instrumentation and grinding polytonal harmony to it. It is an engaging sincerity and courage that sticks to the traditions of absolute music.

And Professor Hill's symphony held these qualities, as well as a number of others. It was honest music and one could listen to it with interest as the exfoliation of a mind in which taste, judgment and orderly skill played their part. The music, to be sure, was somewhat downright at times and reminiscent at others (especially the professor's dash of modernist harmony), but it was, on the whole, well worth playing.

COMPOSER IN BOX.

The composer was present in one of the boxes and bowed to the applause which, however, continued for a time and he finally appeared on the stage to acknowledge it.

Mr. Koussevitzky repeated Igor Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," which gave one precisely the same impression at a second hearing that it had at the first, last Thursday—an impression that was set forth at length in this place at the time. Another Handel concerto grosso and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice Completed the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST
MAR 9 - 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

An American Symphony, a First-Time "Khovanchina" and the "St. John Passion" in Week-End Music

THE symphony, which once seemed threatened with extinction by the tone-poem but may now be regarded as in better standing with contemporaneous composers than the later form beloved of the Straussians, has never ceased to tempt American musicians. This has been true in spite of, or perhaps because of, their failure to create any work of the kind that has attained and held a place among symphonic works in any degree necessary to the conductors who face each season the problem of making programs for their audiences, here or abroad. Saturday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall brought to first hearing in New York a new Symphony in C major by Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard University, his second, which had its world premiere in Boston as recently as February 27.

An admirable performance by Mr. Koussevitzky's ensemble is to be recorded, together with the circumstance that the composer was present and acknowledged the very cordial applause. The symphony came to the ears as one of sturdy and homogeneous construction, spirited and clean-cut as to content. The thematic material did not pass in review the music of other masters. But it was to be doubted whether this material had any such saliency of beauty or charm as to make the symphony other than a praiseworthy example of what still may be done with the form. The work is conservative, direct, relatively concise; and clear, if somewhat unyielding, in its scoring.

This concert also afforded a welcome opportunity to hear Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" a second time, the chorus of the Schola Cantorum reappearing with Mr. Koussevitzky's forces. The first of the three movements, "Hear my prayer," seems, to us to exert a measure of emotional appeal not true of the second and third. At any rate, it is a ponderable opus, not to be dismissed as lightly as some of the Stravinsky veerings of recent years. The program also included a Handel Concerto Grosso (Op. 6, No. 8, G minor) and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol."

nobility of style the arias, "Betrachte meine Seel" and "Mein theuer Heiland." He seemed less sure of himself or of his music in "Eilt, ihr angefocht'nen Seelen," with its not very vocal "divisions."

Miss Hayden cared circumspectly for the soprano airs and Miss Telva met the requirements of the beautiful "Es ist vollbracht." Mr. Gridley succeeded to the narrative of the Evangelist, intrusted at former performances to George Meader. The great chorus, "Kreuzige," which has been inexplicably cut by Mr. Bodanzky in the past, was restored with telling effect.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 9 - 1931

A Music Editor

The fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now being celebrated, is also the thirtieth anniversary of the editorship of its program books by Mr. Philip Hale. All who know the excellences of the Orchestra are likewise familiar with the little pamphlets,—on the buff covers of which two cherubs have blown trumpets immemorially,—which too many concert goers leave in their seats. Connoisseurs of music long since learned that the booklets well repaid leisurely perusal in the quiet of the study, for into them Mr. Hale has poured the learning of a well-stocked mind.

One of those who, with James Gibbon Huneker, made the turn of the century a scintillant critical period, Mr. Hale is more than well equipped for the task which he has borne for thirty years. For the mere annotation of a score,—describing form, pointing out its themes, analysing its parts,—he has never been content. Such dry-as-dust matters he leaves chiefly to the pedants. While he concerns himself with data scarcely less significant. An inquisitive mind and a capacious memory enable him to put into his notes an astounding array of recondite knowledge concerning composers, performers and instruments. The confidences which Tchaikowsky poured out to his brother, Modeste, the cast which sung the first performance of "Tannheuser," the origin of the use of an obsolete instrument as the theorbo, how much Sir Henry Irving paid Handel and Johannes Brahms drank,—all go into his anecdotal comments and footnotes like plums in a pudding.

Those fortunate enough to possess bound files of the booklets,—which contain the program issued without listing a conductor for a performance in 1918, when Dr. Muck was hysterically whisked from the podium to become a prisoner at Fort Oglethorpe,—have something valuable. In honor and celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Orchestra, a wreath might well be tossed on the head of the editor of its program books, which are not merely a mine of estoteric information, but an agency of popular culture.

13

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
MAR 9 - 1931

Boston Orchestra Plays Hill Composition

The program of the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon consisted of Handel's concerto grosso in G minor, Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" which had been heard for the first time here on Thursday evening last, Edward Burlingame Hill's second symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish caprice. Mr. Hill's symphony, which is in the good old-fashioned key of C major, was performed for the first time in this city. The composition brought some comfort because it presented no problems. It had no program, no symbolism, no philosophy, no promulgations, no hidden meanings. It offered itself for consideration as music and nothing else.

Furthermore, it made no exploration into formal wildernesses, but in the first and last moments adhered to the classic sonata form. The trio of the scherzo, which is the second movement, is somewhat extended, but otherwise this is a scherzo a la mode. The composition is very well made. Mr. Hill's craftsmanship is beyond cavil. The entire work is gorgeous in its instrumental web, firm of texture and structurally quite able to stand up. The themes are sharply outlined and treated with skill. The developments are well conceived, and hence there is not a dull or padded page in the composition.

The listener feels, however, when the symphony has come to its end, that he has heard something which cost the creator much hard work. In spite of the resolute aggressiveness of some of the themes and the strenuous vivacity of others, one suspects that the composer was using the whip on Pegasus. This seemed especially to be the case with certain endings in which staccato chords and syncopated rhythms were served up in a magnificence of orchestration and a power of sound. The character of the bulk of the melodic matter of the work was somber in spite of the spirited movement, and of the gentle persuasion of poetic song there was no large measure. But at any rate the composition proved itself the work of a sincere writer with authority in the employment of his methods and above all else it revealed itself as healthy music, free from post-war posings, disillusionist attitudinizing, or fictitious realism. The audience was cordial, but not excited. Saturday afternoon concert audiences seldom are.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NATION
MAR 11 1931

Music

Stravinsky

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY has recently given us performances of the Stravinsky "Capriccio" and of the "Symphonie de Psaumes." They throw the strange history of this strangest of composers into vivid relief against the background of other contemporary composers whose works we have been hearing.

Sibelius, who has had a burst of recognition from all quarters this season, with performances of two symphonies, two symphonic poems, and a violin concerto; Loeffler, whose seventieth birthday was recently celebrated with performances of his "Pagan Poem" in New York, Boston, and Cleveland; Elgar and Bloch, represented on recent programs by an "Introduction and Allegro" and the "Schelomo" rhapsody, respectively—these are men who have been interested more in the perfection than in the originality of their idioms, who have grown naturally and non-violently out of the music of the past. Although none of them is a slavish imitator of his predecessors, none has been very deeply concerned with individualizing his style by technical innovation. These men are prophets or poets, in the same sense that their forerunners were. Their importance is personal rather than historical; it lies in the content of their music itself rather than in new roads of expression opened for followers to travel on.

Contrast them, then, with the portrait of Stravinsky as "a commercial genius, a kind of musical bank director," drawn by Leonid Sabaneyeff in his admirable book "Modern Russian Composers." "Stravinsky's fame," he writes, "is based not only on his musical gifts . . . but chiefly on his virtuosity in making full use of musical conditions and taking full account of fashions and fads, those two wavering and changing elements on which, nevertheless, fame in one's lifetime almost exclusively depends. . . . Stravinsky is immeasurably more a genius of musical business than purely of music." The old virtues, Sabaneyeff says with a bitterness not quite concealed, are out of date; épater les bourgeois has become the aim of the modern composer. And since Stravinsky has had unequaled success in startling the musical world into frightened admiration and imitation, he has become the most brilliant figure of our time. This is a very civilized way of crying "humbug," which is what many less brilliant critics than Sabaneyeff have been crying all along.

But is Stravinsky nothing but a splendid mountebank? It is not difficult, at any rate, to see how that impression arose. Early in his career (in 1911, and he is only in his forty-ninth year now) he had poked good-humored but devastating fun, in "Petrouchka," at most of the music that had preceded him. Two years later he shook the foundations of the musical world with "Le Sacre du Printemps," a work of the utmost imaginable rhythmic, harmonic, and orchestral radicalism. There followed a series of works that jumped from one tendency to another in bewildering and apparently aimless succession: "Les Noces," continuing the primitivism of the "Sacre"; "L'Histoire du Soldat," an acid miniature; the Sonata and the Concerto for piano, combining elements of jazz with a "return to Bach," a still acidulous combination; "Oedipus," an oratorio for male chorus and orchestra with soloists, borrowing liberally from Handel, Verdi, Wagner, and many others; "Le Baiser de la Fée," a ballet acknowledging Stravinsky's debt to Tschaikowsky, at the moment when the stock of that very romantic and unmodern master had fallen to its lowest point.

Through them all runs an uncanny talent for the unexpected. Through them all, though, I think, the skilful hand of this unique genius has been pretty clearly visible. And now it seems probable that his wanderings have brought him to something that can be understood and enjoyed even in the light of the traditions he once made such brilliant efforts to destroy. For in the light-hearted "Capriccio" the irony of parts of the Concerto seems completely abandoned. And the "Symphonie de Psaumes," inscribed (doubtless with something less than complete piety) "to the glory of God," seems at first hearing a sincere and moving work. Nor has Stravinsky's unique technical mastery apparently suffered while he has been off on his ironical pilgrimages.

As the distance that separates us from those once enigmatic works increases, I think there is little doubt that we shall be less and less concerned with the motives that inspired them. Beethoven, too, played practical jokes, but today we have to have them pointed out to us. Even when, driven by a need to shock his friends, or by who knows what Dostoevskian urge toward self-destruction, Stravinsky perhaps tried his hardest to conceal, even deform, his virtuosity, it was never successfully hidden. "Oedipus" (which the League of Composers will present in April) is the one work of Stravinsky with which I have not yet been able to feel any real contact; but I think no one could ever have attributed it to anyone else.

The significance of his music has for a long time been overshadowed by its audacity. But if, as seems probable, he has again arrived at the point where his music is as important intrinsically as historically, it cannot be long before what Sabaneyeff a trifle grudgingly admits, will be generally and freely recognized: "However one may evaluate Stravinsky's repeatedly and bizarrely changing style, he undoubtedly constitutes an era in musical art. . . . At present he is the most resplendent and significant figure of contemporary life."

ARTHUR MENDEL

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH
MAR 11 1931

By H. E. CHERRINGTON.

Boston Symphony to Be One of "Great Five"

Owing to the very substantial growth in membership of the Symphony club of central Ohio, it was inevitable that the concert series would be enlarged. The interesting announcement was made last night that, during the season commencing next October, five of the major symphony orchestras of the country will be heard in Columbus.

Especially interesting is the news that the Boston symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance in Columbus. A rare treat is anticipated in this engagement, since the Boston organization makes but very few appearances away from home.

The Cleveland orchestra will return, with Sokoloff again wielding the baton. The Detroit Symphony orchestra will be heard with Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The Cincinnati orchestra will return, with Eugene Goosens the newly appointed conductor who takes the place of Fritz Reiner; and the Chicago symphony orchestra will reappear with the veteran Frederick Stock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 12 193

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD
MAR 10 1931

AS TO PHILIP HALE

It remained for the Hartford Courant to suggest that while newspapers are commenting complimentarily on the current celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it would not be out of place to pay some attention to the synchronized thirtieth anniversary of Philip Hale's editorship of the very unusual program books of the orchestra.

"In the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra," says the Courant, a wreath might well be tossed on the head of the editor of its program books, which are not merely a mine of esoteric information but an agency of popular culture."

Or in lieu of such a transitory mark of approval as a wreath, may we suggest, how would it be if those who would pay tribute to the talented and genial musical critic of the Boston Herald, now that his years are so many that in the nature of things he cannot go on forever, were to take up a cause for which Mr. Hale has battled undespairingly though with little success for many, many years—shorter concert programs? It is a noble cause and perhaps one out of which might, in the course of time, come some measure of victory.

How many times more people might be brought to appreciation of high class music if concert programs were an hour long instead of nearly twice that duration nobody can tell, but probably several times more. But musicians cannot be persuaded that there can be too much of a good thing and even so authoritative a critic as Mr. Hale can't make a dent in their persistence in the long program. However, he has been almost alone in his war. If more music lovers were as candid as he in fighting for the well being of the audiences' nerves perhaps, some day, concert directors would get hep.

Also, may we add one more item to the Courant's tribute to Philip Hale. He is a man of extraordinary courage—the only one in New England, we dare say, who has the temerity to wear a Windsor tie and a derby hat at the same time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST
MAR 9 - 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

An American Symphony, a First-Time "Khovanchina" and the "St. John Passion" in Week-End Music

THE symphony, which once seemed threatened with extinction by the tone-poem but may now be regarded as in better standing with contemporaneous composers than the later form beloved of the Straussians, has never ceased to tempt American musicians. This has been true in spite of, or perhaps because of, their failure to create any work of the kind that has attained and held a place among symphonic works in any degree necessary to the conductors who face each season the problem of making programs for their audiences, here or abroad. Saturday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall brought to first hearing in New York a new Symphony in C major by Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard University, his second, which had its world premiere in Boston as recently as February 27.

An admirable performance by Mr. Koussevitzky's ensemble is to be recorded, together with the circumstance that the composer was present and acknowledged the very cordial applause. The symphony came to the ears as one of sturdy and homogeneous construction, spirited and clean-cut as to content. The thematic material did not pass in review the music of other masters. But it was to be doubted whether this material had any such saliency of beauty or charm as to make the symphony other than a praiseworthy example of what still may be done with the form. The work is conservative, direct, relatively concise; and clear, if somewhat unyielding, in its scoring.

This concert also afforded a welcome opportunity to hear Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" a second time, the chorus of the Schola Cantorum reappearing with Mr. Koussevitzky's forces. The first of the three movements, "Hear my prayer," seems to us to exert a measure of emotional appeal not true of the second and third. At any rate, it is a ponderable opus, not to be dismissed as lightly as some of the Stravinsky veerings of recent years. The program also included a Handel Concerto Grosso (Op. 6, No. 6, G minor) and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol."

nobility of style the arias, "Betrachte meine Seel" and "Mein theuer Heiland." He seemed less sure of himself or of his music in "Eilt, ihr angefocht'nen Seelen," with its not very vocal "divisions."

Miss Hayden cared circumspectly for the soprano airs and Miss Telva met the requirements of the beautiful "Es ist vollbracht." Mr. Gridley succeeded to the narrative of the Evangelist, intrusted at former performances to George Meader. The great chorus, "Kreuzige," which has been inexplicably cut by Mr. Bodanzky in the past, was restored with telling effect.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 9 "

A Music Editor

The fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now being celebrated, is also the thirtieth anniversary of the editorship of its program books by Mr. Philip Hale. All who know the excellences of the Orchestra are likewise familiar with the little pamphlets,—on the buff covers of which two cherubs have blown trumpets immemorially,—which too many concert goers leave in their seats. Connoisseurs of music long since learned that the booklets well repaid leisurely perusal in the quiet of the study, for into them Mr. Hale has poured the learning of a well-stocked mind.

One of those who, with James Gibbon Huneker, made the turn of the century a scintillant critical period, Mr. Hale is more than well equipped for the task which he has borne for thirty years. With the mere annotation of a score,—describing form, pointing out its themes, analyzing its effects,—he has never been content. Such dry-as-dust matters he leaves chiefly to the pedants. While he concerns himself with data scarcely less significant. An inquisitive mind and a capacious memory enable him to put into his notes an astounding array of recondite knowledge concerning composers, performers and instruments. The confidences which Tchaikowsky poured out to his brother, Modeste, the cast which sung the first performance of "Tannheuser," the origin of which an obsolete instrument as the theorbo, how much rent Handel paid in London, what sort of port Brahms drank,—all go into his anecdotal notes and footnotes like plums in a pudding.

Those fortunate enough to possess bound files of the booklets,—which contain the program issued without listing a conductor for a performance in 1918, when Dr. Muck was hysterically arrested from the podium to become a prisoner at Fort Oglethorpe,—have something valuable. In honor and celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Orchestra, a wreath might well be tossed on the head of the editor of its program books, which are not merely a mine of estoteric information, but an agency of popular culture.

13

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
MAR 9 - 1931

Boston Orchestra Plays Hill Composition

The program of the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon consisted of Handel's concerto grosso in G minor, Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" which had been heard for the first time here on Thursday evening last, Edward Burlingame Hill's second symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish caprice. Mr. Hill's symphony, which is in the good old-fashioned key of C major, was performed for the first time in this city. The composition brought some comfort because it presented no problems. It had no program, no symbolism, no philosophy, no promulgations, no hidden meanings. It offered itself for consideration as music and nothing else.

Furthermore, it made no exploration into formal wildernesses, but in the first and last moments adhered to the classic sonata form. The trio of the scherzo, which is the second movement, is somewhat extended, but otherwise this is a scherzo a la mode. The composition is very well made. Mr. Hill's craftsmanship is beyond cavil. The entire work is gorgeous in its instrumental web, firm of texture and structurally quite able to stand up. The themes are sharply outlined and treated with skill. The developments are well conceived, and hence there is not a dull or padded page in the composition.

The listener feels, however, when the symphony has come to its end, that he has heard something which cost the creator much hard work. In spite of the resolute aggressiveness of some of the themes and the strenuous vivacity of others, one suspects that the composer was using the whip on Pegasus. This seemed especially to be the case with certain endings in which staccato chords and syncopated rhythms were served up in a magnificence of orchestration and a power of sound. The character of the bulk of the melodic matter of the work was somber in spite of the spirited movement, and of the gentle persuasion of poetic song there was no large measure. But at any rate the composition proved itself the work of a sincere writer with authority in the employment of his methods and above all else it revealed itself as healthy music, free from post-war posings, disillusionist attitudinizing, or fictitious realism. The audience was cordial, but not excited. Saturday afternoon concert audiences seldom are.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NATION
MAR 1 1 1931

Music

Stravinsky

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY has recently given us performances of the Stravinsky "Capriccio" and of the "Symphonie de Psaumes." They throw the strange history of this strangest of composers into vivid relief against the background of other contemporary composers whose works we have been hearing.

Sibelius, who has had a burst of recognition from all quarters this season, with performances of two symphonies, two symphonic poems, and a violin concerto; Loeffler, whose seventieth birthday was recently celebrated with performances of his "Pagan Poem" in New York, Boston, and Cleveland; Elgar and Bloch, represented on recent programs by an "Introduction and Allegro" and the "Schelomo" rhapsody, respectively—these are men who have been interested more in the perfection than in the originality of their idioms, who have grown naturally and non-violently out of the music of the past. Although none of them is a slavish imitator of his predecessors, none has been very deeply concerned with individualizing his style by technical innovation. These men are prophets or poets, in the same sense that their forerunners were. Their importance is personal rather than historical; it lies in the content of their music itself rather than in new roads of expression opened for followers to travel on.

Contrast them, then, with the portrait of Stravinsky as "a commercial genius, a kind of musical bank director," drawn by Leonid Sabaneyeff in his admirable book "Modern Russian Composers." "Stravinsky's fame," he writes, "is based not only on his musical gifts . . . but chiefly on his virtuosity in making full use of musical conditions and taking full account of fashions and fads, those two wavering and changing elements on which, nevertheless, fame in one's lifetime almost exclusively depends. . . . Stravinsky is immeasurably more a genius of musical business than purely of music." The old virtues, Sabaneyeff says with a bitterness not quite concealed, are out of date; épater les bourgeois has become the aim of the modern composer. And since Stravinsky has had unequaled success in startling the musical world into frightened admiration and imitation, he has become the most brilliant figure of our time. This is a very civilized way of crying "humbug," which is what many less brilliant critics than Sabaneyeff have been crying all along.

But is Stravinsky nothing but a splendid mountebank? It is not difficult, at any rate, to see how that impression arose. Early in his career (in 1911, and he is only in his forty-ninth year now) he had poked good-humored but devastating fun, in "Petrouchka," at most of the music that had preceded him. Two years later he shook the foundations of the musical world with "Le Sacre du Printemps," a work of the utmost imaginable rhythmic, harmonic, and orchestral radicalism. There followed a series of works that jumped from one tendency to another in bewildering and apparently aimless succession: "Les Noces," continuing the primitivism of the "Sacre"; "L'Histoire du Soldat," an acid miniature; the Sonata and the Concerto for piano, combining elements of jazz with a "return to Bach," a still acidulous combination; "Oedipus," an oratorio for male chorus and orchestra with soloists, borrowing liberally from Handel, Verdi, Wagner, and many others; "Le Baiser de la Fée," a ballet acknowledging Stravinsky's debt to Tschaikowsky, at the moment when the stock of that very romantic and unmodern master had fallen to its lowest point.

Through them all runs an uncanny talent for the unexpected. Through them all, though, I think, the skilful hand of this unique genius has been pretty clearly visible. And now it seems probable that his wanderings have brought him to something that can be understood and enjoyed even in the light of the traditions he once made such brilliant efforts to destroy. For in the light-hearted "Capriccio" the irony of parts of the Concerto seems completely abandoned. And the "Symphonie de Psaumes," inscribed (doubtless with something less than complete piety) "to the glory of God," seems at first hearing a sincere and moving work. Nor has Stravinsky's unique technical mastery apparently suffered while he has been off on his ironical pilgrimages.

As the distance that separates us from those once enigmatic works increases, I think there is little doubt that we shall be less and less concerned with the motives that inspired them. Beethoven, too, played practical jokes, but today we have to have them pointed out to us. Even when, driven by a need to shock his friends, or by who knows what Dostoevskian urge toward self-destruction, Stravinsky perhaps tried his hardest to conceal, even deform, his virtuosity, it was never successfully hidden. "Oedipus" (which the League of Composers will present in April) is the one work of Stravinsky with which I have not yet been able to feel any real contact; but I think no one could ever have attributed it to anyone else.

The significance of his music has for a long time been overshadowed by its audacity. But if, as seems probable, he has again arrived at the point where his music is as important intrinsically as historically, it cannot be long before what Sabaneyeff a trifle grudgingly admits, will be generally and freely recognized: "However one may evaluate Stravinsky's repeatedly and bizarrely changing style, he undoubtedly constitutes an era in musical art. . . . At present he is the most resplendent and significant figure of contemporary life."

ARTHUR MENDEL

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH
MAR 1 1 1931

By H. E. CHERRINGTON.

Boston Symphony to Be One of "Great Five"

Owing to the very substantial growth in membership of the Symphony club of central Ohio, it was inevitable that the concert series would be enlarged. The interesting announcement was made last night that, during the season commencing next October, five of the major symphony orchestras of the country will be heard in Columbus.

Especially interesting is the news that the Boston symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance in Columbus. A rare treat is anticipated in this engagement, since the Boston organization makes but very few appearances away from home.

The Cleveland orchestra will return, with Sokoloff again wielding the baton. The Detroit Symphony orchestra will be heard with Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The Cincinnati orchestra will return, with Eugene Goosens the newly appointed conductor who takes the place of Fritz Reiner; and the Chicago symphony orchestra will reappear with the veteran Frederick Stock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 1 2 193

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD

AS TO PHILIP HALE

It remained for the Hartford Courant to suggest that while newspapers are commenting complimentarily on the current celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it would not be out of place to pay some attention to the synchronized thirtieth anniversary of Philip Hale's editorship of the very unusual program books of the orchestra.

"In the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra," says the Courant, a wreath might well be tossed on the head of the editor of its program books, which are not merely a mine of esoteric information but an agency of popular culture."

Or in lieu of such a transitory mark of approval as a wreath, may we suggest, how would it be if those who would pay tribute to the talented and genial musical critic of the Boston Herald, now that his years are so many that in the nature of things he cannot go on forever, were to take up a cause for which Mr. Hale has battled undespairingly though with little success for many, many years—shorter concert programs? It is a noble cause and perhaps one out of which might, in the course of time, come some measure of victory.

How many times more people might be brought to appreciation of high class music if concert programs were an hour long instead of nearly twice that duration nobody can tell, but probably several times more. But musicians cannot be persuaded that there can be too much of a good thing and even so authoritative a critic as Mr. Hale can't make a dent in their persistence in the long program. However, he has been almost alone in his war. If more music lovers were as candid as he in fighting for the well being of the audiences' nerves perhaps, some day, concert directors would get hep.

Also, may we add one more item to the Courant's tribute to Philip Hale. He is a man of extraordinary courage—the only one in New England, we dare say, who has the temerity to wear a Windsor tie and a derby hat at the same time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVE. POST
19 - 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

An American Symphony, a First-Time "Khovanchina" and the "St. John Passion" in Week-End Music

THE symphony, which once seemed threatened with extinction by the tone-poem but may now be regarded as in better standing with contemporaneous composers than the later form beloved of the Straussians, has never ceased to tempt American musicians. This has been true in spite of, or perhaps because of, their failure to create any work of the kind that has attained and held a place among symphonic works in any degree necessary to the conductors who face each season the problem of making programs for their audiences, here or abroad. Saturday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall brought to first hearing in New York a new Symphony in C major by Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard University, his second, which had its world premiere in Boston as recently as February 27.

An admirable performance by Mr. Koussevitzky's ensemble is to be recorded, together with the circumstance that the composer was present and acknowledged the very cordial applause. The symphony came to the ears as one of sturdy and homogeneous construction, spirited and clean-cut as to content. The thematic material did not pass in review the music of other masters. But it was to be doubted whether this material had any such saliency of beauty or charm as to make the symphony other than a praiseworthy example of what still may be done with the form. The work is conservative, direct, relatively concise; and clear, if somewhat unyielding, in its scoring.

This concert also afforded a welcome opportunity to hear Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" a second time, the chorus of the Schola Cantorum reappearing with Mr. Koussevitzky's forces. The first of the three movements, "Hear my prayer," seems to us to exert a measure of emotional appeal not true of the second and third. At any rate, it is a ponderable opus, not to be dismissed as lightly as some of the Stravinsky veerings of recent years. The program also included a Handel Concerto Grosso (Op. 6, No. 6, G minor) and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol."

nobility of style the arias, "Betrachte meine Seel" and "Mein theuer Heiland." He seemed less sure of himself or of his music in "Eilt, ihr angefocht'nen Seelen," with its not very vocal "divisions."

Miss Hayden cared circumspectly for the soprano airs and Miss Telva met the requirements of the beautiful "Es ist vollbracht." Mr. Gridley succeeded to the narrative of the Evangelist, intrusted at former performances to George Meader. The great chorus, "Kreuzige," which has been inexplicably cut by Mr. Bodanzky in the past, was restored with telling effect.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 9 [illegible]

A Music Editor

The fiftieth anniversary of the founding of [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra, now being celebrated, is also the thirtieth anniversary of the [illegible]itorship of its program books by Mr. Philip [illegible]le. All who know the excellences of the Or[illegible]estra are likewise familiar with the little [illegible]mphlets,—on the buff covers of which two [illegible]erubs have blown trumpets immemorially,—[illegible]ich too many concert goers leave in their seats. [illegible]nnoisseurs of music long since learned that the [illegible]klets well repaid leisurely perusal in the quiet [illegible] the study, for into them Mr. Hale has poured [illegible] learning of a well-stocked mind.

[illegible]One of those who, with James Gibbon Huneker [illegible]de the turn of the century a scintillant criti[illegible] period, Mr. Hale is more than well equipped [illegible] the task which he has borne for thirty years. [illegible]th the mere annotation of a score,—describing [illegible] form, pointing out its themes, analyzing its [illegible]ts,—he has never been content. Such dry-as-[illegible]t matters he leaves chiefly to the pedants. [illegible]le he concerns himself with data scarcely less [illegible]nificant. An inquisitive mind and a capacious [illegible]mory enable him to put into his notes an at[illegible]nding array of recondite knowledge concern[illegible] composers, performers and instruments. The [illegible]nfidences which Tchaikowsky poured out to [illegible] brother, Modeste, the cast which sung the [illegible]t performance of "Tannheuser," the origin of [illegible]h an obsolete instrument as the theorbo, how [illegible]ch rent Handel paid in London, what sort of [illegible]t Brahms drank,—all go into his anecdotal [illegible]es and footnotes like plums in a pudding.

[illegible]hose fortunate enough to possess bound files [illegible]he booklets,—which contain the program is[illegible] without listing a conductor for a perform[illegible] in 1918, when Dr. Muck was hysterically [illegible]ched from the podium to become a prisoner [illegible]ort Oglethorpe,—have something valuable. In [illegible]celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the [illegible]hestra, a wreath might well be tossed on the [illegible]d of the editor of its program books, which [illegible] not merely a mine of estoteric information, [illegible]an agency of popular culture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
[illegible]R 9 - 1931

Boston Orchestra Plays Hill Composition

The program of the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon consisted of Handel's concerto grosso in G minor, Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" which had been heard for the first time here on Thursday evening last, Edward Burlingame Hill's second symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish caprice. Mr. Hill's symphony, which is in the good old-fashioned key of C major, was performed for the first time in this city. The composition brought some comfort because it presented no problems. It had no program, no symbolism, no philosophy, no promulgations, no hidden meanings. It offered itself for consideration as music and nothing else.

Furthermore, it made no exploration into formal wildernesses, but in the first and last moments adhered to the classic sonata form. The trio of the scherzo, which is the second movement, is somewhat extended, but otherwise this is a scherzo a la mode. The composition is very well made. Mr. Hill's craftsmanship is beyond cavil. The entire work is gorgeous in its instrumental web, firm of texture and structurally quite able to stand up. The themes are sharply outlined and treated with skill. The developments are well conceived, and hence there is not a dull or padded page in the composition.

The listener feels, however, when the symphony has come to its end, that he has heard something which cost the creator much hard work. In spite of the resolute aggressiveness of some of the themes and the strenuous vivacity of others, one suspects that the composer was using the whip on Pegasus. This seemed especially to be the case with certain endings in which staccato chords and syncopated rhythms were served up in a magnificence of orchestration and a power of sound. The character of the bulk of the melodic matter of the work was somber in spite of the spirited movement, and of the gentle persuasion of poetic song there was no large measure. But at any rate the composition proved itself the work of a sincere writer with authority in the employment of his methods and above all else it revealed itself as healthy music, free from post-war posings, disillusionist attitudinizing, or fictitious realism. The audience was cordial, but not excited. Saturday afternoon concert audiences seldom are.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NATION
MAR 11 1931

Music

Stravinsky

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY has recently given us performances of the Stravinsky "Capriccio" and of the "Symphonie de Psaumes." They throw the strange history of this strangest of composers into vivid relief against the background of other contemporary composers whose works we have been hearing.

Sibelius, who has had a burst of recognition from all quarters this season, with performances of two symphonies, two symphonic poems, and a violin concerto; Loeffler, whose seventieth birthday was recently celebrated with performances of his "Pagan Poem" in New York, Boston, and Cleveland; Elgar and Bloch, represented on recent programs by an "Introduction and Allegro" and the "Schelomo" rhapsody, respectively—these are men who have been interested more in the perfection than in the originality of their idioms, who have grown naturally and non-violently out of the music of the past. Although none of them is a slavish imitator of his predecessors, none has been very deeply concerned with individualizing his style by technical innovation. These men are prophets or poets, in the same sense that their forerunners were. Their importance is personal rather than historical; it lies in the content of their music itself rather than in new roads of expression opened for followers to travel on.

Contrast them, then, with the portrait of Stravinsky as "a commercial genius, a kind of musical bank director," drawn by Leonid Sabaneyeff in his admirable book "Modern Russian Composers." "Stravinsky's fame," he writes, "is based not only on his musical gifts . . . but chiefly on his virtuosity in making full use of musical conditions and taking full account of fashions and fads, those two wavering and changing elements on which, nevertheless, fame in one's lifetime almost exclusively depends. . . . Stravinsky is immeasurably more a genius of musical business than purely of music." The old virtues, Sabaneyeff says with a bitterness not quite concealed, are out of date; épater les bourgeois has become the aim of the modern composer. And since Stravinsky has had unequaled success in startling the musical world into frightened admiration and imitation, he has become the most brilliant figure of our time. This is a very civilized way of crying "humbug," which is what many less brilliant critics than Sabaneyeff have been crying all along.

But is Stravinsky nothing but a splendid mountebank? It is not difficult, at any rate, to see how that impression arose. Early in his career (in 1911, and he is only in his forty-ninth year now) he had poked good-humored but devastating fun, in "Petrouchka," at most of the music that had preceded him. Two years later he shook the foundations of the musical world with "Le Sacre du Printemps," a work of the utmost imaginable rhythmic, harmonic, and orchestral radicalism. There followed a series of works that jumped from one tendency to another in bewildering and apparently aimless succession: "Les Noces," continuing the primitivism of the "Sacre"; "L'Histoire du Soldat," an acid miniature; the Sonata and the Concerto for piano, combining elements of jazz with a "return to Bach," a still acidulous combination; "Oedipus," an oratorio for male chorus and orchestra with soloists, borrowing liberally from Handel, Verdi, Wagner, and many others; "Le Baiser de la Fée," a ballet acknowledging Stravinsky's debt to Tschaikowsky, at the moment when the stock of that very romantic and unmodern master had fallen to its lowest point.

Through them all runs an uncanny talent for the unexpected. Through them all, though, I think, the skilful hand of this unique genius has been pretty clearly visible. And now it seems probable that his wanderings have brought him to something that can be understood and enjoyed even in the light of the traditions he once made such brilliant efforts to destroy. For in the light-hearted "Capriccio" the irony of parts of the Concerto seems completely abandoned. And the "Symphonie de Psaumes," inscribed (doubtless with something less than complete piety) "to the glory of God," seems at first hearing a sincere and moving work. Nor has Stravinsky's unique technical mastery apparently suffered while he has been off on his ironical pilgrimages.

As the distance that separates us from those once enigmatic works increases, I think there is little doubt that we shall be less and less concerned with the motives that inspired them. Beethoven, too, played practical jokes, but today we have to have them pointed out to us. Even when, driven by a need to shock his friends, or by who knows what Dostoevskian urge toward self-destruction, Stravinsky perhaps tried his hardest to conceal, even deform, his virtuosity, it was never successfully hidden. "Oedipus" (which the League of Composers will present in April) is the one work of Stravinsky with which I have not yet been able to feel any real contact; but I think no one could ever have attributed it to anyone else.

The significance of his music has for a long time been overshadowed by its audacity. But if, as seems probable, he has again arrived at the point where his music is as important intrinsically as historically, it cannot be long before what Sabaneyeff a trifle grudgingly admits, will be generally and freely recognized: "However one may evaluate Stravinsky's repeatedly and bizarrely changing style, he undoubtedly constitutes an era in musical art. . . . At present he is the most resplendent and significant figure of contemporary life."

ARTHUR MENDEL

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH
MAR 11 1931

By H. E. CHERRINGTON.

Boston Symphony to Be One of "Great Five"

Owing to the very substantial growth in membership of the Symphony club of central Ohio, it was inevitable that the concert series would be enlarged. The interesting announcement was made last night that, during the season commencing next October, five of the major symphony orchestras of the country will be heard in Columbus.

Especially interesting is the news that the Boston symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance in Columbus. A rare treat is anticipated in this engagement, since the Boston organization makes but very few appearances away from home.

The Cleveland orchestra will return, with Sokoloff again wielding the baton. The Detroit Symphony orchestra will be heard with Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The Cincinnati orchestra will return, with Eugene Goosens the newly appointed conductor who takes the place of Fritz Reiner; and the Chicago symphony orchestra will reappear with the veteran Frederick Stock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 12 193[illegible]

HIS CAUSE

Philip Hale Has Fought Valiantly for Shorter Concert Programs.

It remained for The Hartford Courant to suggest that while newspapers are commenting complimentarily on the current celebration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony orchestra it would not be out of place to pay some attention to the synchronized 30th anniversary of Philip Hale's editorship of the very unusual program books of the orchestra.

"In the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the orchestra," says The Courant, "a wreath might well be tossed on the head of the editor of its program books, which are not merely a mine of esoteric information but an agency of popular culture."

Or in lieu of such a transitory mark of approval as a wreath, may we suggest, how would it be if those who would pay tribute to the talented and genial musical critic of The Boston Herald, now that his years are so many that in the nature of things he cannot go on forever, were to take up a cause for which Mr. Hale has battled undespairingly though with little success for many, many years—shorter concert programs? It is a noble cause and perhaps one out of which might in the course of time, come some measure of victory.

How many times more people might be brought to appreciation of high class music if concert programs were an hour long instead of nearly twice that duration nobody can tell, but probably several times more. But musicians cannot be persuaded that there can be too much of a good thing and even so authoritative a critic as Mr. Hale can't make a dent in their persistence in the long program. However, he has been almost alone in his war. If more music lovers were as candid as he in fighting for the well being of the audiences' nerves perhaps, some day, concert directors would get hep.—Manchester Herald.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 12 1931

Berezowsky to Lead His Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will perform the latest symphony by Nicolai Berezowsky, Russian composer living in this city, next Monday evening in Boston. The composer will conduct his own work at the invitation of Mr. Koussevitzky.

All Prices
at Store
Small Delivery
MANCHESTER
OAL CO.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

MAR 2 1931

MME. MATZENAUER SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Contralto Will Sing Bach Aria and a Group of Four by Mahler.

Margarethe Matzenauer, noted contralto, will be soloist at the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra's concerts at the Odeon tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

Mme. Matzenauer was originally engaged for the final concert of the orchestra's season. Her date was announced by the Symphony Society as the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, with a great Bach festival, is celebrating its fiftieth year.

The program:

Suite in C minor.
I. Ouverture.
II. Courante.
III. Gavotte I; Gavotte II.
IV. Forlane.
V. Menuet I; Menuet II.
VI. Bourree I; Bourree II.
VII. Passepied I; Passepied II.

"O, Pardon Me, My God," from the St. Matthew Passion.....Bach
Mme. Matzenauer.

Music from Symphony No. 7
E major.....Mahler
Waltz.....Mahler
Liebst du um Schoenheit.
Ich bin der Welt abhanden gekommen.
Rheinlegendchen.
Urlicht.
Mme. Matzenauer.
Im Abendrot.....Goldmark

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press.

MAR 15 1931

A FORMER ALBANIAN—oh, way back past our recollection but not past hearing other people talk about—is the subject of an editorial in The Hartford Courant of March 9. It says:

"The fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now being celebrated, is also the thirtieth anniversary of the editorship of its program books by Mr. Philip Hale. All who know the excellences of the orchestra are likewise familiar with the little pamphlets which too many concert goers leave in their seats. Connoisseurs of music long since learned that the booklets well repaid leisurely perusal in the quiet of the study, for into them Mr. Hale has poured the learning of a well stocked mind."

Phil Hale—that's how old Albanians speak of him—was at one time a columnist of the Albany Evening Journal—long before they called them columnists, we guess. And Harold Frederic, author of a once famous novel, "The Damnation of Theron Ware" was editorial writer and Harold McGrath writer of best sellers, was a reporter. Hooray for Albany newspapers as a literary training ground!—W. H. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE

MAR 14 1931

Boston Symphony Bach Festival.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary this month and as a fitting celebration six Bach programs are to be given.

In 1881 Major Henry L. Higginson founded the orchestra. His dream was to give America an orchestra of permanent standing, and one comparable with the best of Europe. How far he has succeeded the world knows. So it is that the present sponsors are dedicating this program to the memory of this noble man.

Participating in the event are the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club. Margaret Matzenhauer is soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, bass; Wallace Goodrich, organist; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord, and Alexander Borowsky, piano. Of course the Boston Symphony under George Koussevitzky will supply the orchestral numbers and the background.

Would that Pittsburgh had a Major Higginson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 1 8 1931

Borovsky Here for Bach Festival

Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, who has not been heard here for several seasons, arrived yesterday on the Aquitania to take part in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach Festival, to be held in Boston from March 24 to 29.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

MAR 1 - 1931

Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Amy Evans, soprano, and Fraser Gange, barytone, have been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as soloists in its Bach festival, beginning in Boston on March 22.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

MAR 15 1931

About Bach Festival To Be Held Soon

Boston Symphony Plans Celebration for March 24-29

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Concluding the celebration of a glorious half century of musical attainment that is unsurpassed in the annals of the tonal art, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Sergei Koussevitsky, will present a Bach Festival, embracing the most representative orchestral, choral and chamber music of Johann Sebastian Bach, at Symphony Hall, Boston, on consecutive days from March 24-29 inclusive.

Music lovers who attend this brilliant event can be assured of a thrilling musical experience that will be a memory to be cherished in the years to come.

This highlight of the musical season is given in honor of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson and there could be no more fitting tribute to the man and art devotee whose love for music made possible the world's greatest orchestra, the Boston Symphony. So long as music endures as a medium of expression for human kind, the name of Henry Lee Higginson, will be remembered with reverent appreciation.

Would that Pittsburgh could point with pride to a music-conscious man such as Higginson, who for a period of 37 years was the sole sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival will be inaugurated with an address by Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend.

Assisting in the gala presentation are the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club conducted by Dr. Archibald Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth.

The list of soloists is a distinguished one: Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone, who form the vocal quartet of the choral scores.

Bach's monumental Mass in B minor opens the Festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the following Sunday. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the Orchestra for both works. Four Cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) will be presented on March 27-28 by the Bach Cantata Club.

The orchestral works include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and the first and third Suites. Richard Burgin, concert master and Julius Theodorowicz, assistant concert master will play the double concerto for two violins. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the D minor piano concerto, and also the preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered Clavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens," will also come from abroad to perform a group of harpsichord pieces. The organ numbers are to be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory of Music, and formerly organist of the orchestra.

Among the interesting events that have been a part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's golden jubilee were the first productions of scores composed especially for this occasion by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. The fiftieth season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the Orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of a half hundred years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HAVERHILL, MASS
EVE. GAZETTE

MAR 1 9 1931

MUSIC MI

BACH'S HUMANISM

Johann Sebastian Bach's birth anniversary March 21 (1685-1750) annually excites interest in Bach the musician and Bach the man. He was orphaned at 10. When 18 his salary was about $57 annually, earned by playing the organ three times a week and giving instruction in singing to a small pupil choir, of the church at Arnstadt.

High church officials and organists were not always in accord in Bach's day and it is told by his biographers that, after his extremely promising beginning, people grew more and more dissatisfied with the manner in which he discharged his duties as organist. He was reproached for making his accompaniment for congregational singing so intricate that singers often completely lost the melody, and when the officiating clergyman declared his preludes too lengthy, he adopted the extreme and made them too short. Among other criticisms made by the consistory in charge of Bach's position was one to the effect that he had accompanied upon the organ, the singing of a "strange maiden." The "maiden" was declared to be his cousin, Maria Barbara Bach, daughter of Michael Bach, who became his wife, Oct. 17, 1707.

Four of their seven children reached maturity and two of these sons are known to have attained musical renown. His second marriage took place in 1721 to Anna Magdalena Wilke, a singer of 21, daughter of a trumpeter at Weissenfels. Bach was now 36 and during 28 years of happy wedded life 13 children were born to them. The unusual talent for music possessed by this wife was developed under his instruction to such a degree that she wrote parts to many of his church cantatas.

Bach's gifts as an artist were united with great clearness and acuteness of intellect, strength of will, a persistency that often amounted to obstinacy, love for order and high sense of duty. Conscious of his worth, he was without arrogance. He provided generously for his family and his home life was a happy one. His greatest pleasure was the concerts conducted with his wife and children and especially talented pupils.

The philanthropic and self-sacrificing spirit manifested by Bach towards his pupils was further exemplified in his family circle. In 1707 he bestowed upon a cousin in needy circumstances a part of his small salary. While in Weimar, he took his eldest brother's son into his home. Against his own interests he carried out with filial affection the testamentary bequests of an honored relative.

Bach was important as a man of strong and noble nature, whose life supports the belief that the truly great artist may also be a man worthy veneration.

NOTED IN THE NEWS

A Bach festival of orchestral, choral, and chamber music of Johann Sebastian Bach will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in Symphony hall, Boston, on the occasion of the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary, March 24, 25, 26, 27, 28 and 29. The Harvard Glee club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor; Radcliffe Choral society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor; Bach Cantata club; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ, and Bliss Perry, speaker, will participate in the program as arranged by Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 22 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its Bach festival under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Tuesday afternoon and evening with the B minor Mass. On Wednesday evening Professor Bliss Perry will give a memorial address on Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra. The musical program consists of organ and harpsichord numbers.

The second Brandenburg concerto, first suite for orchestra and the D minor piano concerto will be played Thursday evening on a program closing with the Magnificat. The festival programs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening fall in the regular subscription series; the former offering a concerto for two violins and two cantatas, the latter the fifth Brandenburg concerto, two cantatas and piano solos. The assisting artists are the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, barytone; Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAR 21 1931

151

Musical Notes

NEW SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

A new symphony and a soloist newly come to America, says the C. S. Monitor, graced the fifth concert of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the evening of March 16. The symphony was the first adventure in this form by Nicolai Berezowsky, a young Russian now living in New York. The soloist was Leon Zighera, violinist, and brother of Alfred of the first desk of the orchestra's cellos, and of Bernard, its first harpist.

Born in Leningrad, Mr. Berezowsky migrated to the United States in 1922 and became a member of the New York Philharmonic, leading the second violin. His "Hebrew" Suite was performed in 1928 by the New York Philharmonic under Mengelberg. He has written chamber music, an operetta and a cantata.

This "Symphony in one movement"—really in four, played without pause—though it is without key designation, was evidently not written merely to shock the public. Even if Mr. Berezowsky had been tempted to take this road to notoriety, he probably would have realized that traffic on it is now diverted to obscurity. No; none of these themes undergoes any real development. They are tossed about and interwoven among the several choirs with considerable sense of instrumental values but without much apparent structural feeling. The slow movement is restful, and the Scherzo engaging in a quite Russian way. In the Finale the composer surrenders to Stravinsky. Here there is considerable rhythmic emphasis, and a great deal of noise. By reason of its energy and vitality, transmitted through a stirring performance under the composer's own vigorous baton, the symphony won a notable success.

Mr. Zighera brought to the interpretation of Mendelssohn's Concerto a good left-hand technique, excellent bowing and strong musical feeling. His tone is small and rather feminine, and for this reason he doubtless was well advised to choose this concerto for his American debut, rather than a more robust vehicle. His performance was well received.

The concert opened with a thrilling proclamation of the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture and closed with a performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" in which the meretriciousness of the ...ic was almost forgotten in the ...osity of its utterance. Mr. ...in (concertmaster), Mr. Lau... (flute), Mr. Speyer (English ...) and Mr. B. Zighera (harp) ...icularly distinguished themes in their solo passages.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

MAR 22 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Play At Bach Festival

BOSTON, March 21—A Bach festival to be given through next week will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half-century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening will be dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through thirty-seven years. Bliss Perry, the writer who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has announced that Bach's monumental mass in B minor will open the festival on March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificent will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "well-tempered chlavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of t... Societe des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory, and formerly with this orchestra.

Continued From Tenth Page.

Other events of the fiftieth anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of fifty years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MAR 22 1931

BACH FESTIVAL

The Bach Festival, crowning event of the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open Tuesday afternoon and evening with the performances of the B minor Mass, to be presented in two divisions, beginning at 4:30 and 8:30, respectively. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and these soloists will assist the orchestra: Amy Evans, soprano; Adelle Alberts, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Dr. Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct.

Wednesday evening will be dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder and supporter, Henry L. Higginson. Professor Bliss Perry of Harvard will make the address, Wallace Goodrich will be heard in some of the organ music of Bach, and Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, who has come from France for the occasion, will play a group of pieces for the harpsichord.

Thursday evening there will be heard the Second Brandenburg Concerto, for solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet; the Piano Concerto in D minor, in which Alexander Borovsky will be the soloist, and the Magnificat, with the choruses and soloists who are to be heard in the Mass.

Friday afternoon a regular concert will be a part of this Bach Festival, with its programme listing the Suite for Orchestra No. 3, the Concerto for two violins, in which Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz of the first desk of the orchestra's first violins will be the soloist, and two cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit," with the Bach Cantata Club supplying the singers.

The programme of Saturday evening's concert, although resembling that of Friday afternoon, will on this occasion not be identical. Again there will be two cantatas, given with the assistance of the Bach Cantata Club, "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein Feste Burg"; the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto, for solo piano, violin and flute, and Preludes and Fugues from "The Well-Tempered Clavichord," performed by Alexander Borovsky, make the rest of the programme.

On Sunday afternoon and evening, at 4:30 and at 8:30, as on the previous Tuesday, the B minor Mass will be repeated as a Pension Fund Concert, with the same soloists and choruses.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

MAR 2 9 1931

When Stravinsky's latest work, "Symphonie de Psaumes," was presented to New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra the other day, Lawrence Gilman, critic of the Herald Tribune, hailed it as a masterpiece.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

MAR 22 1931

* * *

"THERE WAS a dead silence. Then they all burst out laughing. And I realized that I had created a record as far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra was concerned. Nobody had dared to criticize them like that since the time of their formation."

See Page 153 for Mar. 21

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

MAR 9 1931

MME. MATZENAUER SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Contralto Will Sing Bach Aria and a Group of Four by Mahler.

Margarethe Matzenauer, noted contralto, will be soloist at the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra's concerts at the Odeon tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

Mme. Matzenauer was originally engaged for the final concert of the orchestra's season. Her date was advanced by the Symphony Society at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which, with a great Bach festival, is celebrating its fifth year.

The program:
Suite in C major.
I. Overture.
II. Courante.
III. Gavotte I, Gavotte II.
IV. Forlane.
V. Menuet I, Menuet II.
VI. Bourree I, Bourree II.
VII. Passepied I, Passepied II.
Aria, "O, Pardon Me, My God," from the St. Matthew Passion.....Bach
Mme. Matzenauer.
Music from Symphony No. 7
Empire.....Mahler
Will o' the Wisp.....Mahler
Liebst du um Schoenheit.
Ich bin der Welt abhanden gekommen.
Rhein Legenden.
Dirlieb.
Mme. Matzenauer.
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press.

MAR 15 1931

A FORMER ALBANIAN—oh, way back past our recollection but not past hearing other people talk about—is the subject of an editorial in The Hartford Courant of March 9. It says:

"The fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now being celebrated, is also the thirtieth anniversary of the editorship of its program books by Mr. Philip Hale. All who know the excellences of the orchestra are likewise familiar with the little pamphlets which too many concert goers leave in their seats. Connoisseurs of music long since learned that the booklets well repaid leisurely perusal in the quiet of the study, for into them Mr. Hale has poured the learning of a well stocked mind."

Phil Hale—that's how old Albanians speak of him—was at one time a columnist of the Albany Evening Journal—long before they called them columnists, we guess. And Harold Frederic, author of a once famous novel, "The Damnation of Theron Ware" was editorial writer and Harold McGrath writer of best sellers, was a reporter. Hooray for Albany newspapers as a literary training ground!—W. H. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE

MAR 14 1931

Boston Symphony Bach Festival.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary this month and as a fitting celebration six Bach programs are to be given.

In 1881 Major Henry L. Higginson founded the orchestra. His dream was to give America an orchestra of permanent standing, and one comparable with the best of Europe. How far he has succeeded the world knows. So it is that the present sponsors are dedicating this program to the memory of this noble man.

Participating in the event are the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club. Margaret Matzenhauer is soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, bass; Wallace Goodrich, organist; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord, and Alexander Borowsky, piano. Of course the Boston Symphony under George Koussevitzky will supply the orchestral numbers and the background.

Would that Pittsburgh had a Major Higginson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 18 1931

Borovsky Here for Bach Festival

Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, who has not been heard here for several seasons, arrived yesterday on the Aquitania to take part in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach Festival, to be held in Boston from March 24 to 29.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

MAR 1[illegible] 1931

Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Amy Evans, soprano, and Fraser Gange, barytone, have been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as soloists in its Bach festival, beginning in Boston on March 22.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

MAR 15 1931

About Bach Festival To Be Held Soon

Boston Symphony Plans Celebration for March 24-29

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Concluding the celebration of a glorious half century of musical attainment that is unsurpassed in the annals of the tonal art, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Sergei Koussevitsky, will present a Bach Festival, embracing the most representative orchestral, choral and chamber music of Johann Sebastian Bach, at Symphony Hall, Boston, on consecutive days from March 24-29 inclusive.

Music lovers who attend this brilliant event can be assured of a thrilling musical experience that will be a memory to be cherished in the years to come.

This highlight of the musical season is given in honor of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson and there could be no more fitting tribute to the man and art devotee whose love for music made possible the world's greatest orchestra, the Boston Symphony. So long as music endures as a medium of expression for human kind, the name of Henry Lee Higginson, will be remembered with reverent appreciation.

Would that Pittsburgh could point with pride to a music-conscious man such as Higginson, who for a period of 37 years was the sole sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival will be inaugurated with an address by Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend.

Assisting in the gala presentation are the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club conducted by Dr. Archibald Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth.

The list of soloists is a distinguished one; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone, who form the vocal quartet of the choral scores.

Bach's monumental Mass in B minor opens the Festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the following Sunday. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the Orchestra for both works. Four Cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) will be presented on March 27-28 by the Bach Cantata Club.

The orchestral works include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and the first and third Suites. Richard Burgin, concert master and Julius Theodorowicz, assistant concert master will play the double concerto for two violins. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the D minor piano concerto, and also the preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered Clavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens," will also come from abroad to perform a group of harpsichord pieces. The organ numbers are to be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory of Music, and formerly organist of the orchestra.

Among the interesting events that have been a part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's golden jubilee were the first productions of scores composed especially for this occasion by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. The fiftieth season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the Orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of a half hundred years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HAVERHILL, MASS
EVE. GAZETTE

MAR 19 1931

MUSIC MI

BACH'S HUMANISM

Johann Sebastian Bach's birth anniversary March 21 (1685-1750) annually excites interest in Bach the musician and Bach the man. He was orphaned at 10. When 18 his salary was about $57 annually, earned by playing the organ three times a week and giving instruction in singing to a small pupil choir, of the church at Arnstadt.

High church officials and organists were not always in accord in Bach's day and it is told by his biographers that, after his extremely promising beginning, people grew more and more dissatisfied with the manner in which he discharged his duties as organist. He was reproached for making his accompaniment for congregational singing so intricate that singers often completely lost the melody, and when the officiating clergyman declared his preludes too lengthy, he adopted the extreme and made them too short. Among other criticisms made by the consistory in charge of Bach's position was one to the effect that he had accompanied upon the organ, the singing of a "strange maiden." The "maiden" was declared to be his cousin, Maria Barbara Bach, daughter of Michael Bach, who became his wife, Oct. 17, 1707.

Four of their seven children reached maturity and two of these sons are known to have attained musical renown. His second marriage took place in 1721 to Anna Magdalena Wilke, a singer of 21, daughter of a trumpeter at Weissenfels. Bach was now 36 and during 28 years of happy wedded life 13 children were born to them. The unusual talent for music possessed by this wife was developed under his instruction to such a degree that she wrote parts to many of his church cantatas.

Bach's gifts as an artist were united with great clearness and acuteness of intellect, strength of will, a persistency that often amounted to obstinacy, love for order and high sense of duty. Conscious of his worth, he was without arrogance. He provided generously for his family and his home life was a happy one. His greatest pleasure was the concerts conducted with his wife and children and especially talented pupils.

The philanthropic and self-sacrificing spirit manifested by Bach towards his pupils was further exemplified in his family circle. In 1707 he bestowed upon a cousin in needy circumstances a part of his small salary. While in Weimar, he took his eldest brother's son into his home. Against his own interests he carried out with filial affection the testamentary bequests of an honored relative.

Bach was important as a man of strong and noble nature, whose life supports the belief that the truly great artist may also be a man worthy veneration.

NOTED IN THE NEWS

A Bach festival of orchestral, choral, and chamber music of Johann Sebastian Bach will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in Symphony hall, Boston, on the occasion of the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary, March 24, 25, 26, 27, 28 and 29. The Harvard Glee club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor; Radcliffe Choral society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor; Bach Cantata club; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ, and Bliss Perry, speaker, will participate in the program as arranged by Dr. Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

MAR 20 1931

BACH FESTIVAL AT SYMPHONY HALL

A Bach festival, comprising orchestral, choral and chamber music of Johann Sebastian Bach, will be given next week in Symphony hall, Boston, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee club, the Radcliffe Choral society, the Bach Cantata Club and special soloists. The festival will begin on Tuesday, March 24, and will end on Sunday, March 29.. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct, and the following soloists will participate: Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ; Bliss Perry, speaker.

See Page 153

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAR 21 1931

Musical Notes

NEW SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

A new symphony and a soloist newly come to America, says the C. S. Monitor, graced the fifth concert of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the evening of March 16. The symphony was the first adventure in this form by Nicolai Berezowsky, a young Russian now living in New York. The soloist was Leon Zighera, violinist, and brother of Alfred of the first desk of the orchestra's cellos, and of Bernard, its first harpist.

Born in Leningrad, Mr. Berezowsky migrated to the United States in 1922 and became a member of the New York Philharmonic, leading the second violin. His "Hebrew" Suite was performed in 1928 by the New York Philharmonic under Mengelberg. He has written chamber music, an operetta and a cantata.

This "Symphony in one movement"—really in four, played without pause—though it is without key designation, was evidently not written merely to shock the public. Even if Mr. Berezowsky had been tempted to take this road to notoriety, he probably would have realized that traffic on it is now diverted to obscurity. No; his music is really quite lyric, opening with a clearly drawn if not especially compelling theme in the flute, which serves him well throughout. There are other themes, too, one of which, for violas, is rather attractive.

None of these themes undergoes any real development. They are tossed about and interwoven among the several choirs with considerable sense of instrumental values but without much apparent structural feeling. The slow movement is restful, and the Scherzo engaging in a quite Russian way. In the Finale the composer surrenders to Stravinsky. Here there is considerable rhythmic emphasis, and a great deal of noise. By reason of its energy and vitality, transmitted through a stirring performance under the composer's own vigorous baton, the symphony won a notable success.

Mr. Zighera brought to the interpretation of Mendelssohn's Concerto a good left-hand technique, excellent bowing and strong musical feeling. His tone is small and rather feminine, and for this reason he doubtless was well advised to choose this concerto for his American debut, rather than a more robust vehicle. His performance was well received.

The concert opened with a thrilling proclamation of the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture and closed with a performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" in which the meretriciousness of the music was almost forgotten in the virtuosity of its utterance. Mr. Burgin (concertmaster), Mr. Laurent (flute), Mr. Speyer (English horn) and Mr. B. Zighera (harp) particularly distinguished themselves in their solo passages.

y Orchestra Bach Festival

BOSTON, March 21—A Bach festival to be given through next week will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half-century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening will be dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through thirty-seven years. Bliss Perry, the writer who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has announced that Bach's monumental mass in B minor will open the festival on March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificent will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "well-tempered chlavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the Societe des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory, and formerly with this orchestra.

Continued From Tenth Page.

Other events of the fiftieth anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of fifty years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MAR 22 1931

BACH FESTIVAL

The Bach Festival, crowning event of the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open Tuesday afternoon and evening with the performances of the B minor Mass, to be presented in two divisions, beginning at 4:30 and 8:30, respectively. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and these soloists will assist the orchestra: Amy Evans, soprano; Adelle Alberts, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Dr. Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct.

Wednesday evening will be dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder and supporter, Henry L. Higginson. Professor Bliss Perry of Harvard will make the address, Wallace Goodrich will be heard in some of the organ music of Bach, and Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, who has come from France for the occasion, will play a group of pieces for the harpsichord.

Thursday evening there will be heard the Second Brandenburg Concerto, for solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet; the Piano Concerto in D minor, in which Alexander Borovsky will be the soloist, and the Magnificat, with the choruses and soloists who are to be heard in the Mass.

Friday afternoon a regular concert will be a part of this Bach Festival, with its programme listing the Suite for Orchestra No. 3, the Concerto for two violins, in which Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz of the first desk of the orchestra's first violins will be the soloist, and two cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit," with the Bach Cantata Club supplying the singers.

The programme of Saturday evening's concert, although resembling that of Friday afternoon, will on this occasion not be identical. Again there will be two cantatas, given with the assistance of the Bach Cantata Club, "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein Feste Burg"; the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto, for solo piano, violin and flute, and Preludes and Fugues from "The Well-Tempered Clavichord," performed by Alexander Borovsky, make the rest of the programme.

On Sunday afternoon and evening, at 4:30 and at 8:30, as on the previous Tuesday, the B minor Mass will be repeated as a Pension Fund Concert, with the same soloists and choruses.

See Page 153 for Mar. 21

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

MAR 31

When Stravinsky's latest work, "Symphonie de Psaumes," was presented to New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra the other day, Lawrence Gilman, critic of the Herald Tribune, hailed it as a masterpiece.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

MAR 22 1931

* * *

"THERE WAS a dead silence. Then they all burst out laughing. And I realized that I had created a record as far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra was concerned. Nobody had dared to criticize them like that since the time of their formation."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

MAR 12 1931

MME. MATZENAUER SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Contralto Will Sing Bach Aria and a Group of Four by Mahler.

Margarethe Matzenauer, noted contralto, will be soloist at the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra's concerts at the Odeon tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

Mme. Matzenauer was originally engaged for the final concert of the orchestra's season. Her date was announced by the Symphony Society at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which, with a special Bach festival, is celebrating its fifty-th year.

The program:

Suite in C major
I. Ouverture.
II. Courante.
III. Gavotte I; Gavotte II.
IV. Forlane.
V. Menuet I; Menuet II.
VI. Bourree I; Bourree II.
VII. Passepied I; Passepied II.

Aria, "O, Pardon Me, My God," from the St. Matthew Passion.....Bach
Mme. Matzenauer.

Music from Symphony No. 7
E major.....Mahler
With orchestra.
Liebst du um Schonheit.....Mahler
Ich bin der Welt abhanden gekommen.
Rheinlegendchen.
Urlicht.
Mme. Matzenauer.

Suite to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press.

MAR 15 1931

A FORMER ALBANIAN—oh, way back past our recollection but not past hearing other people talk about—is the subject of an editorial in The Hartford Courant of March 9. It says:

"The fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now being celebrated, is also the thirtieth anniversary of the editorship of its program books by Mr. Philip Hale. All who know the excellences of the orchestra are likewise familiar with the little pamphlets which too many concert goers leave in their seats. Connoisseurs of music long since learned that the booklets well repaid leisurely perusal in the quiet of the study, for into them Mr. Hale has poured the learning of a well stocked mind."

Phil Hale—that's how old Albanians speak of him—was at one time a columnist of the Albany Evening Journal—long before they called them columnists, we guess. And Harold Frederic, author of a once famous novel, "The Damnation of Theron Ware" was editorial writer and Harold McGrath writer of best sellers, was a reporter. Hooray for Albany newspapers as a literary training ground!—W. H. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE

MAR 14 1931

Boston Symphony Bach Festival.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary this month and as a fitting celebration six Bach programs are to be given.

In 1881 Major Henry L. Higginson founded the orchestra. His dream was to give America an orchestra of permanent standing, and one comparable with the best of Europe. How far he has succeeded the world knows. So it is that the present sponsors are dedicating this program to the memory of this noble man.

Participating in the event are the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club. Margaret Matzenhauer is soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, bass; Wallace Goodrich, organist; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord, and Alexander Borowsky, piano. Of course the Boston Symphony under George Koussevitzky will supply the orchestral numbers and the background.

Would that Pittsburgh had a Major Higginson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 18 1931

Borovsky Here for Bach Festival

Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, who has not been heard here for several seasons, arrived yesterday on the Aquitania to take part in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach Festival, to be held in Boston from March 24 to 29.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

MAR 1[illegible] 1931

Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Amy Evans, soprano, and Fraser Gange, barytone, have been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as soloists in its Bach festival, beginning in Boston on March 22.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

MAR 15 1931

About Bach Festival To Be Held Soon

Boston Symphony Plans Celebration for March 24-29

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Concluding the celebration of a glorious half century of musical attainment that is unsurpassed in the annals of the tonal art, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Sergei Koussevitsky, will present a Bach Festival, embracing the most representative orchestral, choral and chamber music of Johann Sebastian Bach, at Symphony Hall, Boston, on consecutive days from March 24-29 inclusive.

Music lovers who attend this brilliant event can be assured of a thrilling musical experience that will be a memory to be cherished in the years to come.

This highlight of the musical season is given in honor of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson and there could be no more fitting tribute to the man and art devotee whose love for music made possible the world's greatest orchestra, the Boston Symphony. So long as music endures as a medium of expression for human kind, the name of Henry Lee Higginson, will be remembered with reverent appreciation.

Would that Pittsburgh could point with pride to a music-conscious man such as Higginson, who for a period of 37 years was the sole sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival will be inaugurated with an address by Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend.

Assisting in the gala presentation are the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club conducted by Dr. Archibald Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth.

The list of soloists is a distinguished one; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone, who form the vocal quartet of the choral scores.

Bach's monumental Mass in B minor opens the Festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the following Sunday. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the Orchestra for both works. Four Cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) will be presented on March 27-28 by the Bach Cantata Club.

The orchestral works include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and the first and third Suites. Richard Burgin, concert master and Julius Theodorowicz, assistant concert master will play the double concerto for two violins. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the D minor piano concerto, and also the preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered Clavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens," will also come from abroad to perform a group of harpsichord pieces. The organ numbers are to be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory of Music, and formerly organist of the orchestra.

Among the interesting events that have been a part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's golden jubilee were the first productions of scores composed especially for this occasion by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. The fiftieth season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the Orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of a half hundred years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HAVERHILL, MASS
EVE. GAZETTE

MAR 19 1931

MUSIC MI[illegible]

BACH'S HUMANISM

Johann Sebastian Bach's birth anniversary March 21 (1685-1750) annually excites interest in Bach the musician and Bach the man. He was orphaned at 10. When 18 his salary was about $57 annually, earned by playing the organ three times a week and giving instruction in singing to a small pupil choir, of the church at Arnstadt.

High church officials and organists were not always in accord in Bach's day and it is told by his biographers that, after his extremely promising beginning, people grew more and more dissatisfied with the manner in which he discharged his duties as organist. He was reproached for making his accompaniment for congregational singing so intricate that singers often completely lost the melody, and when the officiating clergyman declared his preludes too lengthy, he adopted the extreme and made them too short. Among other criticisms made by the consistory in charge of Bach's position was one to the effect that he had accompanied upon the organ, the singing of a "strange maiden." The "maiden" was declared to be his cousin, Maria Barbara Bach, daughter of Michael Bach, who became his wife, Oct. 17, 1707.

Four of their seven children reached maturity and two of these sons are known to have attained musical renown. His second marriage took place in 1721 to Anna Magdalena Wilke, a singer of 21, daughter of a trumpeter at Weissenfels. Bach was now 36 and during 28 years of happy wedded life 13 children were born to them. The unusual talent for music possessed by this wife was developed under his instruction to such a degree that she wrote parts to many of his church cantatas.

Bach's gifts as an artist were united with great clearness and acuteness of intellect, strength of will, a persistency that often amounted to obstinacy, love for order and high sense of duty. Conscious of his worth, he was without arrogance. He provided generously for his family and his home life was a happy one. His greatest pleasure was the concerts conducted with his wife and children and especially talented pupils.

The philanthropic and self-sacrificing spirit manifested by Bach towards his pupils was further exemplified in his family circle. In 1707 he bestowed upon a cousin in needy circumstances a part of his small salary. While in Weimar, he took his eldest brother's son into his home. Against his own interests he carried out with filial affection the testamentary bequests of an honored relative.

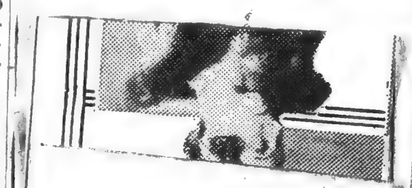
Bach was important as a man of strong and noble nature, whose life supports the belief that the truly great artist may also be a man worthy veneration.

NOTED IN THE NEWS

A Bach festival of orchestral, choral, and chamber music of Johann Sebastian Bach will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in Symphony hall, Boston, on the occasion of the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary, March 24, 25, 26, 27, 28 and 29. The Harvard Glee club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor; Radcliffe Choral society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor; Bach Cantata club; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ, and Bliss Perry, speaker, will participate in the program as arranged by Dr. Koussevitzky.

The second of the Music Supervisors National association, sectional conferences as planned in this season's series will take place at Syracuse, N. Y., March 18, 19 and 20, when the vitalization of vocal music and the Eastern Music camp, will be given first consideration in the discussions. The meeting for the southwest will be held in Colorado Springs, Colo., March 24-27. The California conference will be held March 30-April 2. The sessions for the northwest will take place at Spokane, Wash., April 6-8, and the north central will be held April 13-17, in Des Moines, Ia. The southern conference was held in Memphis, Tenn., March 11, 12 and 13.

E. B. F.



THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAR 21 1931

Musical Notes

NEW SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

A new symphony and a soloist newly come to America, says the C. S. Monitor, graced the fifth concert of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the evening of March 16. The symphony was the first adventure in this form by Nicolai Berezowsky, a young Russian now living in New York. The soloist was Leon Zighera, violinist, and brother of Alfred of the first desk of the orchestra's cellos, and of Bernard, its first harpist.

Born in Leningrad, Mr. Berezowsky migrated to the United States in 1922 and became a member of the New York Philharmonic, leading the second violin. His "Hebrew" Suite was performed in 1928 by the New York Philharmonic under Mengelberg. He has written chamber music, an operetta and a cantata.

This "Symphony in one movement"—really in four, played without pause—though it is without key designation, was evidently not written merely to shock the public. Even if Mr. Berezowsky had been tempted to take this road to notoriety, he probably would have realized that traffic on it is now diverted to obscurity. No; his music is really quite lyric, opening with a clearly drawn if not especially compelling theme in the flute, which serves him well throughout. There are other themes, too, one of which, for violas, is rather attractive.

None of these themes undergoes any real development. They are tossed about and interwoven among the several choirs with considerable sense of instrumental values but without much apparent structural feeling. The slow movement is restful, and the Scherzo engaging in a quite Russian way. In the Finale the composer surrenders to Stravinsky. Here there is considerable rhythmic emphasis, and a great deal of noise. By reason of its energy and vitality, transmitted through a stirring performance under the composer's own vigorous baton, the symphony won a notable success.

Mr. Zighera brought to the interpretation of Mendelssohn's Concerto a good left-hand technique, excellent bowing and strong musical feeling. His tone is small and rather feminine, and for this reason he doubtless was well advised to choose this concerto for his American debut, rather than a more robust vehicle. His performance was well received.

The concert opened with a thrilling proclamation of the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture and closed with a performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" in which the meretriciousness of the music was almost forgotten in the virtuosity of its utterance. Mr. Burgin (concertmaster), Mr. Laurent (flute), Mr. Speyer (English horn) and Mr. B. Zighera (harp) particularly distinguished themselves in their solo passages.

y Orchestra Bach Festival

BOSTON, March 21—A Bach festival to be given through next week will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half-century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening will be dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through thirty-seven years. Bliss Perry, the writer who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has announced that Bach's monumental mass in B minor will open the festival on March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificent will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "well-tempered chlavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of t[illegible]te des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory, and formerly with this orchestra.

Continued From Tenth Page.

Other events of the fiftieth anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of fifty years ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST

MAR 22 1931

BACH FESTIVAL

The Bach Festival, crowning event of the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open Tuesday afternoon and evening with the performances of the B minor Mass, to be presented in two divisions, beginning at 4:30 and 8:30, respectively. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and these soloists will assist the orchestra: Amy Evans, soprano; Adelle Alberts, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Dr. Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct.

Wednesday evening will be dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder and supporter, Henry L. Higginson. Professor Bliss Perry of Harvard will make the address, Wallace Goodrich will be heard in some of the organ music of Bach, and Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, who has come from France for the occasion, will play a group of pieces for the harpsichord.

Thursday evening there will be heard the Second Brandenburg Concerto, for solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet; the Piano Concerto in D minor, in which Alexander Borovsky will be the soloist, and the Magnificat, with the choruses and soloists who are to be heard in the Mass.

Friday afternoon a regular concert will be a part of this Bach Festival, with its programme listing the Suite for Orchestra No. 2, the Concerto for two violins, in which Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz of the first desk of the orchestra's first violins will be the soloist, and two cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit," with the Bach Cantata Club supplying the singers.

The programme of Saturday evening's concert, although resembling that of Friday afternoon, will on this occasion not be identical. Again there will be two cantatas, given with the assistance of the Bach Cantata Club, "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein Feste Burg"; the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto, for solo piano, violin and flute, and Preludes and Fugues from "The Well-Tempered Clavichord," performed by Alexander Borovsky, make the rest of the programme.

On Sunday afternoon and evening, at 4:30 and at 8:30, as on the previous Tuesday, the B minor Mass will be repeated as a Pension Fund Concert, with the same soloists and choruses.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

When Stravinsky's latest work, "Symphonie de Psaumes," was presented to New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra the other day, Lawrence Gilman, critic of the Herald Tribune, hailed it as a masterpiece.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

MAR 22 1931

"THERE WAS a dead silence. Then they all burst out laughing. And I realized that I had created a record as far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra was concerned. Nobody had dared to criticize them like that since the time of their formation."

See Page 153 for Mar. 21

152

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL
MAR 22 1931

Boston Group to Fete Anniversary

Bach Festival to be given through this week will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half-century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through thirty-seven years. Bliss Perry, the writer who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B minor which will open the Festival on Tuesday (March 24), and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four Cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano, Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano, Richard Crooks, tenor, and Frazer Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The Concerto for Two Violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered chiavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsicord.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 25 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S BACH FESTIVAL PLEASES

Opening of 50th Anniversary Observance Features Mass in B Minor in Superb Performance

By FRANCIS REGAL

Boston, March 24—The Bach festival given by the Boston Symphony orchestra as part of the celebration of the orchestra's 50th anniversary opened today with a superb performance of the greatest of all Bach's choral works, the Mass in B Minor under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky. The chorus, which sang magnificently, was made up of the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. The solo singers were Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer Richard Crooks, and Frazer Gange.

On account of the extreme length of the mass, which does not follow the conventional form and is never used as part of the Catholic church service, it was divided into two parts, the first beginning at 4.30 in the afternoon and the second at 8.30. This division may mar somewhat the cumulative effect of what is probably the mightiest choral work ever penned, but since the receptive capacity of the average listener is limited, appreciation was no doubt increased by this opportunity for rest.

It is quite possible, contrary to common opinion, to enjoy Bach's music without listening closely, the complicated counterpoint breaking upon the senses like the roll of the sea and the infinite variety of the wind. But or so rare and great an occasion as thi attention is of course on the strair and half of the mass made quit enough for one sitting.

From the first it was apparent tha Dr Koussevitzky, whose greatness a an orchestral conductor the whol world recognizes, is no less remark

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXPRESS
MAR 26 1931

Music and Musicians

By BRUNO DAVID USSHER

Orchestra Premieres 'Concerto Gregoriano' Today and Tomorrow

Ottorino Respighi's "Concerto Gregoriano" for violin and orchestra will be premiered this evening and tomorrow afternoon by the Philharmonic Orchestra, Albert Spalding being the soloist. Beside the Cesar Franck Symphony, the double program offers also the tone-poem "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss in memory of Walter Henry Rothwell, first conductor of the orchestra, who died in March 1927, at the height of his career. Both the Franck and the Strauss scores were favorites of the late maestro, to whom the Philharmonic ensemble will always be indebted for efficient organization and strong schooling, qualities which have rapidly placed it among the foremost symphonic bodies of the country.

Ottorino Respighi

Curious an incident it is that the "Concerto Gregoriano" is to be first heard here during a program honoring the memory of Mr. Rothwell, because the latter had planned to present it with the same soloist but a few weeks before his untimely demise. Mr. Spaulding's bookings preventing him attending rehearsal the day before the concert, the Beethoven Concerto was substituted.

ITALIAN OPUS

Ottorino Respighi is by no means an unfamiliar figure here. The prominent Italian composer, who lives in Rome, spent almost a month here two seasons ago when he gave a recital before "Pro-Musica." His "Fountains," "Pines" and "Festivals of Rome" have been performed repeatedly, local programs including also the "Birds," "Church Windows," an orchestral suite of "Old Airs and Dances with the Lute."

Written in 1921, the "Concerto Gregoriano" was published and premiered the following season. Historians disagree as to whether it was first played under the composer's baton at the Augusteo in Rome or under Dr. Karl Muck's direction in Hamburg. Suffice to state that Respighi is much esteemed in Germany, where his successful efforts to bring Italian composers back to more symphonic than operatic activities had been first acknowledged. The work is dedicated to Arrigo Serrato, distinguished Roman violinist. The orchestral setting calls for the following instruments:

Two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, kettledrums, celesta, harp and the usual strings.

EXPLAINS NAME

Respighi has explained the startling name of a composition, the secular form or traditional purpose of which was far removed from modes and moods of the church, which derived such musical development from the Gregorian chants. As it happened the Italian composer had been actually inspired by motives of the Gregorian chants. Moreover he wished to invest his music with the purity and deliberateness of form, characteristic of the religious music of the middle ages.

Albert Spalding first rendered the Concerto Gregoriano" May 15, 1924, at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris. The program annotator then commented on the nature of the music in relation to the title.

SOLO SIGNIFICANCE

"It will perhaps at first seem strange," the program note of that date reads, "that the composer of the 'Concerto Gregoriano' chose the form of the violin concerto as a medium wherewith to transport his listeners into the atmosphere of the church music of the middle ages—music so remote from all the complexities and the virtuosity of musical form in the last two centuries—a form predominantly instrumental. But on closer examination of this score one perceives that the work has few of the traits which usually characterize the instrumental concerto. The connection between the solo instrument and the orchestra has in this case quite a different significance. The solo violin plays, so to speak, the role of the cantor in the old religious service, while the orchestra represents the choir of believers.

"Every element of virtuosity, in the strict sense of the word, is excluded from this music—although that fact is not in conflict with the statement that the work is written in a manner advantageous for the player of the solo part."

There are three movements. The first: "Andante Tranquillo, A minor, in 12-8 time, later changes to "Allegro Mo[derato]" once in a ground. "Andant[e] in 5-4 t[ime] theme, d[ivi]sian cha[nge] which ca[n] "Alleluia, ergico," jubilant

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 1931

FESTIVAL CONCERT AT HUB MEMORIAL TO H. L. HIGGINSON

Relatives of Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Hear Address—Mme Patorni-Casadesus Plays

By FRANCIS REGAL

Boston, March 26—The second of the Bach festival concerts, held last night at Symphony hall, was made an impressive memorial to the founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Henry L. Higginson. The stage was beautifully decorated with plants and flowers and in the middle at the rear was a striking bust of him by a well-known artist, familiar to Bostonians and displaying to the audience the vivid and striking features of this notable friend of music.

On the stage was seated, to the right and left the officers and members of the orchestra, representatives of other orchestras and members of the founder's family, the audience rising to do honor to them. After the opening group of organ works, grave and noble in character and an impressive "In Memoriam," an address on the character and the life work of Maj Higginson, was given by Dr Bliss Perry, who knew him well and could speak on such an occasion with a certain intimacy. The address was admirably done, and was equally interesting to those who remember the old days and to the younger generation to whom the orchestra is of immemorial antiquity and its founder's career but a tradition.

Messages Read

In particular he brought out the bundle of contradictions in Maj Higginson's personality and the way in which the frustration of his own musical ambitions had given birth to the creating in Boston a great orchestra. Presumably the address will be published in permanent form and friends of the orchestra in Boston and elsewhere will be glad to have it. A number of letters and telegrams of congratulations from the representations of symphony orchestras in other cities were read from the stage.

A quite different side of Bach's work from that in the great "B minor mass" heard Wednesday night was brought forward in last night's program. For the mass great choral and orchestral forces are needed and it is to be heard only on notable occasions. In the main last night's concert was an organ recital and out of the ordinary only as the playing of Wallace Goodrich made it so. But aside from this it was exceptional in giving us a chance to hear, side by side with Bach's great organ works, examples of the lighter style which he used so happily in writing for the harpsichord.

This outmoded instrument, now coming again into fashion through a revival of interest in old things, was admirably played by Mme Patorni-Casadesus, who is well known to American music lovers through her association with the Society of Ancient Instruments. Her playing tonight delighted the audience. Her group of solos was made up of three numbers, the Italian concerto, the Fantasia No 3 in C minor, and the fugue in D minor. All of these are familiar to students of the piano, and are included in piano recital programs, but in hearing them on the instrument for which they were composed we can more fully realize the composer's intention.

As compared with the modern piano the harpsichord is an instrument of limited capacity, but it can render very beautifully music that fits it, even its dry brittleness of tone, resulting from the plucking of the string by a quill, has a charm of its own in music the texture of which is a little thin. Its tone seems light yet has carrying power, and the large audience in Symphony hall heard in their full beauty the elegant embellishments and florid figures of the Italian concerto and the other works played by Mme Patorni-Casadesus.

Italian Influence

Some serious-minded students of Bach have almost deplored the influence of Italian music on Bach as through his liking for it was a weakness, but in truth he owed much to Italy, and his study of Italian masters was an important factor in his development. Everybody knows how he went to the trouble of arranging and improving the violin sonatas of Vivaldi, a gifted virtuoso composer of no great depth, but endowed with grace and elegance and a master of the new idiom which the violin was creating in Italy. No doubt Bach admired these sonatas and saw in them qualities which he could use in his own music. He greatly liked gay, nimble and vivacious music, and did homage to both the French and the Italian style without deteriment to his rugged native Gothic.

Normally, of course, examples of this lighter genre would not stand beside works in the grand style. Bach himself, perhaps, would play his organ fugues in the church and his concertos, fugues, and so on at the little musical gatherings of his academic friends. But last night neither type suffered by the juxtaposition, and there was even an advantage, for an occasion like this, in having the contrast made so sharp. A much worse injury is done to Bach when his music is arranged, with much license for the piano, and then beaten fortissimo in a style which has neither the majesty of the organ nor the elegance of the clavier music that Bach composed.

Wallace Goodrich, an organist of taste and learning as well as of skill, gave what semed like authentic Bach in his playing of two fine groups, the first was made up of the fantasia in C minor, the adagio from the Toccata in C major and the fugue in C major. The second, closing the concert, comprised the chorale prelude "Schmuecke dich o liebe seele" and the brilliant and difficult fugue in G minor. From these organ works alone a modern listener would know that there were giants in those days and Mr Goodrich, while not pedantic about trying to reproduce the probable effect of the organ on which Bach played, did not unduly sophisticate the music with modern effects. Perhaps no one thing has wrought more damage to Bach in our time than the modernization of the organ in an effort to rival the quite different qualities of the orchestra. Some costly modern organs are unfit for the interpretation of Bach's music, but this is not true of the great organ in Symphony hall, as the noble and inspiring effects achieved by Mr Goodrich showed.

BROCKTON, MASS.
TIMES
MAR 26 193[1]

CHORAL ART CLUB TO SING WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Brockton Organization Begins Rehearsal of "The Rio Grande" for April 24 and 25.

The Brockton Choral Art club, which was one of the first organizations in the United States to present "The Rio Grande," that unusual number by Constant Lambert, which George Sawyer Dunham heard in England and introduced to Brockton, has been invited to sing the selection with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It is expected that 25 members of the Brockton club will accept the invitation and a large party went to Boston Wednesday night for the first rehearsal, held under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, director of Cecelia Singing society of Boston, and a member of the Boston Symphony. The members of the Brockton club join with members of the Cecelia society in the rendition of "The Rio Grande."

The number will be given at the regular Boston Symphony concert program Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 24 and 25, under Director Kousevitsky, conductor of the Symphony.

"The Rio Grande," an exotic number in unusual jazz style, was the outstanding offering of the annual concert of the Brockton Choral Art club given Feb. 15.

There was today none of the clu siness or slackness so often found large choruses. The singing was e pressive but it was also crisp, a when it should be detached it w clearly attached and fitted, like t strings, into the orchestral patte Some of the choral effects were beautiful as any music that could imagined, and the whole moved w rich fullness and ease.

All of the solo singer entered w into the spirit of the music, and t as their singing of the solos and ot was the remarkable thing was unusual excellence of the ensemble which solo voices in the orches took an important part.

At the concert tomorrow evening Bliss Perry will deliver an address on Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, in whose memory this festival is being given. The organist, Wallace Goodrich, will play two groups of Bach's works, including the Fantasia in C Minor, the Fugue in C Major, and the Fugue in G Minor. Mme Patorni-Casadesus will play a group of solos for the harpsichord including the Italian concerto.

At the close of the evening performance an extraordinary ovation was given to all concerned, the soloists, the orchestra, the chorus, the conductor, the associate conductors who trained the constituent choruses, and the instrumentalists who had so beautifully played obbligato parts. It is unlikely that in the half-century of the orchestra's wonderful history a greater demonstration has been made. The principals were recalled again and again and the audience found it hard to disperse.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
MAR 27 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving, on the 50th anniversary of its founding, a Bach Festival. Music lovers, at the first performances, could only sit in something like a mood of worship before the perfect rendition of the work of one of whom Schumann said, "Music owes as much to Bach as a religion to its founder!"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 29 193[1]

Boston's Bach Festival

The Boston Symphony orchestra has done a fine thing in making its jubilee celebration a memorial to its founder, Henry L. Higginson, and in taking the occasion to give a Bach festival. So musical a city, of course, hears a great deal of Bach's music, year in and year out. It figures in the programs of organ recitals, of piano recitals, of symphony concerts. But many of his greatest works call for resources not ordinarily available, and others lie to one side of ordinary concert giving. One might go to concerts year after year without having a chance to appreciate the astonishing range and variety of Bach's creative work.

Such a chance is given in the festival at Symphony hall which closes today, and perhaps in its long and honorable record the orchestra has done nothing of higher educational value. With the aid of a fine chorus of Harvard and Radcliffe students, competent soloists and the unsurpassed instrumental virtuosi of the orchestra, Dr Koussevitzky has been able to interpret both the weighty and the lighter works of Bach with rare fidelity. The result has been a cumulative impression that will not soon be forgotten.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE
MAR 31 1931

BACH FESTIVAL BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA A SUCCESS

The Bach festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Sunday proved the peak of the 50th anniversary season of the great orchestra, which has been celebrated with many events. The Bach festival which was given on six days, from March 24-29, was attended by overflowing audiences. At the conclusion of the Mass in B minor on Sunday night, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor, together with the chorus, the orchestra and the soloists were given a prolonged and tumultuous demonstration.

BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
MAR 3[1] 193[1]

KOUSSEVITZKY GETS OVATION AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

WITH A REPETITION of the B minor Mass, for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Bach Festival at Symphony Hall came to a close.

Instead of describing this performance let us refer to the scope of this Festival, the extraordinary pains with which it was planned and the excellence of its accomplishment. For the first time in Boston we were able to hear within a week a fine variety and selection of the works of the great Johann Sebastian. Many of the compositions were masterpieces on a level never surpassed by mortal pen. None of them was without musical interest. The grandeur and the humanity of Bach were made evident to twentieth century ears.

No more fitting monument than this Festival, it seems to us, could have been erected in this Golden Jubilee year of the orchestra in honor of its founder and principal sustainer—Henry Lee Higginson. Many workers were responsible for this achievement. But it is natural to single out for especial praise the principal moving force behind the Festival, as the huge audience last night singled him out in the greatest demonstration we have ever heard or seen in Symphony Hall—the orchestra's conductor, Serge Koussevitzy.

Esta Cantor, soprano, was making her debut meanwhile before a friendly audience at Jordan Hall. To write about her on the basis of the few numbers of the excellent program which we were able to hear would do her an injustice, for she was palpably nervous. Later, according to reliable report, she disclosed a lyric voice of good quality, sound musicianship and interpretative skill.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
NEWS
MAR 30 1931

the Irish society.

For putting a dream into fact, and a fact that has already lasted 50 years and promises continuous survival, has anyone done better than the late Major Henry L. Higginson, who gave so generously to the establishment of Boston's Symphony Orchestra?

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL
MAR 22 1931

Boston Group to Fete Anniversary

Bach Festival to be given through this week will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half-century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through thirty-seven years. Bliss Perry, the writer who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B minor which will open the Festival on Tuesday (March 24), and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four Cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano, Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano, Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The Concerto for Two Violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered chlavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsicord.

BROCKTON, MASS.
TIMES
MAR 26 1931

food, and should be fed as well as care used in feeding.

Strength comes by work, kn by thinking.

...tion Organization Begins Rehearsal of "The Rio Grande" for April 24 and 25.

The Brockton Choral Art club, which was one of the first organizations in the United States to present "The Rio Grande," that unusual number by Constant Lambert, which George Sawyer Dunham heard in England and introduced to Brockton, has been invited to sing the selection with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It is expected that 25 members of the Brockton club will accept the invitation and a large party went to Boston Wednesday night for the first rehearsal, held under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, director of Cecelia Singing society of Boston, and a member of the Boston Symphony. The members of the Brockton club join with members of the Cecelia society in the rendition of "The Rio Grande."

The number will be given at the regular Boston Symphony concert program Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 24 and 25, under Director Kousevitsky, conductor of the Symphony.

"The Rio Grande," an exotic number in unusual jazz style, was the outstanding offering of the annual concert of the Brockton Choral Art club given Feb. 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
MAR 2 - 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving, on the 50th anniversary of its founding, a Bach Festival. Music lovers, at the first performances, could only sit in something like a mood of worship before the perfect rendition of the work of one of whom Schumann said, "Music owes as much to Bach as a religion to its founder!"

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 25 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S BACH FESTIVAL PLEASES

Opening of 50th Anniversary Observance Features Mass in B Minor in Superb Performance

By FRANCIS REGAL

Boston, March 24—The Bach festival given by the Boston Symphony orchestra as part of the celebration of the orchestra's 50th anniversary opened today with a superb performance of the greatest of all Bach's choral works, the Mass in B Minor under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky. The chorus, which sang magnificently, was made up of the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. The solo singers were Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer Richard Crooks, and Frazer Gange.

On account of the extreme length of the mass, which does not follow the conventional form and is never used as part of the Catholic church service, it was divided into two parts, the first beginning at 4.30 in the afternoon and the second at 8.30. This division may mar somewhat the cumulative effect of what is probably the mightiest choral work ever penned, but since the receptive capacity of the average listener is limited, appreciation was no doubt increased by this opportunity for rest.

It is quite possible, contrary to common opinion, to enjoy Bach's music without listening closely, the complicated counterpoint breaking upon the senses like the roll of the sea and the infinite variety of the wind. But of so rare and great an occasion as this attention is of course on the strain and half of the mass made quit enough for one sitting.

From the first it was apparent tha Dr Koussevitzky, whose greatness a an orchestral conductor the whol world recognizes, is no less remark ably gifted in the somewhat differer matter of conducting a large chort of amateur singers. Some good con ductors fail in this from trying fo too much, or from not having a def nite enough perception of what can l done. Dr Koussevitzky knows wh he wants and what he can get, n gets it with admirable certainty a power.

There was today none of the clu siness or slackness so often found large choruses. The singing was e pressive but it was also crisp, a when it should be detached it w clearly attached and fitted, like t strings, into the orchestral patte Some of the choral effects were beautiful as any music that could imagined, and the whole moved w rich fullness and ease.

All of the solo singer entered w into the spirit of the music, and t as their singing of the solos and ou was the remarkable thing was unusual excellence of the ensemble which solo voices in the orches took an important part.

At the concert tomorrow evening Bliss Perry will deliver an address on Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, in whose memory this festival is being given. The organist, Wallace Goodrich, will play two groups of Bach's works, including the Fantasia in C Minor, the Fugue in C Major, and the Fugue in G Minor. Mme Patorni-Casadesus will play a group of solos for the harpsichord including the Italian concerto.

At the close of the evening performance an extraordinary ovation was given to all concerned, the soloists, the orchestra, the chorus, the conductor, the associate conductors who trained the constituent choruses, and the instrumentalists who had so beautifully played obbligato parts. It is unlikely that in the half-century of the orchestra's wonderful history a greater demonstration has been made. The principals were recalled again and again and the audience found it hard to disperse.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE
MAR 31 1931

BACH FESTIVAL BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA A SUCCESS

The Bach festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Sunday proved the peak of the 50th anniversary season of the great orchestra, which has been celebrated with many events. The Bach festival which was given on six days, from March 24-29, was attended by overflowing audiences. At the conclusion of the Mass in B minor on Sunday night, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor, together with the chorus, the orchestra and the soloists were given a prolonged and tumultuous demonstration.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXPRESS
MAR 26 1931

Music and Musicians

By BRUNO DAVID USSHER

Orchestra Premieres 'Concerto Gregoriano' Today and Tomorrow

Ottorino Respighi's "Concerto Gregoriano" for violin and orchestra will be premiered this evening and tomorrow afternoon by the Philharmonic Orchestra, Albert Spalding being the soloist. Beside the Cesar Franck Symphony, the double program offers also the tone-poem "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss in memory of Walter Henry Rothwell, first conductor of the orchestra, who died in March 1927, at the height of his career. Both the Franck and the Strauss scores were favorites of the late maestro, to whom the Philharmonic ensemble will always be indebted for efficient organization and strong schooling, qualities which have rapidly placed it among the foremost symphonic bodies of the country.

Ottorino Respighi

Curious an incident it is that the "Concerto Gregoriano" is to be first heard here during a program honoring the memory of Mr. Rothwell, because the latter had planned to present it with the same soloist but a few weeks before his untimely demise. Mr. Spaulding's bookings preventing him attending rehearsal the day before the concert, the Beethoven Concerto was substituted.

ITALIAN OPUS

Ottorino Respighi is by no means an unfamiliar figure here. The prominent Italian composer, who lives in Rome, spent almost a month here two seasons ago when he gave a recital before "Pro-Musica." His "Fountains," "Pines" and "Festivals of Rome" have been performed repeatedly, local programs including also the "Birds," "Church Windows," an orchestral suite of "Old Airs and Dances with the Lute."

Written in 1921, the "Concerto Gregoriano" was published and premiered the following season. Historians disagree as to whether it was first played under the composer's baton at the Augusteo in Rome or under Dr. Karl Muck's direction in Hamburg. Suffice to state that Respighi is much esteemed in Germany, where his successful efforts to bring Italian composers back to more symphonic than operatic activities had been first acknowledged. The work is dedicated to Arrigo Serrato, distinguished Roman violinist. The orchestral setting calls for the following instruments:

Two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, kettledrums, celesta, harp and the usual strings.

EXPLAINS NAME

Respighi has explained the startling name of a composition, the secular form or traditional purpose of which was far removed from modes and moods of the church, which derived such musical development from the Gregorian chants. As it happened the Italian composer had been actually inspired by motives of the Gregorian chants. Moreover he wished to invest his music with the purity and deliberateness of form, characteristic of the religious music of the middle ages.

Albert Spalding first rendered the "Concerto Gregoriano" May 15, 1924, at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris. The program annotator then commented on the nature of the music in relation to the title.

SOLO SIGNIFICANCE

"It will perhaps at first seem strange," the program note of that date reads, "that the composer of the 'Concerto Gregoriano' chose the form of the violin concerto as a medium wherewith to transport his listeners into the atmosphere of the church music of the middle ages—music so remote from all the complexities and the virtuosity of musical form in the last two centuries—a form predominantly instrumental. But on closer examination of this score one perceives that the work has few of the traits which usually characterize the instrumental concerto. The connection between the solo instrument and the orchestra has in this case quite a different significance. The solo violin plays, so to speak, the role of the cantor in the old religious service, while the orchestra represents the choir of believers.

"Every element of virtuosity, in the strict sense of the word, is excluded from this music—although that fact is not in conflict with the statement that the work is written in a manner advantageous for the player of the solo part."

There are three movements. The first: "Andante Tranquillo, A minor, in 12-8 time, later changes to "Allegro Molto Moderato" begins at once in a mood of ecclesiastic background. The second movement: "Andante Espressivo E Sostenuto," in 5-4 time, commences with a solo theme, distinctly related to Gergorian chant. The third movement, which carries the special heading "Alleluia," is marked "Allegro Energico," in 4-4 time, emphasizes a jubilant A major tonality.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 29 1931

Boston's Bach Festival

The Boston Symphony orchestra has done a fine thing in making its jubilee celebration a memorial to its founder, Henry L. Higginson, and in taking the occasion to give a Bach festival. So musical a city, of course, hears a great deal of Bach's music, year in and year out. It figures in the programs of organ recitals, of piano recitals, of symphony concerts. But many of his greatest works call for resources not ordinarily available, and others lie to one side of ordinary concert giving. One might go to concerts year after year without having a chance to appreciate the astonishing range and variety of Bach's creative work.

Such a chance is given in the festival at Symphony hall which closes today, and perhaps in its long and honorable record the orchestra has done nothing of higher educational value. With the aid of a fine chorus of Harvard and Radcliffe students, competent soloists and the unsurpassed instrumental virtuosi of the orchestra, Dr Koussevitzky has been able to interpret both the weighty and the lighter works of Bach with rare fidelity. The result has been a cumulative impression that will not soon be forgotten.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 1931

FESTIVAL CONCERT AT HUB MEMORIAL TO H. L. HIGGINSON

Relatives of Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra Hear Address—Mme Patorni-Casadesus Plays

By FRANCIS REGAL

Boston, March 26—The second of the Bach festival concerts, held last night at Symphony hall, was made an impressive memorial to the founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Henry L. Higginson. The stage was beautifully decorated with plants and flowers and in the middle at the rear was a striking bust of him by a well-known artist, familiar to Bostonians and displaying to the audience the vivid and striking features of this notable friend of music.

On the stage was seated, to the right and left the officers and members of the orchestra, representatives of other orchestras and members of the founder's family, the audience rising to do honor to them. After the opening group of organ works, grave and noble in character and an impressive "In Memoriam," an address on the character and the life work of Maj Higginson, was given by Dr Bliss Perry, who knew him well and could speak on such an occasion with a certain intimacy. The address was admirably done, and was equally interesting to those who remember the old days and to the younger generation to whom the orchestra is of immemorial antiquity and its founder's career but a tradition.

Messages Read

In particular he brought out the bundle of contradictions in Maj Higginson's personality and the way in which the frustration of his own musical ambitions had given birth to the creating in Boston a great orchestra. Presumably the address will be published in permanent form and friends of the orchestra in Boston and elsewhere will be glad to have it. A number of letters and telegrams of congratulations from the representations of symphony orchestras in other cities were read from the stage.

A quite different side of Bach's work from that in the great "B minor mass" heard Wednesday night was brought forward in last night's program. For the mass great choral and orchestral forces are needed and it is to be heard only on notable occasions. In the main last night's concert was an organ recital and out of the ordinary only as the playing of Wallace Goodrich made it so. But aside from this it was exceptional in giving us a chance to hear, side by side with Bach's great organ works, examples of the lighter style which he used so happily in writing for the harpsichord.

This outmoded instrument, now coming again into fashion through a revival of interest in old things, was admirably played by Mme Patorni-Casadesus, who is well known to American music lovers through her association with the Society of Ancient Instruments. Her playing tonight delighted the audience. Her group of solos was made up of three numbers, the Italian concerto, the Fantasia No 3 in C minor, and the fugue in D minor. All of these are familiar to students of the piano, and are included in piano recital programs, but in hearing them on the instrument for which they were composed we can more fully realize the composer's intention.

As compared with the modern piano the harpsichord is an instrument of limited capacity, but it can render very beautifully music that fits it, even its day brittleness of tone, resulting from the plucking of the string by a quill, has a charm of its own in music the texture of which is a little thin. Its tone seems light yet has carrying power, and the large audience in Symphony hall heard in their full beauty the elegant embellishments and florid figures of the Italian concerto and the other works played by Mme Patorni-Casadesus.

Italian Influence

Some serious-minded students of Bach have almost deplored the influence of Italian music on Bach as through his liking for it was a weakness, but in truth he owed much to Italy, and his study of Italian masters was an important factor in his development. Everybody knows how he went to the trouble of arranging and improving the violin sonatas of Vivaldi, a gifted virtuoso composer of no great depth, but endowed with grace and elegance and a master of the new idiom which the violin was creating in Italy. No doubt Bach admired these sonatas and saw in them qualities which he could use in his own music. He greatly liked gay, nimble and vivacious music, and did homage to both the French and the Italian style without deteriment to his rugged native Gothic.

Normally, of course, examples of this lighter genre would not stand beside works in the grand style. Bach himself, perhaps, would play his organ fugues in the church and his concertos, fugues, and so on at the little musical gatherings of his academic friends. But last night neither type suffered by the juxtaposition, and there was even an advantage, for an occasion like this, in having the contrast made so sharp. A much worse injury is done to Bach when his music is arranged, with much license for the piano, and then beaten fortissimo in a style which has neither the majesty of the organ nor the elegance of the clavier music that Bach composed.

Wallace Goodrich, an organist of taste and learning as well as of skill, gave what semed like authentic Bach in his playing of two fine groups, the first was made up of the fantasia in C minor, the adagio from the Toccata in C major and the fugue in C major. The second, closing the concert, comprised the chorale prelude "Schmuecke dich o liebe seele" and the brilliant and difficult fugue in G minor. From these organ works alone a modern listener would know that there were giants in those days and Mr Goodrich, while not pedantic about trying to reproduce the probable effect of the organ on which Bach played, did not unduly sophisticate the music with modern effects. Perhaps no one thing has wrought more damage to Bach in our time than the modernization of the organ in an effort to rival the quite different qualities of the orchestra. Some costly modern organs are unfit for the interpretation of Bach's music, but this is not true of the great organ in Symphony hall, as the noble and inspiring effects achieved by Mr Goodrich showed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
NEWS
MAR 30 1931

For putting a dream into fact, and a fact that has already lasted 50 years and promises continuous survival, has anyone done better than the late Major Henry L. Higginson, who gave so generously to the establishment of Boston's Symphony Orchestra?

Mansfield Republican
Mar 25-1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S BACH FESTIVAL PLEASES

Opening of 50th Anniversary Observance Features Mass in B Minor in Superb Performance

By FRANCIS REGAL

Boston, March 24—The Bach festival given by the Boston Symphony orchestra as part of the celebration of the orchestra's 50th anniversary opened today with a superb performance of the greatest of all Bach's choral works, the Mass in B Minor under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The chorus, which sang magnificently, was made up of the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. The solo singers were Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer Richard Crooks, and Frazer Gange.

On account of the extreme length of the mass, which does not follow the conventional form and is never used as part of the Catholic church service, it was divided into two parts, the first beginning at 4.30 in the afternoon and the second at 8.30. This division may mar somewhat the cumulative effect of what is probably the mightiest choral work ever penned, but since the receptive capacity of the average listener is limited, appreciation was no doubt increased by this opportunity for rest.

It is quite possible, contrary to common opinion, to enjoy Bach's music without listening closely, the complicated counterpoint breaking upon the senses like the roll of the sea and the infinite variety of the wind. But on so rare and great an occasion as this attention is of course on the strain, and half of the mass made quite enough for one sitting.

From the first it was apparent that Dr Koussevitzky, whose greatness as an orchestral conductor the whole world recognizes, is no less remarkably gifted in the somewhat different matter of conducting a large chorus of amateur singers. Some good conductors fail in this from trying for too much, or from not having a definite enough perception of what can be done. Dr Koussevitzky knows what he wants and what he can get, and gets it with admirable certainty and power.

There was today none of the clumsiness or slackness so often found in large choruses. The singing was expressive but it was also crisp, and when it should be detached it was clearly attached and fitted, like the strings, into the orchestral pattern. Some of the choral effects were as beautiful as any music that could be imagined, and the whole moved with rich fullness and ease.

All of the solo singer entered well into the spirit of the music, and fine as their singing of the solos and duets was the remarkable thing was the unusual excellence of the ensemble, in which solo voices in the orchestra took an important part.

At the concert tomorrow evening Bliss Perry will deliver an address on Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, in whose memory this festival is being given. The organist, Wallace Goodrich, will play two groups of Bach's works, including the Fantasia in C Minor, the Fugue in C Major, and the Fugue in G Minor. Mme Patorni-Casadesus will play a group of solos for the harpsichord including the Italian concerto.

At the close of the evening performance an extraordinary ovation was given to all concerned, the soloists, the orchestra, the chorus, the conductor,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
MAR 2 1 1931

Musical Notes

NEW SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

A new symphony and a soloist newly come to America, says the C. S. Monitor, graced the fifth concert of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the evening of March 16. The symphony was the first adventure in this form by Nicolai Berezowsky, a young Russian now living in New York. The soloist was Leon Zighera, violinist, and brother of Alfred of the first desk of the orchestra's cellos, and of Bernard, its first harpist.

Born in Leningrad, Mr. Berezowsky migrated to the United States in 1922 and became a member of the New York Philharmonic, leading the second violin. His "Hebrew" Suite was performed in 1928 by the New York Philharmonic under Mengelberg. He has written chamber music, an operetta and a cantata.

This "Symphony in one movement"—really in four, played without pause—though it is without key designation, was evidently not written merely to shock the public. Even if Mr. Berezowsky had been tempted to take this road to notoriety, he probably would

None of these themes undergoes any real development. They are tossed about and interwoven among the several choirs with considerable sense of instrumental values but without much apparent structural feeling. The slow movement is restful, and the Scherzo engaging in a quite Russian way. In the Finale the composer surrenders to Stravinsky. Here there is considerable rhythmic emphasis, and a great deal of noise. By reason of its energy and vitality, transmitted through a stirring performance under the composer's own vigorous baton, the symphony won a notable success.

Mr. Zighera brought to the interpretation of Mendelssohn's Concerto a good left-hand technique, excellent bowing and strong musical feeling. His tone is small and rather feminine, and for this reason he doubtless was well advised to choose this concerto for his American debut, rather than a more robust vehicle. His performance was well received.

The concert opened with a thrilling proclamation of the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture and closed with a formance of Rimsky-Korsoff's 'Spanish Caprice" in ich the meretriciousness of the sic was almost forgotten in the uosity of its utterance. Mr. gin (concertmaster), Mr. Laut (flute), Mr. Speyer (English rn) and Mr. B. Zighera (harp) rticularly distinguished themves in their solo passages.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLESTON, S. C.
POST
MAR 21 1931

An Attic Salt Shaker

By W. ORTON TEWSON

An amusing story, arising out of an attempt to establish a national theater in the United States years ago, is told by Owen Davis in his reminiscences, "I'd Like to Do It Again." "As You Like It" was chosen as the first production and in due time it opened before a brilliant audience in Washington, under the direction of Augustus Thomas, the well-known dramatist, and chairman of the national theater movement. The performance was not a success and the audience was cold and unresponsive.

* * *

As the curtain fell, Mrs. Thomas hurried backstage and found her husband sitting sadly amidst the scenery of Shakespeares' famous masterpiece with his head bowed and a look of deep dejection on his face. Her maternal instinct fully

Melba?" he said. 'I never heard of her.'"

Stoke Poges is but a few miles from London.

* * *

The first time Melba sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she did not fully realize the prestige which the orchestra had "in the eyes of all good Americans," although she knew after five minutes that she "had never sung to such a marvellous accompaniment."

"One day we were rehearsing the "Allegro ed il Penseroso" of Handel with flute obligato," she relates in her memoirs. "In an important part one of the instruments played a C natural instead of a C sharp.

"'C sharp—C sharp,' I shouted, turning round and pointing at the man who had made the mistake.

* * *

"There was a dead silence. Then they all burst out laughing. And I realized that I had created a record as far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra was concerned. Nobody had dared to criticize them like that since the time of their formation."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
MAR 2 9 1931

BACH FESTIVAL HELD BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Fiftieth Anniversary of Orchestra Observed and Memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson, Its Founder, Honored at Great Event

By Alexander Fried

LEIPZIG used to take its Bach stolidly by the week when the great cantor was directing the music of the St. Thomas Church. It has remained for a lively American city of the twentieth century to tune Johann Sebastian's solemn tone to the pitch of festivity. Ending today, six days of Bach have been celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and honoring its founder, Major Henry Lee Higginson.

For thirty-seven years Higginson alone supported the orchestra. On the foundation he built its present superb structure stands. The institution itself is not his only creation. Through it Boston's present interest in music is largely of his making.

Interest Manifested in Koussevitzky Program

This interest is measured by the program Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, arranged for Boston's Bach festival. The B minor Mass, divided for performance during the afternoon and evening, was sung on Tuesday and is being repeated today. Cantatas and works for organ, orchestra, piano, and harpsichord have been part of the six concerts. It is all earnest music, not a hint of cheap effect in the whole of it.

Participating artists have included Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer, Richard Crooks, and Fraser Gange, vocal soloists, Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, of France, harpsichordist, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

In the East, college singing groups often have serious artistic purposes. Mr. Koussevitzky was able to engage for the patrician festival the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, as well as the Bach Cantata Club.

Major Higginson conceived the plan of forming a first-rate orchestra for America when he was an humble student in Vienna. Years in the banking business gave him means. He caused musicians to be imported from Europe, and put at their head George Henschel.

Although his fortune was not extraordinary, he pursued his ambition relentlessly. The orchestra has become a model of artistic perfection for the world.

Major Higginson stands at the head of the list of honored Americans that have made this country eminent in the love of symphonic music. His type of patronage, an American phenomenon, is different from Europe's government patronage of the arts.

Governments abroad began their official concern with music when they assumed religious authorities previously centered in Rome. They needed organized music for the ceremonies of devotion. Meantime they could use their musical forces for their own entertainment.

Then secular music earned a prestige that kept it in government care even during the regimes of rulers who had no personal interest in it.

America Depends on Commercial Promotion

America, with its peculiar history, could not benefit its public with traditional musical organizations. The public had to depend for its art on the possibilities of its commercial promotion.

Music so developed could not be good enough. Here the Major Higginsons have entered the scene. Because of their own love of music they have made institutions for the use of all their compatriots. Such patrons have the temperament of the old noble troubadours. Only they let great orchestras sing for them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
MAR 2 1 193

Boston Bach Festival.

The great Bach Festival given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky begins Tuesday afternoon when the B minor Mass will be given. The Festival will close Sunday with the same work. Practically the entire series of concerts is already subscribed but the public may purchase tickets to either of the performances of the Mass.

The Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club are making up the chorus. Among those who will appear as soloists are Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor and Fraser Gange, baritone, all of whom will be heard in the Mass. Alexander Borovsky, pianist and Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichordist will also be heard.

Tuesday and Friday concerts will be given in the afternoon and the Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday concerts in the evening. The Sunday performances are at 4.30 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 21 1931

Eustache Strasser.

Special to The New York Times.

WESTWOOD, Mass., March 20.—Eustache Strasser, one of the three living musicians who were members of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra when it was formed in 1881, died here today at the home of his only daughter, Mrs. Robert M. Currier. He was 83 years old. Mr. Strasser was born in Wurzburg, Bavaria. He held the position of first clarinetist with the Symphony Orchestra from 1881 to 1888. For fifty-five years he taught in Boston.

153

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER
MAR 21 1931

MUSICAL EVENTS

Things Go Russian — An American Symphony —And Some Revivals That Almost Revive

THERE was a ponderable Slavic invasion of the upper Fifties when the Russkaya Grand Opera Company hired a hall (Mecca Temple) for performances of Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff" and "Khovanchina," while Mr. Koussevitzky brought his excellent Boston musicians to Carnegie Hall for two hearings of Stravinsky's recent "Symphonie de Psaumes."

STRAVINSKY composed his "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus and the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nobody was cheated. Of course, as one eminent American musician suggested, it's always safe to set the Psalms, but Stravinsky went about it in his own way. The orchestra functions without violins and violas, and from the manner in which certain 'cello passages were used, as well as the generally massive scoring, I fancy that Prince Igor was trying to convert his ensemble into an organ. The most impressive of the three movements was the Alleluia, a comparatively simple setting, intoned

Manchester Republican
March 27 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S BACH FESTIVAL PLEASES

Opening of 50th Anniversary Observance Features Mass in B Minor in Superb Performance

By FRANCIS REGAL

Boston, March 24—The Bach festival given by the Boston Symphony orchestra as part of the celebration of the orchestra's 50th anniversary opened today with a superb performance of the greatest of all Bach's choral works, the Mass in B Minor under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky. The chorus, which sang magnificently, was made up of the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. The solo singers were Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer Richard Crooks, and Frazer Gange.

On account of the extreme length of the mass, which does not follow the conventional form and is never used as part of the Catholic church service, it was divided into two parts, the first beginning at 4.30 in the afternoon and the second at 8.30. This division may mar somewhat the cumulative effect of what is probably the mightiest choral work ever penned, but since the receptive capacity of the average listener is limited, appreciation was no doubt increased by this opportunity for rest.

It is quite possible, contrary to common opinion, to enjoy Bach's music without listening closely, the complicated counterpoint breaking upon the senses like the roll of the sea and the infinite variety of the wind. But on so rare and great an occasion as this attention is of course on the strain, and half of the mass made quite enough for one sitting.

From the first it was apparent that Dr Koussevitzky, whose greatness as an orchestral conductor the whole world recognizes, is no less remarkably gifted in the somewhat different matter of conducting a large chorus of amateur singers. Some good conductors fail in this from trying for too much, or from not having a definite enough perception of what can be done. Dr Koussevitzky knows what he wants and what he can get, and gets it with admirable certainty and power.

There was today none of the clumsiness or slackness so often found in large choruses. The singing was expressive but it was also crisp, and when it should be detached it was clearly attached and fitted, like the strings, into the orchestral pattern. Some of the choral effects were as beautiful as any music that could be imagined, and the whole moved with rich fullness and ease.

All of the solo singer entered well into the spirit of the music, and fine as their singing of the solos and duets was the remarkable thing was the unusual excellence of the ensemble, in which solo voices in the orchestra took an important part.

At the concert tomorrow evening Bliss Perry will deliver an address on Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, in whose memory this festival is being given. The organist, Wallace Goodrich, will play two groups of Bach's works, including the Fantasia in C Minor, the Fugue in C Major, and the Fugue in G Minor. Mme Patorni-Casadesus will play a group of solos for the harpsichord including the Italian concerto.

At the close of the evening performance an extraordinary ovation was given to all concerned, the soloists, the orchestra, the chorus, the conductor,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
MAR 29 1931

BACH FESTIVAL HELD BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Fiftieth Anniversary of Orchestra Observed and Memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson, Its Founder, Honored at Great Event

By Alexander Fried

LEIPZIG used to take its Bach stolidly by the week when the great cantor was directing the music of the St. Thomas Church. It has remained for a lively American city of the twentieth century to tune Johann Sebastian's solemn tone to the pitch of festivity. Ending today, six days of Bach have been celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and honoring its founder, Major Henry Lee Higginson.

For thirty-seven years Higginson alone supported the orchestra. On the foundation he built its present superb structure stands. The institution itself is not his only creation. Through it Boston's present interest in music is largely of his making.

Interest Manifested in Koussevitzky Program

This interest is measured by the program Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, arranged for Boston's Bach festival. The B minor Mass, divided for performance during the afternoon and evening, was sung on Tuesday and is being repeated today. Cantatas and works for organ, orchestra, piano, and harpsichord have been part of the six concerts. It is all earnest music, not a hint of cheap effect in the whole of it.

Participating artists have included Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer, Richard Crooks, and Fraser Gange, vocal soloists, Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, of France, harpsichordist, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

In the East, college singing groups often have serious artistic purposes. Mr. Koussevitzky was able to engage for the patrician festival the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, as well as the Bach Cantata Club.

Major Higginson conceived the plan of forming a first-rate orchestra for America when he was an humble student in Vienna. Years in the banking business gave him means. He caused musicians to be imported from Europe, and put at their head George Henschel.

Although his fortune was not extraordinary, he pursued his ambition relentlessly. The orchestra has become a model of artistic perfection for the world.

Major Higginson stands at the head of the list of honored Americans that have made this country eminent in the love of symphonic music. His type of patronage, an American phenomenon, is different from Europe's government patronage of the arts.

Governments abroad began their official concern with music when they assumed religious authorities previously centered in Rome. They needed organized music for the ceremonies of devotion. Meantime they could use their musical forces for their own entertainment.

Then secular music earned a prestige that kept it in government care even during the regimes of rulers who had no personal interest in it.

America Depends on Commercial Promotion

America, with its peculiar history, could not benefit its public with traditional musical organizations. The public had to depend for its art on the possibilities of its commercial promotion.

Music so developed could not be good enough. Here the Major Higginsons have entered the scene. Because of their own love of music they have made institutions for the use of all their compatriots. Such patrons have the temperament of the old noble troubadours. Only they let great orchestras sing for them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
MAR 21 1931

Musical Notes

NEW SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

A new symphony and a soloist newly come to America, says the C. S. Monitor, graced the fifth concert of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the evening of March 16. The symphony was the first adventure in this form by Nicolai Berezowsky, a young Russian now living in New York. The soloist was Leon Zighera, violinist, and brother of Alfred of the first desk of the orchestra's cellos, and of Bernard, its first harpist.

Born in Leningrad, Mr. Berezowsky migrated to the United States in 1922 and became a member of the New York Philharmonic, leading the second violin. His "Hebrew" Suite was performed in 1928 by the New York Philharmonic under Mengelberg. He has written chamber music, an operetta and a cantata.

This "Symphony in one movement"—really in four, played without pause—though it is without key designation, was evidently not written merely to shock the public. Even if Mr. Berezowsky had been tempted to take this road to notoriety, he probably would

None of these themes undergoes any real development. They are tossed about and interwoven among the several choirs with considerable sense of instrumental values but without much apparent structural feeling. The slow movement is restful, and the Scherzo engaging in a quite Russian way. In the Finale the composer surrenders to Stravinsky. Here there is considerable rhythmic emphasis, and a great deal of noise. By reason of its energy and vitality, transmitted through a stirring performance under the composer's own vigorous baton, the symphony won a notable success.

Mr. Zighera brought to the interpretation of Mendelssohn's Concerto a good left-hand technique, excellent bowing and strong musical feeling. His tone is small and rather feminine, and for this reason he doubtless was well advised to choose this concerto for his American debut, rather than a more robust vehicle. His performance was well received.

The concert opened with a thrilling proclamation of the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture and closed with a performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" in which the meretriciousness of the music was almost forgotten in the virtuosity of its utterance. Mr. Burgin (concertmaster), Mr. Laurent (flute), Mr. Speyer (English horn) and Mr. B. Zighera (harp) particularly distinguished themselves in their solo passages.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLESTON, S. C.
POST
MAR 21 1931

An Attic Salt Shaker

By W. ORTON TEWSON

An amusing story, arising out of an attempt to establish a national theater in the United States years ago, is told by Owen Davis in his reminiscences, "I'd Like to Do It Again." "As You Like It" was chosen as the first production and in due time it opened before a brilliant audience in Washington, under the direction of Augustus Thomas, the well-known dramatist, and chairman of the national theater movement. The performance was not a success and the audience was cold and unresponsive.

* * *

As the curtain fell, Mrs. Thomas hurried backstage and found her husband sitting sadly amidst the scenery of Shakespeares' famous masterpiece with his head bowed and a look of deep dejection on his face. Her maternal instinct fully

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
MAR 21 1931

Boston Bach Festival.

The great Bach Festival given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky begins Tuesday afternoon when the B minor Mass will be given. The Festival will close Sunday with the same work. Practically the entire series of concerts is already subscribed but the public may purchase tickets to either of the performances of the Mass.

The Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club are making up the chorus. Among those who will appear as soloists are Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor and Fraser Gange, baritone, all of whom will be heard in the Mass. Alexander Borovsky, pianist and Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichordist will also be heard.

Tuesday and Friday concerts will be given in the afternoon and the Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday concerts in the evening. The Sunday performances are at 4.30 o'clock.

Melba?" he said. 'I never heard of her.'"

Stoke Poges is but a few miles from London!

* * *

The first time Melba sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she did not fully realize the prestige which the orchestra had "in the eyes of all good Americans," although she knew after five minutes that she "had never sung to such a marvellous accompaniment."

"One day we were rehearsing the "Allegro ed il Penseroso" of Handel with flute obligato," she relates in her memoirs. "In an important part one of the instruments played a C natural instead of a C sharp.

"'C sharp—C sharp,' I shouted, turning round and pointing at the man who had made the mistake.

* * *

"There was a dead silence. Then they all burst out laughing. And I realized that I had created a record as far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra was concerned. Nobody had dared to criticize them like that since the time of their formation."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 21 1931

Eustache Strasser.

Special to The New York Times.

WESTWOOD, Mass., March 20.—Eustache Strasser, one of the three living musicians who were members of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra when it was formed in 1881, died here today at the home of his only daughter, Mrs. Robert M. Currier. He was 83 years old. Mr. Strasser was born in Wurzburg, Bavaria. He held the position of first clarinetist with the Symphony Orchestra from 1881 to 1888. For fifty-five years he taught in Boston.

153

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER

MUSICAL EVENTS

Things Go Russian — An American Symphony —And Some Revivals That Almost Revive

THERE was a ponderable Slavic invasion of the upper Fifties when the Russkaya Grand Opera Company hired a hall (Mecca Temple) for performances of Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff" and "Khovanchina," while Mr. Koussevitzky brought his excellent Boston musicians to Carnegie Hall for two hearings of Stravinsky's recent "Symphonie de Psaumes."

STRAVINSKY composed his "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus and the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nobody was cheated. Of course, as one eminent American musician suggested, it's always safe to set the Psalms, but Stravinsky went about it in his own way. The orchestra functions without violins and violas, and from the manner in which certain 'cello passages were used, as well as the generally massive scoring, I fancy that Prince Igor was trying to convert his ensemble into an organ. The most impressive of the three movements was the Alleluia, a comparatively simple setting, intoned

Manchester Republican
Mar 27 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S BACH FESTIVAL PLEASES

Opening of 50th Anniversary Observance Features Mass in B Minor in Superb Performance

By FRANCIS REGAL

Boston, March 24—The Bach festival given by the Boston Symphony orchestra as part of the celebration of the orchestra's 50th anniversary opened today with a superb performance of the greatest of all Bach's choral works, the Mass in B Minor under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky. The chorus, which sang magnificently, was made up of the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. The solo singers were Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer Richard Crooks, and Frazer Gange.

On account of the extreme length of the mass, which does not follow the conventional form and is never used as part of the Catholic church service, it was divided into two parts, the first beginning at 4.30 in the afternoon and the second at 8.30. This division may mar somewhat the cumulative effect of what is probably the mightiest choral work ever penned, but since the receptive capacity of the average listener is limited, appreciation was no doubt increased by this opportunity for rest.

It is quite possible, contrary to common opinion, to enjoy Bach's music without listening closely, the complicated counterpoint breaking upon the senses like the roll of the sea and the infinite variety of the wind. But on so rare and great an occasion as this attention is of course on the strain, and half of the mass made quite enough for one sitting.

From the first it was apparent that Dr Koussevitzky, whose greatness as an orchestral conductor the whole world recognizes, is no less remarkably gifted in the somewhat different matter of conducting a large chorus of amateur singers. Some good conductors fail in this from trying for too much, or from not having a definite enough perception of what can be done. Dr Koussevitzky knows what he wants and what he can get, and gets it with admirable certainty and power.

There was today none of the clumsiness or slackness so often found in large choruses. The singing was expressive but it was also crisp, and when it should be detached it was clearly attached and fitted, like the strings, into the orchestral pattern. Some of the choral effects were as beautiful as any music that could be imagined, and the whole moved with rich fullness and ease.

All of the solo singer entered well into the spirit of the music, and fine as their singing of the solos and duets was the remarkable thing was the unusual excellence of the ensemble, in which solo voices in the orchestra took an important part.

At the concert tomorrow evening Bliss Perry will deliver an address on Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, in whose memory this festival is being given. The organist, Wallace Goodrich, will play two groups of Bach's works, including the Fantasia in C Minor, the Fugue in C Major, and the Fugue in G Minor. Mme Patorni-Casadesus will play a group of solos for the harpsichord including the Italian concerto.

At the close of the evening performance an extraordinary ovation was given to all concerned, the soloists, the orchestra, the chorus, the conductor,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
MAR 21 1931

Musical Notes

NEW SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

A new symphony and a soloist newly come to America, says the C. S. Monitor, graced the fifth concert of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the evening of March 16. The symphony was the first adventure in this form by Nicolai Berezowsky, a young Russian now living in New York. The soloist was Leon Zighera, violinist, and brother of Alfred of the first desk of the orchestra's cellos, and of Bernard, its first harpist.

Born in Leningrad, Mr. Berezowsky migrated to the United States in 1922 and became a member of the New York Philharmonic, leading the second violin. His "Hebrew" Suite was performed in 1928 by the New York Philharmonic under Mengelberg. He has written chamber music, an operetta and a cantata.

This "Symphony in one movement"—really in four, played without pause—though it is without key designation, was evidently not written merely to shock the public. Even if Mr. Berezowsky had been tempted to take this road to notoriety, he probably would

None of these themes undergoes any real development. They are tossed about and interwoven among the several choirs with considerable sense of instrumental values but without much apparent structural feeling. The slow movement is restful, and the Scherzo engaging in a quite Russian way. In the Finale the composer surrenders to Stravinsky. Here there is considerable rhythmic emphasis, and a great deal of noise. By reason of its energy and vitality, transmitted through a stirring performance under the composer's own vigorous baton, the symphony won a notable success.

Mr. Zighera brought to the interpretation of Mendelssohn's Concerto a good left-hand technique, excellent bowing and strong musical feeling. His tone is small and rather feminine, and for this reason he doubtless was well advised to choose this concerto for his American debut, rather than a more robust vehicle. His performance was well received.

The concert opened with a thrilling proclamation of the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture and closed with a erformance of Rimsky-Korsoff's "Spanish Caprice" in ich the meretriciousness of the sic was almost forgotten in the tuosity of its utterance. Mr. rgin (concertmaster), Mr. Laurt (flute), Mr. Speyer (English rn) and Mr. B. Zighera (harp) rticularly distinguished themves in their solo passages.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLESTON, S. C.
POST
MAR 21 1931

An Attic Salt Shaker

By W. ORTON TEWSON

An amusing story, arising out of an attempt to establish a national theater in the United States years ago, is told by Owen Davis in his reminiscences, "I'd Like to Do It Again." "As You Like It" was chosen as the first production and in due time it opened before a brilliant audience in Washington, under the direction of Augustus Thomas, the well-known dramatist, and chairman of the national theater movement. The performance was not a success and the audience was cold and unresponsive.

* * *

As the curtain fell, Mrs. Thomas hurried backstage and found her husband sitting sadly amidst the scenery of Shakespeares' famous masterpiece with his head bowed and a look of deep dejection on his face. Her maternal instinct fully aroused by her man's agony (says Mr. Davis), she stepped tenderly to his side and putting her arms gently over his shoulder she murmured bravely:

"Never mind, Gus, thank God you didn't write it."

* * *

Which remin[illegible] me of a story told by Mrs. Israel Zangwill about a [illegible] of her husband's play

Melba?" he said. 'I never heard of her.'"

Stoke Poges is but a few miles from London!

* * *

The first time Melba sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she did not fully realize the prestige which the orchestra had "in the eyes of all good Americans," although she knew after five minutes that she "had never sung to such a marvellous accompaniment."

"One day we were rehearsing the "Allegro ed il Penseroso" of Handel with flute obligato," she relates in her memoirs. "In an important part one of the instruments played a C natural instead of a C sharp.

"'C sharp—C sharp,' I shouted, turning round and pointing at the man who had made the mistake.

* * *

"There was a dead silence. Then they all burst out laughing. And I realized that I had created a record as far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra was concerned. Nobody had dared to criticize them like that since the time of their formation."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
MAR 29 1931

BACH FESTIVAL HELD BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Fiftieth Anniversary of Orchestra Observed and Memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson, Its Founder, Honored at Great Event

By Alexander Fried

LEIPZIG used to take its Bach stolidly by the week when the great cantor was directing the music of the St. Thomas Church. It has remained for a lively American city of the twentieth century to tune Johann Sebastian's solemn tone to the pitch of festivity. Ending today, six days of Bach have been celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and honoring its founder, Major Henry Lee Higginson.

For thirty-seven years Higginson alone supported the orchestra. On the foundation he built its present superb structure stands. The institution itself is not his only creation. Through it Boston's present interest in music is largely of his making.

Interest Manifested in Koussevitzky Program

This interest is measured by the program Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, arranged for Boston's Bach festival. The B minor Mass, divided for performance during the afternoon and evening, was sung on Tuesday and is being repeated today. Cantatas and works for organ, orchestra, piano, and harpsichord have been part of the six concerts. It is all earnest music, not a hint of cheap effect in the whole of it.

Participating artists have included Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer, Richard Crooks, and Fraser Gange, vocal soloists, Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, of France, harpsichordist, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

In the East, college singing groups often have serious artistic purposes. Mr. Koussevitzky was able to engage for the patrician festival the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, as well as the Bach Cantata Club.

Major Higginson conceived the plan of forming a first-rate orchestra for America when he was an humble student in Vienna. Years in the banking business gave him means. He caused musicians to be imported from Europe, and put at their head George Henschel.

Although his fortune was not extraordinary, he pursued his ambition relentlessly. The orchestra has become a model of artistic perfection for the world.

Major Higginson stands at the head of the list of honored Americans that have made this country eminent in the love of symphonic music. His type of patronage, an American phenomenon, is different from Europe's government patronage of the arts.

Governments abroad began their official concern with music when they assumed religious authorities previously centered in Rome. They needed organized music for the ceremonies of devotion. Meantime they could use their musical forces for their own entertainment.

Then secular music earned a prestige that kept it in government care even during the regimes of rulers who had no personal interest in it.

America Depends on Commercial Promotion

America, with its peculiar history, could not benefit its public with traditional musical organizations. The public had to depend for its art on the possibilities of its commercial promotion.

Music so developed could not be good enough. Here the Major Higginsons have entered the scene. Because of their own love of music they have made institutions for the use of all their compatriots. Such patrons have the temperament of the old noble troubadours. Only they let great orchestras sing for them.

[illegible] a
[illegible] g
[illegible] ze
[illegible] s,
[illegible] all
[illegible] s.
[illegible] ne.
[illegible] vill
also be heard.

Tuesday and Friday concerts will be given in the afternoon and the Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday concerts in the evening. The Sunday performances are at 4.30 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 21 1931

Eustache Strasser.

Special to The New York Times.

WESTWOOD, Mass., March 20.—Eustache Strasser, one of the three living musicians who were members of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra when it was formed in 1881, died here today at the home of his only daughter, Mrs. Robert M. Currier. He was 83 years old. Mr. Strasser was born in Wurzburg, Bavaria. He held the position of first clarinetist with the Symphony Orchestra from 1881 to 1888. For fifty-five years he taught in Boston.

153

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER

MUSICAL EVENTS

Things Go Russian — An American Symphony —And Some Revivals That Almost Revive

THERE was a ponderable Slavic invasion of the upper Fifties when the Russkaya Grand Opera Company hired a hall (Mecca Temple) for performances of Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff" and "Khovanchina," while Mr. Koussevitzky brought his excellent Boston musicians to Carnegie Hall for two hearings of Stravinsky's recent "Symphonie de Psaumes."

STRAVINSKY composed his "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus and the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nobody was cheated. Of course, as one eminent American musician suggested, it's always safe to set the Psalms, but Stravinsky went about it in his own way. The orchestra functions without violins and violas, and from the manner in which certain 'cello passages were used, as well as the generally massive scoring, I fancy that Prince Igor was trying to convert his ensemble into an organ. The most impressive of the three movements was the Alleluia, a comparatively simple setting, intoned

Manchester Republican
Mar 21 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S BACH FESTIVAL PLEASES

Opening of 50th Anniversary Observance Features Mass in B Minor in Superb Performance

By FRANCIS REGAL

Boston, March 24—The Bach festival given by the Boston Symphony orchestra as part of the celebration of the orchestra's 50th anniversary opened today with a superb performance of the greatest of all Bach's choral works, the Mass in B Minor under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky. The chorus, which sang magnificently, was made up of the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. The solo singers were Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer Richard Crooks, and Frazer Gange.

On account of the extreme length of the mass, which does not follow the conventional form and is never used as part of the Catholic church service, it was divided into two parts, the first beginning at 4.30 in the afternoon and the second at 8.30. This division may mar somewhat the cumulative effect of what is probably the mightiest choral work ever penned, but since the receptive capacity of the average listener is limited, appreciation was no doubt increased by this opportunity for rest.

It is quite possible, contrary to common opinion, to enjoy Bach's music without listening closely, the complicated counterpoint breaking upon the senses like the roll of the sea and the infinite variety of the wind. But on so rare and great an occasion as this attention is of course on the strain, and half of the mass made quite enough for one sitting.

From the first it was apparent that Dr Koussevitzky, whose greatness as an orchestral conductor the whole world recognizes, is no less remarkably gifted in the somewhat different matter of conducting a large chorus of amateur singers. Some good conductors fail in this from trying for too much, or from not having a definite enough perception of what can be done. Dr Koussevitzky knows what he wants and what he can get, and gets it with admirable certainty and power.

There was today none of the clumsiness or slackness so often found in large choruses. The singing was expressive but it was also crisp, and when it should be detached it was clearly attached and fitted, like the strings, into the orchestral pattern. Some of the choral effects were as beautiful as any music that could be imagined, and the whole moved with rich fullness and ease.

All of the solo singer entered well into the spirit of the music, and fine as their singing of the solos and duets was the remarkable thing was the unusual excellence of the ensemble, in which solo voices in the orchestra took an important part.

At the concert tomorrow evening Bliss Perry will deliver an address on Henry L. Higginson, founder of the orchestra, in whose memory this festival is being given. The organist, Wallace Goodrich, will play two groups of Bach's works, including the Fantasia in C Minor, the Fugue in C Major, and the Fugue in G Minor. Mme Paforni-Casadesus will play a group of solos for the harpsichord including the Italian concerto.

At the close of the evening performance an extraordinary ovation was given to all concerned, the soloists, the orchestra, the chorus, the conductor,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
MAR 21 1931

Musical Notes

NEW SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

A new symphony and a soloist newly come to America, says the C. S. Monitor, graced the fifth concert of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the evening of March 16. The symphony was the first adventure in this form by Nicolai Berezowsky, a young Russian now living in New York. The soloist was Leon Zighera, violinist, and brother of Alfred of the first desk of the orchestra's cellos, and of Bernard, its first harpist.

Born in Leningrad, Mr. Berezowsky migrated to the United States in 1922 and became a member of the New York Philharmonic, leading the second violin. His "Hebrew" Suite was performed in 1928 by the New York Philharmonic under Mengelberg. He has written chamber music, an operetta and a cantata.

This "Symphony in one movement"—really in four, played without pause—though it is without key designation, was evidently not written merely to shock the public. Even if Mr. Berezowsky had been tempted to take this road to notoriety, he probably would have realized that traffic on it is now diverted to obscurity. No; his music is really quite lyric, opening with a clearly drawn if not especially compelling theme in the flute, which serves him well throughout. There are other themes, too, one of which, for violas, is rather attractive.

None of these themes undergoes any real development. They are tossed about and interwoven among the several choirs with considerable sense of instrumental values but without much apparent structural feeling. The slow movement is restful, and the Scherzo engaging in a quite Russian way. In the Finale the composer surrenders to Stravinsky. Here there is considerable rhythmic emphasis, and a great deal of noise. By reason of its energy and vitality, transmitted through a stirring performance under the composer's own vigorous baton, the symphony won a notable success.

Mr. Zighera brought to the interpretation of Mendelssohn's Concerto a good left-hand technique, excellent bowing and strong musical feeling. His tone is small and rather feminine, and for this reason he doubtless was well advised to choose this concerto for his American debut, rather than a more robust vehicle. His performance was well received.

The concert opened with a thrilling proclamation of the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture and closed with a performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" in which the meretriciousness of the music was almost forgotten in the virtuosity of its utterance. Mr. Burgin (concertmaster), Mr. Laurent (flute), Mr. Speyer (English horn) and Mr. B. Zighera (harp) particularly distinguished themselves in their solo passages.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER

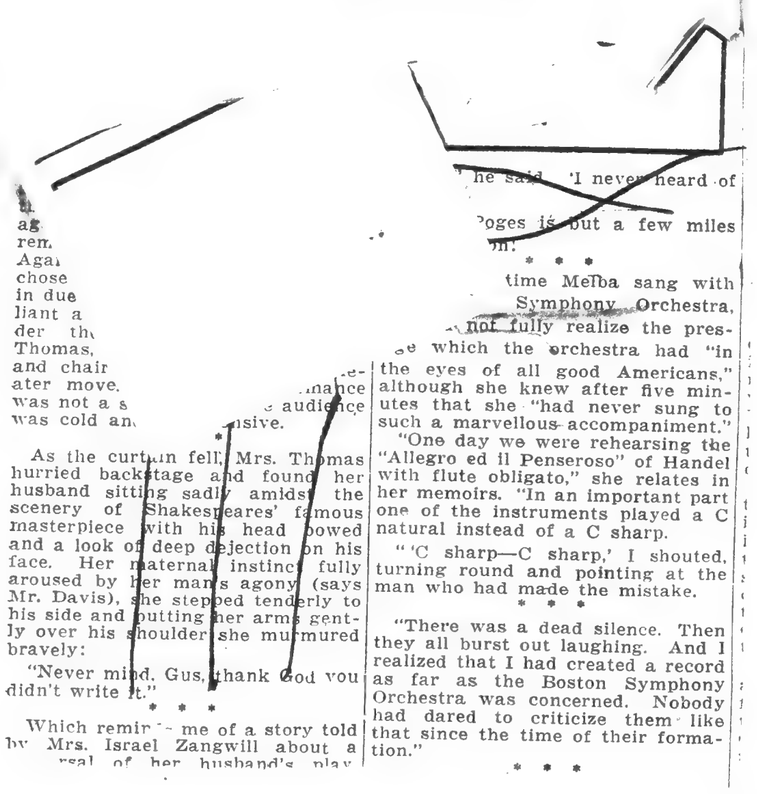
153

MUSICAL EVENTS

Things Go Russian — An American Symphony —And Some Revivals That Almost Revive

THERE was a ponderable Slavic invasion of the upper Fifties when the Russkaya Grand Opera Company hired a hall (Mecca Temple) for performances of Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff" and "Khovanchina," while Mr. Koussevitzky brought his excellent Boston musicians to Carnegie Hall for two hearings of Stravinsky's recent "Symphonie de Psaumes."

STRAVINSKY composed his "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus and the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nobody was cheated. Of course, as one eminent American musician suggested, it's always safe to set the Psalms, but Stravinsky went about it in his own way. The orchestra functions without violins and violas, and from the manner in which certain 'cello passages were used, as well as the generally massive scoring, I fancy that Prince Igor was trying to convert his ensemble into an organ. The most impressive of the three movements was the Alleluia, a comparatively simple setting, intoned



...he said. 'I never heard of ...oges is but a few miles ...

* * *

...time Melba sang with ... Symphony Orchestra, ... not fully realize the pres... which the orchestra had "in the eyes of all good Americans," although she knew after five minutes that she "had never sung to such a marvellous accompaniment."

"One day we were rehearsing the "Allegro ed il Penseroso" of Handel with flute obligato," she relates in her memoirs. "In an important part one of the instruments played a C natural instead of a C sharp.

"'C sharp—C sharp,' I shouted, turning round and pointing at the man who had made the mistake.

* * *

"There was a dead silence. Then they all burst out laughing. And I realized that I had created a record as far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra was concerned. Nobody had dared to criticize them like that since the time of their formation."

* * *

...ag... rem... Aga... chose in due ...liant a ...der th... Thomas, and chair ...ater move. ...mance was not a s... ...e audience was cold an... ...usive.

As the curtain fell, Mrs. Thomas hurried backstage and found her husband sitting sadly amidst the scenery of Shakespeares' famous masterpiece with his head bowed and a look of deep dejection on his face. Her maternal instinct fully aroused by her man's agony (says Mr. Davis), she stepped tenderly to his side and putting her arms gently over his shoulder she murmured bravely:

"Never mind, Gus, thank God you didn't write it."

* * *

Which remin... me of a story told by Mrs. Israel Zangwill about a ...sal of her husband's play

...a... ...g... ...e... ...z... ...s. ...ll ...ss. ...ne. ...vill

also be heard.

Tuesday and Friday concer... be given in the afternoon and the Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday concerts in the evening. The Sunday performances are at 4.30 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

BACH FESTIVAL HELD BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Fiftieth Anniversary of Orchestra Observed and Memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson, Its Founder, Honored at Great Event

By Alexander Fried

LEIPZIG used to take its Bach stolidly by the week when the great cantor was directing the music of the St. Thomas Church. It has remained for a lively American city of the twentieth century to tune Johann Sebastian's solemn tone to the pitch of festivity. Ending today, six days of Bach have been celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and honoring its founder, Major Henry Lee Higginson.

For thirty-seven years Higginson alone supported the orchestra. On the foundation he built its present superb structure stands. The institution itself is not his only creation. Through it Boston's present interest in music is largely of his making.

Interest Manifested in Koussevitzky Program

This interest is measured by the program Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, arranged for Boston's Bach festival. The B minor Mass, divided for performance during the afternoon and evening, was sung on Tuesday and is being repeated today. Cantatas and works for organ, orchestra, piano, and harpsichord have been part of the six concerts. It is all earnest music, not a hint of cheap effect in the whole of it.

Participating artists have included Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer, Richard Crooks, and Fraser Gange, vocal soloists, Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, of France, harpsichordist, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

In the East, college singing groups often have serious artistic purposes. Mr. Koussevitzky was able to engage for the patrician festival the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, as well as the Bach Cantata Club.

Major Higginson conceived the plan of forming a first-rate orchestra for America when he was an humble student in Vienna. Years in the banking business gave him means. He caused musicians to be imported from Europe, and put at their head George Henschel.

Although his fortune was not extraordinary, he pursued his ambition relentlessly. The orchestra has become a model of artistic perfection for the world.

Major Higginson stands at the head of the list of honored Americans that have made this country eminent in the love of symphonic music. His type of patronage, an American phenomenon, is different from Europe's government patronage of the arts.

Governments abroad began their official concern with music when they assumed religious authorities previously centered in Rome. They needed organized music for the ceremonies of devotion. Meantime they could use their musical forces for their own entertainment.

Then secular music earned a prestige that kept it in government care even during the regimes of rulers who had no personal interest in it.

America Depends on Commercial Promotion

America, with its peculiar history, could not benefit its public with traditional musical organizations. The public had to depend for its art on the possibilities of its commercial promotion.

Music so developed could not be good enough. Here the Major Higginsons have entered the scene. Because of their own love of music they have made institutions for the use of all their compatriots. Such patrons have the temperament of the old noble troubadours. Only they let great orchestras sing for them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

Eustache Strasser.

Special to The New York Times.

WESTWOOD, Mass., March 20.—Eustache Strasser, one of the three living musicians who were members of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra when it was formed in 1881, died here today at the home of his only daughter, Mrs. Robert M. Currier. He was 83 years old. Mr. Strasser was born in Wurzburg, Bavaria. He held the position of first clarinetist with the Symphony Orchestra from 1881 to 1888. For fifty-five years he taught in Boston.

The Daily Round for Bach as for All Men

His City, His Time and His Work for First Preluding to His Boston Festival

Trans. Mar. 7

THE Bach Festival, arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as rite of its semi-centenary year, is little more than a fortnight away. Articles about the composer and his music are in season; but it is tactless to crowd them into Saturday or Sunday pages immediately preceding the festival. Length, breadth and thickness scare away the reader, though he would be informed about what is before him. There is even danger of repletion in the festival itself. Accordingly, this department begins today a series of articles that it will distribute at leisurely intervals through the next three weeks. The first is concerned with Bach the man, as he lived and worked in his later years at Leipzig. It was written by Mr. Lawrence Gilman for the New York Herald Tribune. No writer about music in the American press is to be compared with him in knowledge of Bach, in understanding and sympathy.

How did Bach live? Mr. Gilman begins. How did he work—especially during the great period of his maturity in Leipzig? Is it possible for us to recreate in imagination, to any extent, his surroundings there, his daily life of drudgery, of routine, of an inspiration that seems to us, two centuries after his death, little short of miraculous? We may return, for illumination on these points, to the noteworthy volume by Professor Charles Sanford Terry ("Bach: The Historical Approach," Oxford University Press, 1930). With its aid we shall now have a look at Bach in his Leipzig environment—Bach, the pious, hard-working musician; Bach, the cantor and music-master, onerously involved in that "orgy of worship" (as Professor Terry calls it) which his Leipzig duties entailed. Let us, with Professor Terry's help, attempt to visualize the surroundings in which Bach lived. If the reader possesses a copy of Terry's earlier and invaluable book ("J. S. Bach: a Biography," Oxford University Press, 1928) he will find in it many illustrations helpful to this task of imaginative reconstruction.

Take first a general view of Leipzig, of the town as Bach knew it: "It is enclosed by fortified walls, flanking bastions and frowning escarpments; they were not removed for more than a generation after Bach's death. The town was a flourishing commercial center, the seat of a 'Welt-berühmte' university. Leipzig, in fact, was one of the foremost commercial communities in Germany, and already eminent as a capital of the printing and publishing trade. Its 'Collegium' was distinguished, and it was the most prosperous town in the Saxon Electorate after Dresden; though its population was neither sufficiently numerous—we can number it at about 30,000 when Bach was a citizen—nor sufficiently wealthy to maintain a permanent Opera House. Its public, therefore, was not as instructed as Dresden's or Hamburg's, for instance, in the operatic idiom. Hence the Council's injunction to Bach to avoid theatricalism, and also the opposition he encountered to his use of the operatic apparatus in his church music.

"Outside the walls, on every side of the town, leafy suburbs and gardens were spread, umbrageous with lime-trees—'Linden-town,' the Leipzig poets called their city. Especially was this so on the west, where the Pleisse meandered sluggishly and its mill-wheel clattered noisily behind St. Thomas's School. Within the city walls the houses rose massively four or five stories high under steeply angled roofs, their yellow fronts brilliant with gaudy frescoes. You may still remark these designs on old buildings. The window-sashes, bright with flowers, were musical with notes of caged singing birds. The streets, broad and pebbled, were cleansed with running conduits and gushing fountains. Hundreds of oil lamps on oak standards lit the streets at nightfall, while in each of the four wards watchmen called the hours and fended the citizens against thieves and vagabonds. Bach's Leipzig background is picturesquely medieval."

In the ample market place, thrice weekly the scene of a bustling fair, stood, and still stands, the Rathaus—today a museum which houses, among other relics, Haussmann's portrait of Bach. "Close by it was Apel's House, the palace of the sovereign when he visited Leipzig, from whose windows he looked out on the torchlit market place, and heard Bach's 'Collegium Musicum' make music in his honor. In the southwest Ward lay the Citadel, Schloss Pleissenburg, whose commandant was Bach's good patron. Outside the walls at that point stretched open country of particular interest to us. For here stood the Windmill, and here, in summer time, amid green gardens, Bach rehearsed his 'Collegium Musicum.'"

Bordering the extreme western circumference of the town stands the building which chiefly attracts us—St. Thomas s with its lofty tower. "Between it and the town-wall only the school buildings intervened, overlooking the meandering Pleisse, whose banks were a country promenade when Bach was alive, a busy thoroughfare today through which the stream forces an uneasy passage. Close to St. Thomas's, to the north, is the squat fabric of the New Church, and, in the northwest angle, the Ranstädter Gate, which admitted to the town's chief thoroughfare and gave egress to the Promenade."

It is with St. Thomas's Church, of course, that Bach's memory is most closely associated. He was among the hierarchy of its officials, lived in its precincts, and gave to its ancient fabric the first performance of his works. The church still stands; but the school, in which Bach lived and worked, was pulled down a quarter of a century ago. The church raises a huge bulk that has changed little during the centuries—the lofty nave and dormered roof, the disproportionately planned chancel, and the clumsily inserted tower rising to a lofty cupola.

Having confronted in fancy the church's exterior, let us accompany Professor Terry inside. We enter by the door that Bach himself used from the Square, turn sharply to the left, ascend a broad flight of steps to the organ gallery on the west wall, and look down from it on a Sunday morning. If the year were, say, 1731, we should see "the women in the nave, the men flanking them right and left in the side aisles; a low screen dividing the nave from the chancel, and, in the middle of it, the black 'Pult,' or leectern from which the Epistle was read. A stone font stands in the foreground below the west gallery; the pulpit, as now, is set against a pillar on the south (right) of the nave; and galleries fill the side aisles."

In Bach's time, the building was disfigured by galleries and private boxes on the walls, and even under the archway of the chancel. To a detail of special importance Professor Terry calls our attention; "the chancel arch is very small in proportion to the elevation of the nave. Its effect is to expose a great surface of bare wall above the arch (the galleries are now removed), facing the choir in the west gallery, to cut off the nave from the chancel, and to give the church acoustic qualities unusually responsive and resilient. The absence of a 'note' of fixed tonality, the large area of resonant wood and the comparatively short reverberation, made the building an ideal auditorium. Bach was inadequately served by his singers. But in St. Thomas's he possessed exceptional acoustic advantages."

Professor Terry refers to a picture (it is printed as the frontispiece of his volume, "Bach's Cantata Texts") which purports to represent the west gallery of St. Thomas's as it looked in Bach's time. In it, the organ, as now, stands against the west wall. "I wish," says our author, "that I could accept this picture with confidence. In the foreground the Cantor [Bach] lavishly wigged, directs his singers and players, whose distribution, however, is improbable and irregular. The loudest instruments are in the foreground, the players are unprovided with music, and the singers, standing in separate groups, follow their own group conductor! Still, the print reveals the uniform in which Bach's singers fulfilled their Sunday duty—the elders in breeches, full-skirted coats and ample wigs; the younger in perruques and cloaks such as German schoolboys wear today."

Professor Terry passes, in conclusion, from the church that enshrines Bach's memory to the fabric that preserves his ashes. "It is the only circumstance that connects him with the Johanneskirche. St. John's lay without the walls, and its churchyard had for generations been the public burial ground. Here, on July 31, 1750, close to the south door, Bach was buried in the presence of his scholars and colleagues.

"It was usual to mark the graves with a headstone or memorial slab. Bach's was not thus distinguished. For, in the last years of his life, he lost touch with the community he served. He was upon uncordial terms with his employers, who complained that he conducted himself as a Capellmeister rather than a Cantor. His children, who had found high employment, were not sufficiently moved by filial piety to make good the citizens' neglect. So, when it was proposed to commemorate the second centenary of his birth in 1885, it was impossible to identify his grave. Tradition placed it six paces from the south door of the church. But the ground had long been disused as a burial place, and, since closer association was not possible, a tablet was fixed to the south wall tersely and vaguely recording Bach's burial in this part of the former graveyard. The tablet is now in the vault of the church.

"Nine years later, (1894) the enlargement of the nave of the church involved the demolition of its walls and the inclusion within the new fabric of ground so far outside it. That Bach's resting-place might consequently be disturbed was not overlooked, and, while the foundations of the new walls were dug, careful watch was kept for any relic of his interment. The area of close investigation was near the former south door. Within it, after three days fruitless digging, an oak coffin was exposed which contained the almost perfect skeleton of an elderly male, well proportioned, moderate in stature, with massive skull, receding forehead, shallow eye-sockets and heavy jaws. The skull was compared with Haussmann's and other presumably authentic portraits, from which a skilled anatomist demonstrated that the remains indubitably were Bach's. They were therefore inclosed within an unpretentious limestone sarcophagus and along with those of Bach's fellow-townsman, Carl Christian Gellert (d. 1769), were lowered to a vault beneath the altar. There they rest in an unworthy Valhalla lately and ineptly embellished."

Using as a guide the skull, recovered from the earth on that autumn day, concludes Professor Terry, "the sculptor, Carl Seffner, modeled a bust of the immortal Cantor, which, better than Haussmann's portrait, reveals Bach as his music presents him to us. For, if it veils the simplicity of a very homely character, it truly records the nobility of one whose commanding and majestic personality no other of the great Masters of music has approached."

unday Globe
MARCH 8, 1931
NAC.....MARCH 8
tandard Time
0 | High Tide. . 1:56 am
2 | " . . . . 2:26 pm
2 | Moon Rises. 11:23 pm
...10ft 9in am, 10ft pm
mps at..... 6:12 pm
Changes
1, 0h 15m, morning, E.
2h 51m, morning, E.
27, 0h 4m, morning, W.
h 6m, evening, E.

an's Daily Story

oldup on the 10th building. A prompt e police, who threw the place and let h the result that vered and arrested
ndits, says Walter

f the robbery the dway success was aving a suit tried tailor's. Starting to go out, he found all exits blocked. It was a matinee day and he didn't have a great deal of time to reach the theatre.

"I showed the detective at the door my Equity card and some letters," he said, "and tried to explain to him how necessary it was for me to get to the theatre. But did you ever try to argue with a cop? He just said, 'You stay here. See?' And I stayed there."

Finally the young actor went to a telephone, called up the theatre, got the manager of the show on the wire, and explained his troubles. The manager jumped into a taxi, hurried over, managed to get into the building — and then they wouldn't let him out.

Meanwhile the young actor had managed to find a police inspector who in some manner verified his story and saw him past the door. He arrived at the theatre just in time to go on in his street clothes and without makeup. But the manager never did get back until the show was over.

(Copyright, 1931)

OLD BACH IS HERE

"The best way to instruct youth is to accustom it early to consort with the best models."—Forkel.

"GENTLEMEN," said Frederick the Great, of a visitor arrived at his palace, "old Bach is here!" and little did the monarch guess that he spoke of a greater than himself. One hundred and eighty-one years after his death old Bach is still here, and here in Boston this month is to be a festival of his music, six concerts in as many days, celebrating the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Bach, like Shakespeare in Matthew Arnold's sonnet, "walked the earth unguessed at. Better so!" for although famous as a virtuoso organist while he lived, few if any surmised that here was the Father Rhine of German music, worthier to be called River than Bach, which in German means brook. For more than a century after his death no memorial to him existed and the very location of his grave was forgotten. In the century following, his manuscripts have been rescued from attics and dustbins. The great "Matthew Passion Music" was retrieved from rubbish among the effects of a deceased cheese-monger; another masterpiece was snatched in 1814 at St Petersburg, from waste paper about to be sent to a butter dealer.

* * *

It took four generations of musical ancestors to produce him, and although he by two successive wives produced 20 children, he culminated and exhausted the creative energy of his clan. Orphan at 10, purloining a forbidden musical textbook and copying it by moonlight, which occupies six months; at 15 a choir boy in a church school at Luneburg, repeatedly using his holidays to trudge the 30 miles across the Luneburg Heath to Hamburg, in order to hear the eminent organist, Bohm; at 23 he is court musician and organist in Weimar, and thus founder and forerunner in Germany's cultural capital of that distinction which was to be continued by Goethe, Schiller and Liszt. For 15 years he advances from post to post until in 1723 he is chosen cantor of St Thomas' School in Leipzig, which he makes lastingly memorable by his labors until his blindness and death in 1750.

As virtuoso organist he is continually called to test and dedicate new instruments, a species of concert tour. A French organist who had challenged him to a music duel, hearing him play first, defaulted and fled the city. Bach disdained to repeat the story, but his friends did not. Whatever his implements, however faulty, he seized them to create masterpieces, his spirit transcending their imperfections. In Weimar, being organist, he wrote organ music; in Cothen, as chapel master, he wrote for stringed instruments; in Leipzig, as cantor, he wrote for choirs, and in all these kinds he excelled.

His duties as cantor at the St Thomas School required him to teach singing, Latin, and science, play the organ on Sundays and feast days, train two choirs in two separate churches, and compose a vocal work, "Cantata," for each Sunday and holy day. Thirty of these cantatas he brought with him to Leipzig, and in the 20 years following he wrote 265 more, making about 300 in all, of which 100 have been lost. Thus he composed cantatas at the rate of one a month, and these of such quality that most composers would be thankful to have written one a year, if not one in a lifetime. And to these must be added his voluminous instrumental writings, the five Passion Musics (three of which are lost), and the monumental B-Minor Mass. Does this explain why, like so many other men of imperious creative urge, he was an inveterate early riser, up at 5 in Summer, at 6 in Winter?

* * *

In a time like ours when colleges are clamoring for their millions of dollars it is chastening to contemplate with what meager means this man of intellect achieved unique greatness. His choirs never numbered more than 50 singers, usually only a dozen, and these scarcely above amateur skill. His official superiors, totally incapable of realizing that they had an exceptional man on their hands, pestered, nagged and impeded him—a situation which Bach's own obstinacy, irritability and independence of spirit did not improve. Of fame he was utterly unselfconscious. Until his 40th year, next to nothing from his pen was published, and most of his work remained unprinted until more than a century after his death. His brain was like a force of nature, a great tree raining seeds on the ground with lavish prodigality, letting sprout what would. If so few, if no one realized his greatness, it was because he thought nothing of it himself, being so intent on uttering the music that was in him, so passionately absorbed in perfecting the practice of his art.

He was 30 years old before unremitting diligence had equipped him with a technique which could express down to its last nuance the convolutions of his thought. First train yourself to say something, then pray that you be given something to say. If the prayer-by-work be faithfully done, the second prayer goes not unanswered. The spirit seizes a responsive instrument as a virtuoso a Stradivarius violin. It was midway in his 30's, as with most givers of life, that the event came off and Bach discovered his work of innovation. "In this" (Forkel is speaking and the words are parable), "Bach followed a course upon which the textbooks of his day were silent, but which his genius suggested to him. Its originality consists in the freedom of his part writing, in which he transgresses, seemingly at any rate, rules long established and to his contemporaries almost sacred." Where is the parable? In those last 15 words. Notice, too, that he was continually retouching his compositions to make them ever more finished masterpieces. The organ music which he had written as a young man he spent the last 10 years of his life, as an old man, revising. Indifferent alike to praise or blame, he went on correcting until he had satisfied himself. When his work was as good as he could make it his work was done. Like Odysseus in the "Iliad," he might have said with Homeric grandeur: "Praise me not much, neither blame me, but let us go forward, for night is far spent and the dawn is nigh."

* * *

Such a spirit is best known through his own utterance, his heroic tempests of tones, but those who wish to meet him in the pages of a book will find him livingly in J. H. Forkel's biography, or in the more recent and more complete, though not more interesting, work by Mr Charles Sanford Terry.

Bach has been explained by heredity, by environment, by early training, by religious sentiment, by moral force, by passionate industry, by complete self-forgetfulness in devotion to ideal aims, but when all is said, the apparition of such giants of intellect and spirit are divine events—as unexplainable as the mysterious origin of life itself. One thing, however, can be said: this man lived in a great Ago of Faith. He believed in something. What faith was it? No matter! He believed in something, and that is the great thing. He lost himself in that belief and so found himself.

Yes, "Gentlemen, old Bach is here!"

We need him.

Uncle Dudley.

The Daily Ro... Bach a...

His City, His Time a... Preluding t... Fe...

Trans. Mar. 7

THE Bach Festival, arranged b... the Boston Symphony Orchestr... as rite of its semi-centenar... year, is little more than a for... night away. Articles about the com... poser and his music are in season; bu... it is tactless to crowd them into Satu... day or Sunday pages immediately pr... ceding the festival. Length, bread... and thickness scare away the read... though he would be informed about wh... is before him. There is even danger ... repletion in the festival itself. Acco... ingly, this department begins today ... series of articles that it will distribu... at leisurely intervals through the ne... three weeks. The first is concerned w... Bach the man, as he lived and work... in his later years at Leipzig. It w... written by Mr. Lawrence Gilman for ... the New York Herald Tribune. No ... writer about music in the American ... press is to be compared with him in ... knowledge of Bach, in understanding ... and sympathy.

How did Bach live? Mr. Gilman begins. How did he work—especially during the great period of his maturity in Leipzig? Is it possible for us to recreate in imagination, to any extent, his surroundings there, his daily life of drudgery, of routine, of an inspiration that seems to us, two centuries after his death, little short of miraculous? We may return, for illumination on these points, to the noteworthy volume by Professor Charles Sanford Terry ("Bach: The Historical Approach," Oxford University Press, 1930). With its aid we shall now have a look at Bach in his Leipzig environment—Bach, the pious, hard-working musician; Bach, the cantor and music-master, onerously involved in that "orgy of worship" (as Professor Terry calls it) which his Leipzig duties entailed. Let us, with Professor Terry's help, attempt to visualize the surroundings in which Bach lived. If the reader possesses a copy of Terry's earlier and invaluable book ("J. S. Bach: a Biography," Oxford University Press, 1928) he will find in it many illustrations helpful to this task of imaginative reconstruction.

Take first a general view of Leipzig, of the town as Bach knew it: "It is enclosed by fortified walls, flanking bastions and frowning escarpments; they were not removed for more than a generation after Bach's death. The town was a flourishing commercial center, the seat of a 'Welt-berühmte' university. Leipzig, in fact, was one of the foremost commercial communities in Germany, and already eminent as a capital of the printing and publishing trade. Its 'Collegium' was distinguished, and it was the most prosperous town in the Saxon Electorate after Dresden; though its population was neither sufficiently numerous—we can number it at about 30,000 when Bach was a citizen—nor sufficiently wealthy to maintain a permanent Opera House. Its public, therefore, was not as instructed as Dresden's or Hamburg's, for instance, in the operatic idiom. Hence the Council's injunction to Bach to avoid theatricalism, and also the opposition he encountered to his use of the operatic apparatus in his church music.

"Outside the walls, on every side of the town, leafy suburbs and gardens were spread, umbrageous with limetrees—'Linden-town,' the Leipzig poets called their city. Especially was this so on the west, where the Pleisse meandered sluggishly and its mill-wheel clattered noisily behind St. Thomas's School. Within the city walls the houses rose massively four or five stories high under steeply angled roofs, their yellow fronts brilliant with gaudy frescoes. You may still remark these designs on old buildings. The window-sashes, bright with flowers, were musical with notes of caged singing birds. The streets, broad and pebbled, were cleansed with running conduits and gushing fountains. Hundreds of oil lamps on oak standards lit the streets at nightfall, while in each of the four wards watchmen called the hours and fended the citizens against thieves and vagabonds. Bach's Leipzig background is picturesquely medieval."

In the ample market place, thrice weekly the scene of a bustling fair, stood, and still stands, the Rathaus—today a museum which houses, among other relics, Haussmann's portrait of Bach. "Close by it was Apel's House, the palace of the sovereign when he visited Leipzig, from whose windows he looked out on the torchlit market place, and heard Bach's 'Collegium Musicum' make music in his honor. In the southwest Ward lay the Citadel, Schloss Pleissenburg, whose commandant was Bach's good patron. Outside the walls at that point stretched open country of particular interest to us. For here stood the Windmill, and here, in summer time, amid green gardens, Bach rehearsed his 'Collegium Musicum.'"

Bordering the extreme western circumference of the town stands the building which chiefly attracts us—St. Thomas s with its lofty tower. "Between it and the town-wall only the school buildings intervened, overlooking the meandering Pleisse, whose banks were a country promenade when Bach was alive, a busy thoroughfare today through which the stream forces an uneasy passage. Close to St. Thomas's, to the north, is the squat fabric of the New Church, and, in the northwest angle, the Ranstädter Gate, which admitted to the town's chief thoroughfare and gave egress to the Promenade."

It is with St. Thomas's Church, of course, that Bach's memory is most closely associated. He was among the hierarchy of its officials, lived in its precincts, and gave to its ancient fabric the first performance of his works. The church still stands; but the school, in which Bach lived and worked, was pulled down a quarter of a century ago. The church raises a huge bulk that has changed little during the centuries—the lofty nave and dormered roof, the disproportionately planned chancel, and of the ch... portance Professor Terry calls our attention; "the chancel arch is very small in proportion to the elevation of the nave. Its effect is to expose a great surface of bare wall above the arch (the galleries are now removed), facing the choir in the west gallery, to cut off the nave from the chancel, and to give the church acoustic qualities unusually responsive and resilient. The absence of a 'note' of fixed tonality, the large area of resonant wood and the comparatively short reverberation, made the building an ideal auditorium. Bach was inadequately served by his singers. But in St. Thomas's he possessed exceptional acoustic advantages."

...hist Shrine

Professor Terry refers to a picture (it is printed as the frontispiece of his volume, "Bach's Cantata Texts") which purports to represent the west gallery of St. Thomas's as it looked in Bach's time. In it, the organ, as now, stands against the west wall. "I wish," says our author, "that I could accept this picture with confidence. In the foreground the Cantor [Bach] lavishly wigged, directs his singers and players, whose distribution, however, is improbable and irregular. The loudest instruments are in the foreground, the players are unprovided with music, and the singers, standing in separate groups, follow their own group conductor! Still, the print reveals the uniform in which Bach's singers fulfilled their Sunday duty—the elders in breeches, full-skirted coats and ample wigs; the younger in perruques and cloaks such as German schoolboys wear today."

Professor Terry passes, in conclusion, from the church that enshrines Bach's memory to the fabric that preserves his ashes. "It is the only circumstance that connects him with the Johanneskirche. St. John's lay without the walls, and its churchyard had for generations been the public burial ground. Here, on July 31, 1750, close to the south door, Bach was buried in the presence of his scholars and colleagues.

"It was usual to mark the graves with a headstone or memorial slab. Bach's was not thus distinguished. For, in the last years of his life, he lost touch with the community he served. He was upon uncordial terms with his employers, who complained that he conducted himself as a Capellmeister rather than a Cantor. His children, who had found high employment, were not sufficiently moved by filial piety to make good the citizens' neglect. So, when it was proposed to commemorate the second centenary of his birth in 1885, it was impossible to identify his grave. Tradition placed it six paces from the south door of the church. But the ground had long been disused as a burial place, and, since closer association was not possible, a

Boston Sunday Globe

SUNDAY, MARCH 8, 1931

MINIATURE ALMANAC.....MARCH 8

Eastern Standard Time

Sun Rises.....	6:10	High Tide. .	1:56 am
Sun Sets.....	5:42	,, ...	2:26 pm
Length of Day.	11:32	Moon Rises.	11:23 pm
Height of Tide.....		10ft 9in am,	10ft pm
Light Automobile Lamps at.....			6:12 pm

Moon's Changes

Last Quarter, March 11, 0h 15m, morning, E.
New Moon, March 19, 2h 51m, morning, E.
First Quarter, March 27, 0h 4m, morning, W.
Full Moon, April 2, 3h 6m, evening, E.

The Globe Man's Daily Story

There was a holdup on the 10th floor of a 5th-av building. A prompt alarm brought the police, who threw a cordon around the place and let nobody out, with the result that they finally discovered and arrested two men as the bandits, says Walter Trumbull.

At the time of the robbery the juvenile of a Broadway success was in the building having a suit tried on at his tailor's. Starting to go out, he found all exits blocked. It was a matinee day and he didn't have a great deal of time to reach the theatre.

"I showed the detective at the door my Equity card and some letters," he said, "and tried to explain to him how necessary it was for me to get to the theatre. But did you ever try to argue with a cop? He just said, 'You stay here. See?' And I stayed there."

Finally the young actor went to a telephone, called up the theatre, got the manager of the show on the wire, and explained his troubles. The manager jumped into a taxi, hurried over, managed to get into the building — and then they wouldn't let him out.

Meanwhile the young actor had managed to find a police inspector who in some manner verified his story and saw him past the door. He arrived at the theatre just in time to go on in his street clothes and without makeup. But the manager never did get back until the show was over.

(Copyright, 1931)

OLD BACH IS HERE

"The best way to instruct youth is to accustom it early to consort with the best models."—Forkel.

"GENTLEMEN," said Frederick the Great, of a visitor arrived at his palace, "old Bach is here!" and little did the monarch guess that he spoke of a greater than himself. One hundred and eighty-one years after his death old Bach is still here, and here in Boston this month is to be a festival of his music, six concerts in as many days, celebrating the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Bach, like Shakespeare in Matthew Arnold's sonnet, "walked the earth unguessed at. Better so!" for although famous as a virtuoso organist while he lived, few if any surmised that here was the Father Rhine of German music, worthier to be called River than Bach, which in German means brook. For more than a century after his death no memorial to him existed and the very location of his grave was forgotten. In the century following, his manuscripts have been rescued from attics and dustbins. The great "Matthew Passion Music" was retrieved from rubbish among the effects of a deceased cheese-monger; another masterpiece was snatched in 1814 at St Petersburg, from waste paper about to be sent to a butter dealer.

* * *

It took four generations of musical ancestors to produce him, and although he by two successive wives produced 20 children, he culminated and exhausted the creative energy of his clan. Orphan at 10, purloining a forbidden musical textbook and copying it by moonlight, which occupies six months; at 15 a choir boy in a church school at Luneburg, repeatedly using his holidays to trudge the 30 miles across the Luneburg Heath to Hamburg, in order to hear the eminent organist, Bohm; at 23 he is court musician and organist in Weimar, and thus founder and forerunner in Germany's cultural capital of that distinction which was to be continued by Goethe, Schiller and Liszt. For 15 years he advances from post to post until in 1723 he is chosen cantor of St Thomas' School in Leipzig, which he makes lastingly memorable by his labors until his blindness and death in 1750.

As virtuoso organist he is continually called to test and dedicate new instruments, a species of concert tour. A French organist who had challenged him to a music duel, hearing him play first, defaulted and fled the city. Bach disdained to repeat the story, but his friends did not. Whatever his implements, however faulty, he seized them to create masterpieces, his spirit transcending their imperfections. In Weimar, being organist, he wrote organ music; in Cothen, as chapel master, he wrote for stringed instruments; in Leipzig, as cantor, he wrote for choirs, and in all these kinds he excelled.

His duties as cantor at the St Thomas School required him to teach singing, Latin, and science, play the organ on Sundays and feast days, train two choirs in two separate churches, and compose a vocal work, "Cantata," for each Sunday and holy day. Thirty of these cantatas he brought with him to Leipzig, and in the 20 years following he wrote 265 more, making about 300 in all, of which 100 have been lost. Thus he composed cantatas at the rate of one a month, and these of such quality that most composers would be thankful to have written one a year, if not one in a lifetime. And to these must be added his voluminous instrumental writings, the five Passion Musics (three of which are lost), and the monumental B-Minor Mass. Does this explain why, like so many other men of imperious creative urge, he was an inveterate early riser, up at 5 in Summer, at 6 in Winter?

* * *

In a time like ours when colleges are clamoring for their millions of dollars it is chastening to contemplate with what meager means this man of intellect achieved unique greatness. His choirs never numbered more than 50 singers, usually only a dozen, and these scarcely above amateur skill. His official superiors, totally incapable of realizing that they had an exceptional man on their hands, pestered, nagged and impeded him—a situation which Bach's own obstinacy, irritability and independence of spirit did not improve. Of fame he was utterly unselfconscious. Until his 40th year, next to nothing from his pen was published, and most of his work remained unprinted until more than a century after his death. His brain was like a force of nature, a great tree raining seeds on the ground with lavish prodigality, letting sprout what would. If so few, if no one realized his greatness, it was because he thought nothing of it himself, being so intent on uttering the music that was in him, so passionately absorbed in perfecting the practice of his art.

He was 30 years old before unremitting diligence had equipped him with a technique which could express down to its last nuance the convolutions of his thought. First train yourself to say something, then pray that you be given something to say. If the prayer-by-work be faithfully done, the second prayer goes not unanswered. The spirit seizes a responsive instrument as a virtuoso a Stradivarius violin. It was midway in his 30's, as with most givers of life, that the event came off and Bach discovered his work of innovation. "In this" (Forkel is speaking and the words, are parable), "Bach followed a course upon which the textbooks of his day were silent, but which his genius suggested to him. Its originality consists in the freedom of his part writing, in which he transgresses, seemingly at any rate, rules long established and to his contemporaries almost sacred." Where is the parable? In those last 15 words. Notice, too, that he was continually retouching his compositions to make them ever more finished masterpieces. The organ music which he had written as a young man he spent the last 10 years of his life, as an old man, revising. Indifferent alike to praise or blame, he went on correcting until he had satisfied himself. When his work was as good as he could make it his work was done. Like Odysseus in the "Iliad," he might have said with Homeric grandeur: "Praise me not much, neither blame me, but let us go forward, for night is far spent and the dawn is nigh."

* * *

Such a spirit is best known through his own utterance, his heroic tempests of tones, but those who wish to meet him in the pages of a book will find him livingly in J. H. Forkel's biography, or in the more recent and more complete, though not more interesting, work by Mr Charles Sanford Terry.

Bach has been explained by heredity, by environment, by early training, by religious sentiment, by moral force, by passionate industry, by complete self-forgetfulness in devotion to ideal aims, but when all is said, the apparition of such giants of intellect and spirit are divine events—as unexplainable as the mysterious origin of life itself. One thing, however, can be said: this man lived in a great Ago of Faith. He believed in something. What faith was it? No matter! He believed in something, and that is the great thing. He lost himself in that belief and so found himself.

Yes, "Gentlemen, old Bach is here!"

We need him.

Uncle Dudley

Concert-Chronicle

Recalling Mr. Borovsky Trans Mar 9

TO run down the list of "assisting artists" at the approaching Bach Festival is to find few unfamiliar names. Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz, who will play a Concerto for Two Violins, sit week by week and season after season at the first desk of the string choir at Symphony Hall. It was as organist that Bostonians first knew Mr. Wallace Goodrich as public performer. Mme. Patorni-Casadesus has played the harpsichord, whenever her husband's "Society of Ancient Instruments" has visited Boston. Mme. Evans, newcomer to the solo-quartet for the Mass in B minor, is the singing wife of Fraser Gange, who is to be the bass. The other two, Mme. Matzenauer and Mr. Crooks, return often to Boston. The pianist remains; Alexander Borovsky, heard at the Symphony Concerts five or six years ago; was a stranger to them. The other day, when he was playing Bach in London and Herbert Hughes wrote of him in the Daily Telegraph:

"Like many other people who write about music, I am frequently asked to name my 'favorite' pianist. It is the kind of question that is asked by very young people whose sincerity just saves them from being fatuous. To the question I invariably answer that I have about half a dozen 'favorite' pianists. If I am asked to give my twelve, the name of Borovsky is one of the first three or four that occur to me at once. I was reminded of these conundrums when Borovsky made his rentrée at Wigmore Hall and performed a program devoted exclusively to Bach and Chopin. To at least one listener it was a recital that gave unmixed pleasure.

"Here was the very perfection of Bach playing, superb in control of climaxes, in rhythm, in suggestion of authentic 'clavier' music. To the Chromatic Fantasia he gave, moreover, that touch of improvisation which links up the keyboard technique of Bach with that of Cl[illegible] d[illegible] m[illegible] ea[illegible] c[illegible] in[illegible] w[illegible]

Human nature being what human nature is, it is not superfluous to remind subscribers to the Symphony Concerts that tomorrow (Thursday)—and not Saturday—is the appointed evening for this week. The matinée follows on Friday in usual course.

TRANS. MAR. 18

Around the Bach Festival

The vigilant Division of Music of the Public Library has arranged two informal lectures as introduction to the Symphony Orchestra's Bach Festival. In the first, tomorrow afternoon at 4.30 at the Lecture Hall of the Library, Mr. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club, will discuss the choral works of Bach—particularly the Mass in B minor, the Magnificat and the Church Cantatas to be sung next week. In the second lecture, on Thursday, March 26, at the same hour and in the same room, Mr. Appel of the Library will speak about Bach's instrumental works, especially those to be played at the festival. Both lectures are open to the public without charge.

The orchestral Suite in D major is dropped from the third concert, on Thursday, March 26, of the Bach Festival. With it included the program was too long. The second Brandenburg Concerto, the Piano-Concerto in D minor—pianist, Mr Borovsky—and the Magnificat remain as announced.

Boston to Philadelphia

This evening in Philadelphia, Fabien Sevitzky's Chamber Orchestra will play Arthur Foote's Suite in E major, revived to the general pleasure a year or two ago by Dr. Koussevitzky in the composer's own city. The piece is item in a "Program from Living American Composers." Another Bostonian has place—Paul Mimart with "Nephesh Haiah," whatever that title may imply. Mr. Foote's Suite is new to Philadelphia. Mr. Mimart's will be played for the first time anywhere.

Indeed, that sober and guarded Briton, Professor Terry, who is incapable of reckless speech, once dared to call Bach "an incorrigible romanticist." But Professor Terry has gone even farther: he has boldly exhibited Bach—that "cold" and "austere" and "academic" formalist of the old tradition, Bach the "purist." Bach the "absolutist"—as a wicked indulger in musical realism. Behind and above and beneath those "step-motives," those tonal symbols of "waves," "winds," "clouds," "height," "descent," "depth," "slaughter," "terror," "sleep," and the rest, there was the fervent emotional power, the distinction and saliency and nobility of musical invention, which transfigured this elaborate and naive scheme of tonal symbolization and gave it enduring validity. What Bach wrote is also "emotional music in the truest and deepest sense . . . his emotional utterance has a power and an impressiveness such as we rarely meet in other music." [New York Herald Tribune

Bach is such good company. A subject is suggested, and off he goes, commenting and distinguishing, while "his eager eyes, that still take joyful note of all things joyful, beam." In his "Magnificat" it must be a dull soul that does not magnify the Lord. Did anyone ever write trumpet parts like those in "Et resurrexit"? or such a "story without an end" as the Allemande of the fourth Partita? Did ever dances so pulsate with life as does the little suite embedded in the first Brandenburg Concerto? And his minors are only serious, not sad; they are just majors with a steel core. Mode and key mean nothing to him in themselves. They are only the handles he takes hold of music by. There is nothing introspective about him; nothing of self-expression, so dear to this psychological age. He writes music, as another man builds a bridge,

The True Bach Escaping from The Tradition

The Return to the Tone-Poet For Second Preluding to His Boston Festival

TRANS MAR. 11

IN the twenties of the last century, Bach was a name. On May 24, 1830, Charles Lamb had heard of it—from his friend Nov—, no doubt—for he tells us that he did not know whether to pronounced it Bach or Batch. But "in an age like this, constituted to the quick and critical perception of all harmonious combinations, I verily believe, beyond all preceding ages, since Jubal stumbled upon the gamut," knowledge of Bach was confined to a few people like Nov— and Wesley and Crotch. Henry Bishop, who was knighted a dozen years later for having represented English music, seems to have done that by using such time as he could spare from the mutilation of Shakspeare to please Mrs. Grundy upon the "cutting" of foreign operas, not, as Fétis unkindly said, to temper the wind to the incompetent native executant, but out of regard for "the state of the public taste for music, which was not sufficiently cultivated to understand them."

This "age of critical perception," this "insufficiently cultivated public taste"! We seem still to hear these discrepant voices. The present never knows much about itself. But if the present age has a faith, that faith is that Bach is music, and music Bach. That faith has taken a century of "first performances" and another century of Bach Societies to build; but these have carried critical perception through to public taste. Miss Myra Hess once gave a recital in New York, and the audience sat spellbound, as we, too, have seen them do, till someone in the gallery shouted "Bach!" The cry was taken up, and she played what they asked. What next? "More Bach!" She confided afterwards to a friend that the same thing had happened to her at Lincoln, Neb. Our halls and cathedrals are crumbling; but this architect's work still stands as he left it 175 years ago, with its stones worn smooth by the knees of worshipers.

Bach wrote fugues; that was all our grandfathers knew about him, and their tone of voice proclaimed that they did not like fugues. And, indeed, why should they, considering the way they were played? Generations had taught them that a fugue was a parsing lesson. Thackeray it was, perhaps, who first showed us that blood could beat warmly under patches, and Austin Dobson that tongues wagged lightly under perukes. In like manner tonal answer and stretto and episode were laws that the full-bottomed wigs dared not disobey, and yet at the same time no more than a framework in which much strength and loveliness could display themselves. It is the merit of this generation to have been sure of that at last, and Bach is now played and listened to as a human being.

He is not played as he heard his own music. He counted his choir and orchestra by units and we count ours by tens. His sententious harpsichord and persuasive clavichord have grown into the stentorian pianoforte. His audience sits in tiered halls instead of in uncomfortable pews or smoky cellars lit by tallow candles. But he would have thought nothing of such changes, and would have made music as easily with them as without them. One thing would have delighted him—the increased skill of instrumental performance. One thing would have surprised him—the piety and incompetence of the singing. He would have been puzzled by the reverential attitude towards very ordinary passages and have wondered why they were so often out of tune until he realized that the singers spent one year instead of ten on learning their business.

One fancies he would have welcomed the pianoforte. Its easily graduated tone and sustaining power would have made up for the loss of precise articulation or of a wavering touch. His music had not yet developed those shock tactics which make the piano for us a terror in some hands. Bach has plenty of "mood," but he gets it by doing work, and the way to play him is to work as hard. That is the true "reverence." [London Times

Bach has suffered, like so many composers since his day, from the obscuring effect of a mist of legend—in his case, the legend of the "dry" and "formal" and "pedantic" Bach. The word "Bach" and the word "fugue" were long synonymous in the popular mind; and to the popular mind a fugue is necessarily "dry," instead of being, as it is in the hands of a genius, one of the most exciting of musical forms. These beliefs have erected formidable barriers in the way of a general understanding of the true nature of Bach's contribution to music. The dryly scholastic Bach, the formal, periwigged Bach, is largely, of course, an imaginary figure. Bach, to be sure, had dull and routine and perfunctory moments, days of flagging imagination and invention—and no wonder, considering his unremitting labors and the incredible vastness of his output. But the real Bach, the great and essential Bach, was an utterly different being from that of the figure of popular legend. He was not only one of the most richly human of all composers, but one of the most poetical, dramatic and deeply emotional.

Bach Festival This Week Brings Forth Great Expectations

ADV. MAR 22

By Morris Hastings

THE STAGE is brilliantly set for the Bach Festival which commences at Symphony Hall next Tuesday afternoon with a performance of the Mass in B-minor.

Among the soloists to appear with the orchestra are Alexander Borovsky, pianist, an outstanding interpreter of Bach; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichordist; Margarete Matzenauer, magnificent mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; the Harvard Glee Club; Wallace Goodrich, organist, and the Bach Cantata Club.

The layman who notes with awe the presence of so much religious music on the festival program must remember that the artistic life of Bach's time had its roots deeply in the church. Bach is no less fresh, interesting and companionable for that reason.

Of these religious compositions, the most seldom performed are, doubtless, the [illegible] for [illegible] ses [illegible] ne- [illegible]

ALEXANDER BOROVSKY, pianist in Bach Festival.

worth, is taken from nondescript [illegible] rom the Bible. During his lifetime, 65

l on Page 4, Column 1

Ready for Bach Festival

ADV MAR 22

Continued From Page 2

years, Bach composed some 300 cantatas. Only one of them was actually published while the composer was alive. His widow sold a bundle of these splendid works for about $40!

When Bach was organist in Weimar, Cothen or Eisenach, he supervised the performance of these cantatas every Sunday morning. They were given early in the church service, which began at seven in the morning. Terry, an authority on Bach, tells us that they were played and sung in a cold church by musicians who had been routed out of bed and but half-fed. "Truly," exclaims the writer, "a heroic age!"

"These cantatas," continues Terry, "dissipate the illusion that Bach was a cold mathematical precisian. They reveal him as one of the tenderest of men with a poet's soul and a painter's eye."

If one is not frightened away by the religious character of so much of Bach's music, he may be intimidated by the scholastic titles of the rest of his compositions—the fugues, the preludes or the fantasias, for example.

Again, it should be recalled that composers of that day—with the exception of French and English musicians—were not accustomed to giving descriptive titles to their music. It was a time of "absolute music"—long before the days when bleating sheep and roaring locomotives were set forth in tone.

Bach's nature found its highest expression in the fugue, a musical form in which a definite number of parts or voices unite to state and develop a single musical theme.

Bach, of all his contemporaries and, quite possibly, of all his disciples, best realized the beautifully romantic possibilities of this form.

Whether Bach himself realized the greatness of his music is doubtful. He was a studious, conscientious man, deeply absorbed in his profession. His book of studies, "The Well-Tempered Clavichord," now a classic of musical literature, was only penned as exercises for his pupils.

In his later years, Bach was asked by an admirer to what he attributed his success as a composer. Bach replied:

"I have worked hard."

And so he had. He is said to have walked a hundred miles to consult some prominent organist on a musical matter. He studied his predecessors with incessant care. He tended his large family and his art with all the intensity and love of which he was capable.

But if Bach and his contemporaries did not appreciate the full grandeur of Bach's music, succeeding generations have. They have found in it the expression of a gentle, supremely loveable and noble spirit.

POST MAR 22

BACH F[illegible] TIVAL

The Bach Festival, crowning event of the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open Tuesday afternoon and evening with the performances of the B minor Mass, to be presented in two divisions, beginning at 4:30 and 8:30, respectively. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and these soloists will assist the orchestra: Amy Evans, soprano; Adelle Alberts, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Dr. Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct.

Wednesday evening will be dedicated to the memory of the [illegible] er and supporter. Professor Bliss Pe[illegible] make the address will be heard in music of Bach, Casadesus, who ha[illegible] for the occasion, pieces for the harp[illegible]

Thursday evening the Second Brande[illegible] solo violin, flute, ob[illegible] Piano Concerto in [illegible] Alexander Borovsky and the Magnificat and soloists who a[illegible] the Mass.

Friday afternoon will be a part of t[illegible] with its programme for Orchestra No. 3, two violins, in whic[illegible] and Theodorowicz of the orchestra's first soloist, and two cant[illegible] guter Hirt" and "O[illegible] the Bach Cantata C[illegible] singers.

The programme of S[illegible] concert, although res[illegible] Friday afternoon, will not be identical. Aga[illegible] two cantatas, given wi[illegible] in Todesbanden" and [illegible] the Fifth Brandenbur[illegible] solo piano, violin and [illegible] ludes and Fugues fr[illegible] Tempered Clavichord,[illegible] Alexander Borovsky, n[illegible] the programme.

On Sunday afternoon 4:30 and at 8:30, as on th[illegible] day, the B minor Mass as a Pension Fund C[illegible] same soloists and choru[illegible]

HERALD P
MAR. 20-166
POST 20 166
GLOBE 28 166
TRANS-24-31

Mar. 22
Bos. Globe

Page 165

„Bach-Fest" des Boston-Orchesters.

Findet von Dienstag bis kommenden Sonntag in der Bostoner „Symphony Hall" statt.

Als Krönungspunkt der Feierlichkeiten anläßlich seines 50jährigen Bestehens wird das Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Symphony Hall zu Boston ein „Bach-Fest" veranstalten, welches am Dienstag dieser Woche beginnt und bis zum kommenden Sonntag eine reichhaltige Vortragsfolge vokaler und instrumentaler Werke des Thomaners bringen wird.

Das Andenken von Col. Henry L. Higginson, dem Gründer des Orchesters, wird während des zweiten Konzertes durch einen besonderen Festakt geehrt werden. Bliß Perry, Freund und Biograph des Verstorbenen, wird eine Ansprache halten.

Der Harvard Glee Club und die Radcliffe Choral Society, Dirigent Dr. Archibald T. Davison, werden bei den Aufführungen der H-moll-Messe und des „Magnificat" mitwirken; der Bach Cantata Club, Dirigent G. Wallace Woodworth, gibt ein Kantaten-Konzert. Als Vokal-Solisten wurden Amy Evans (Sopran), Margaret Matzenauer (Alt), Richard Crooks (Tenor) und Fraser Gange (Bariton) verpflichtet.

Die genauen Programme lauten:

Dienstag, 24. März, 4.30 und 8.30 Uhr:
„Messe in H-moll" (in zwei Teilen).

Mittw[illegible], 25. März, 8.30 Uhr:
Orgel-Vorspiel.
Ansprache: „Henry L. Higginson"
Clavicembalo: Präludium und Fuge, Fantasia, Italienisches Konzert (Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, Solist).

Donnerstag, 26. März, 8.30 Uhr:
Brandenburgisches Konzert No. 2 (mit Solo-Violine, Flöte, Oboe und Trompete).
Suite für Orchester, No. 1 in C-dur.
Klavier-Konzert in D moll (Alexander Borovsky, Solist).
Magnificat (Chor und Orchester.)

Freitag, 27. März, 2.30 Uhr:
Suite für Orchester, No. 3 in D.
Konzert für zwei Violinen.
Kantate: „Ich bin ein guter Hirt."
Kantate: „O, Ewigkeit."

Samstag, 28. März, 8.15 Uhr:
Kantate: „Christ lag in Todesbanden."
Brandenburgisches Konzert No. 5 (mit Piano-Solo, Violine und Flöte).
Piano-Solo: Präludien und Fugen (Alexander Borovsky, Solist).
Kantate: „Ein feste Burg".

Sonntag, 29. März, 4.30 und 8.30 Uhr:
„Messe in H-moll" (in zwei Teilen).

Staats Zeitung & Herold
MAR. 22 - N.Y.

CONCERTS

HER. MAR 22

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. St. John Ervine voices in the Observer, what many of us have felt.

"I am sick with a great sickness, sick, sick of jazz and jazzers and of sleek young men, with fishy eyes, who come out and sing a lil' song entitled 'She's Ma Sweetie But A Hadden Got No Money So She Didden Wanna Play Witt Me-e!'" If I hear another over-brilliantined under-aired young man announcing in tones of tin that he wants to go, he wants to go back to the shack where the pop-eyed Susans grow, I shall say 'For God's sake go, and don't trouble to return!'"

The Bach Festival—orchestral, choral and chamber music of Bach—takes place this week beginning next Tuesday night and ending next Sunday night, Dr. Koussevitzky will be the conductor. The Festival will celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The choruses of the B minor Mass and the Magnificat will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club with the Radcliffe Chorus Society; the choruses of the cantatas by the Bach Cantata Club. The solo quartet: Amy Evans (Mrs. Fraser Gange), Margaret Matzenauer, Richard Crooks, Fraser Gange. The instrumental soloists will be Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Wallace Goodrich, organ.

Tuesday, March 24, at 4:30 and 8:30 o'clock, the mass in B minor. The first complete performance of this mass apparently was at Berlin, in 1861. The first complete performance in this country was by the Bach choir at Bethlehem, Pa., in 1900. Portions of the Mass were performed in Boston at a Handel and Haydn concert on Feb. 27, 1887: Lilli Lehmann, Mary H. How, G. J. Parker, Jacob Benzing. The Cecilia Society gave a complete performance on Dec. 3, 1901. Mmes. Hilke, Griggs, Hussey; Messrs. Van Hoose, Townsend and Hay were the solo singers, the performance, beginning at 8 o'clock, was not divided.

Wednesday, 8:30 P. M., Bliss Perry will deliver an address, "Henry L. Higginson." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus will play harpsichord pieces: the Fantasia in C minor, the Italian concerto and a prelude and fugue from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord." Wallace Goodrich's selections will be a Fantasia in C minor, the beautiful Adagio from the Toccata in C major; a Fugue in C major; the Chorale-Prelude "Schmuecke dich, o liebe Seele," and the great and familiar Fugue in G minor.

Thursday, 8:30 P. M., the Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 (solo violin, Mr. Burgin; flute, Mr. Laurent; oboe, Mr. Gillet, and trumpet, Mr. Mager) and Piano Concerto in D minor (Mrs. Borovsky) and the Magnificat (chorus and orchestra). The Magnificat was apparently first performed in a complete form at the Cincinnati Festival of 1875. On Dec. 2 of that year Antoinette Ster[illegible] Boston at a Theodore[illegible] the solo "Esurientes On March 1, 1876, the performed here at a concert: Mrs. H. M. H. Oakes, E. Flora inch, John F. Winch. oral Society sang the hn K. Paine was the o'clock. Suite for or- major; concerto for s. Burgin and Theodo- "Ich bin ein guter and the first half of e earlier form of that first Sunday after cantata "Christ lag for Easter. Branden- 5 (with solo piano, Mr. Burgin, and flute, eludes and fugues for sky, and the cantata ." Bach set music ext by Salomo Franck, 0 Luther's hymn for festival. The earlier ntata's text were de- d Sunday in Lent. 29, 4:30 and 8:30 of the mass in B ension fund of the

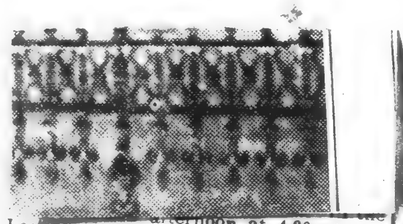
Concert-Chronicle

Recalling Mr. Borovsky

TO run down the list of "assisting artists" at the approaching Bach Festival is to find few unfamiliar names. Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz, who will play a Concerto for Two Violins, sit week by week and season after season at the first desk of the string choir at Symphony Hall. It was as organist that Bostonians first knew Mr. Wallace Goodrich as public performer. Mme. Patorni-Casadesus has played the harpsichord, whenever her husband's "Society of Ancient Instruments" has visited Boston. Mme. Evans, newcomer to the solo-quartet for the Mass in B minor, is the singing wife of Fraser Gange, who is to be the bass. The other two, Mme. Matzenauer and Mr. Crooks, return often to Boston. The pianist remains, Alexander Borovsky, heard at the Symphony Concerts five or six years ago; since a stranger to them. The other day, however, was playng Bach in London and Herbert Hughes wrote of him in the Daily Telegraph:

"Like many other people who write about music, I am frequently asked to name my 'favorite' pianist. It is the kind of question that is asked by very young people whose sincerity just saves them from being fatuous. To the question I generally answer that I have about twenty 'favorite' pianists. If I am asked to give my twelve, the name of Borovsky is one of the first three or four that occur to me at once. I was reminded of these conundrums when Borovsky made his rentrée at Wigmore Hall and performed a program devoted exclusively to Bach and Chopin. To at least one listener it was a recital that gave unmixed pleasure.

"Here was the very perfection of Bach playing, superb in control of climaxes, in rhythm, in suggestion of authentic 'clavier' music. To the Chromatic Fantasia he gave, moreover, that touch of improvisation which links up the keyboard technique of Bach with that of Chopin. Then followed groups of Studies drawn from each of the two books, the most difficult played with surpassing ease. To my way of thinking the most characteristic quality in Borovsky's playing is austerity, but it is an austerity warmed by intellectual fire."



Lecture Hall of the Library, Mr. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club, will discuss the choral works of Bach—particularly the Mass in B minor, the Magnificat and the Church Cantatas to be sung next week. In the second lecture, on Thursday, March 26, at the same hour and in the same room, Mr. Appel of the Library will speak about Bach's instrumental works, especially those to be played at the festival. Both lectures are open to the public without charge.

The orchestral Suite in D major is dropped from the third concert, on Thursday, March 26, of the Bach Festival. With it included the program was too long. The second Brandenburg Concerto, the Piano-Concerto in D minor—pianist, Mr. Borovsky—and the Magnificat remain as announced.

Boston to Philadelphia

This evening in Philadelphia, Fabien Sevitzky's Chamber Orchestra will play Arthur Foote's Suite in E major, revived to the general pleasure a year or two ago by Dr. Koussevitzky in the composer's own city. The piece is item in a "Program from Living American Composers." Another Bostonian has place—Paul Mimart with "Nephesh Haiah," whatever that title may imply. Mr. Foote's Suite is new to Philadelphia. Mr. Mimart's will be played for the first time anywhere.

Indeed, that sober and guarded Briton, Professor Terry, who is incapable of reckless speech, once dared to call Bach "an incorrigible romanticist." But Professor Terry has gone even farther: he has boldly exhibited Bach—that "cold" and "austere" and "academic" formalist of the old tradition, Bach the "purist." Bach the "absolutist"—as a wicked indulger in musical realism. Behind and above and beneath those "step-motives," those chord symbols of "waves," "winds," "clouds," "height," "descent," "depth," "slaughter," "terror," "sleep," and the rest, there was the fervent emotional power, the distinction and saliency and nobility of musical invention, which transfigured this elaborate and naive scheme of tonal symbolization and gave it enduring validity. What Bach wrote is also "emotional music in the truest and deepest sense . . . his emotional utterance has a power and an impressiveness such as we rarely meet in other music." [New York Herald Tribune

Bach is such good company. A subject is suggested, and off he goes, commenting and distinguishing, while "his eager eyes, that still take joyful note of all things joyful, beam." In his "Magnificat" it must be a dull soul that does not magnify the Lord. Did anyone ever write trumpet parts like those in "Et resurrexit"? or such a "story without an end" as the Allemande of the fourth Partita? Did ever dances so pulsate with life as does the little suite embedded in the first Brandenburg Concerto? And his minors are only serious, not sad; they are just majors with a steel core. Mode and key mean nothing to him in themselves. They are only the handles he takes hold of music by. There is nothing introspective about him; nothing of self-expression, so dear to this psychological age. He writes music, as another man builds a bridge,

The True Bach Escaping from The Tradition

The Return to the Tone-Poet For Second Preluding to His Boston Festival

TRANS MAR. 11

IN the twenties of the last century, Bach was a name. On May 24, 1830, Charles Lamb had heard of it—from his friend Nov—, no doubt—for he tells us that he did not know whether to pronounced it Bach or Batch. But "in an age like this, constituted to the quick and critical perception of all harmonious combinations, I verily believe, beyond all preceding ages, since Jubal stumbled upon the gamut," knowledge of Bach was confined to a few people like Nov— and Wesley and Crotch. Henry Bishop, who was knighted a dozen years later for having represented English music, seems to have done that by using such time as he could spare from the mutilation of Shakspeare to please Mrs. Grundy upon the "cutting" of foreign operas, not, as Fétis unkindly said, to temper the wind to the incompetent native executant, but out of regard for "the state of the public taste for music, which was not sufficiently cultivated to understand them."

This "age of critical perception," this "insufficiently cultivated public taste"! We seem still to hear these discrepant voices. The present never knows much about itself. But if the present age has a faith, that faith is that Bach is music, and music Bach. That faith has taken a century of "first performances" and another century of Bach Societies to build; but these have carried critical perception through to public taste. Miss Myra Hess once gave a recital in New York, and the audience sat spellbound, as we, too, have seen them do, till someone in the gallery shouted "Bach!" The cry was taken up, and she played what they asked. What next? "More Bach!" She confided afterwards to a friend that the same thing had happened to her at Lincoln, Neb. Our halls and cathedrals are crumbling; but this architect's work still stands as he left it 175 years ago, with its stones worn smooth by the knees of worshipers.

Bach wrote fugues; that was all our grandfathers knew about him, and their one of voice proclaimed that they did not like fugues. And, indeed, why should they, considering the way they were played? Generations had taught them that a fugue was a parsing lesson. Thackeray it was, perhaps, who first showed us that blood could beat warmly under patches, and Austin Dobson that tongues wagged lightly under perukes. In like manner tonal answer and stretto and episode were laws that the full-bottomed wigs dared not disobey, and yet at the same time no more than a framework in which much strength and loveliness could display themselves. It is the merit of this generation to have been sure of that at last, and Bach is now played and listened to as a human being.

He is not played as he heard his own music. He counted his choir and orchestra by units and we count ours by tens. His sententious harpsichord and persuasive clavichord have grown into the stentorian pianoforte. His audience sits in tiered halls instead of in uncomfortable pews or smoky cellars lit by tallow candles. But he would have thought nothing of such changes, and would have made music as easily with them as without them. One thing would have delighted him—the increased skill of instrumental performance. One thing would have surprised him—the piety and incompetence of the singing. He would have been puzzled by the reverential attitude towards very ordinary passages and have wondered why they were so often out of tune until he realized that the singers spent one year instead of ten on learning their business.

One fancies he would have welcomed the pianoforte. Its easily graduated tone and sustaining power would have made up for the loss of precise articulation or of a wavering touch. His music had not yet developed those shock tactics which make the piano for us a terror in some hands. Bach has plenty of "mood," but he gets it by doing work, and the way to play him is to work as hard. That is the true "reverence." [London Times

Bach has suffered, like so many composers since his day, from the obscuring effect of a mist of legend—in his case, the legend of the "dry" and "formal" and "pedantic" Bach. The word "Bach" and the word "fugue" were long synonymous in the popular mind; and to the popular mind a fugue is necessarily "dry," instead of being, as it is in the hands of a genius, one of the most exciting of musical forms. These beliefs have erected formidable barriers in the way of a general understanding of the true nature of Bach's contribution to music. The dryly scholastic Bach, the formal, periwigged Bach, is largely, of course, an imaginary figure. Bach, to be sure, had dull and routine and perfunctory moments, days of flagging imagination and invention—and no wonder, considering his unremitting labors and the incredible vastness of his output. But the real Bach, the great and essential Bach, was an utterly different being from that of the figure of popular legend. He was not only one of the most richly human of all composers, but one of the most poetical, dramatic and deeply emotional.

Bach Festival This Week Brings Forth Great Expectations

ADV. MAR 22

By Morris Hastings

THE STAGE is brilliantly set for the Bach Festival which commences at Symphony Hall next Tuesday afternoon with a performance of the Mass in B-minor.

Among the soloists to appear with the orchestra are Alexander Borovsky, pianist, an outstanding interpreter of Bach; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichordist; Margarete Matzenauer, magnificent mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; the Harvard Glee Club; Wallace Goodrich, organist, and the Bach Cantata Club.

The layman who notes with awe the presence of so much religious music on the festival program must remember that the artistic life of Bach's time had its roots deeply in the church. Bach is no less fresh, interesting and companionable for that reason.

Of these religious compositions, the most seldom performed are, doubtless, the cantatas. They are scored for mixed chorus, orchestra—strings, woodwinds and brasses—and organ. The text, sometimes of inferior literary worth, is taken from nondescript hymns—or, infrequently, from the Bible. During his lifetime, 65

ALEXANDER BOROVSKY, pianist in Bach Festival.

Continued on Page 4, Column 1

SUOSIDO
Chq 'sa

these splendid works for about $40!

When Bach was organist in Weimar, Cothen or Eisenach, he supervised the performance of these cantatas every Sunday morning. They were given early in the church service, which began at seven in the morning. Terry, an authority on Bach, tells us that they were played and sung in a cold church by musicians who had been routed out of bed and but half-fed. "Truly," exclaims the writer, "a heroic age!"

"These cantatas," continues Terry, "dissipate the illusion that Bach was a cold mathematical precisian. They reveal him as one of the tenderest of men with a poet's soul and a painter's eye."

If one is not frightened away by the religious character of so much of Bach's music, he may be intimidated by the scholastic titles of the rest of his compositions—the fugues, the preludes or the fantasias, for example.

Again, it should be recalled that composers of that day—with the exception of French and English musicians—were not accustomed to giving descriptive titles to their music. It was a time of "absolute music"—long before the days when bleating sheep and roaring locomotives were set forth in tone.

Bach's nature found its highest expression in the fugue, a musical form in which a definite number of parts or voices unite to state and develop a single musical theme.

Bach, of all his contemporaries and, quite possibly, of all his disciples, best realized the beautifully romantic possibilities of this form.

Whether Bach himself realized the greatness of his music is doubtful. He was a studious, conscientious man, deeply absorbed in his profession. His book of studies, "The Well-Tempered Clavichord," now a classic of musical literature, was only penned as exercises for his pupils.

In his later years, Bach was asked by an admirer to what he attributed his success as a composer. Bach replied:

"I have worked hard."

And so he had. He is said to have walked a hundred miles to consult some prominent organist on a musical matter. He studied his predecessors with incessant care. He tended his large family and his art with all the intensity and love of which he was capable.

But if Bach and his contemporaries did not appreciate the full grandeur of Bach's music, succeeding generations have. They have found in it the expression of a gentle, supremely loveable and noble spirit.

POST MAR 22

BACH F TIVAL

The Bach Festival, crowning event of the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open Tuesday afternoon and evening with the performances of the B minor Mass, to be presented in two divisions, beginning at 4:30 and 8:30, respectively. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and these soloists will assist the orchestra: Amy Evans, soprano; Adelle Alberts, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Dr. Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct.

Wednesday evening will be dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder and supporter, Henry L. Higginson. Professor Bliss Perry of Harvard will make the address, Wallace Goodrich will be heard in some of the organ music of Bach, and Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, who has come from France for the occasion, will play a group of pieces for the harpsichord.

Thursday evening there will be heard the Second Brandenburg Concerto, for solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet; the Piano Concerto in D minor, in which Alexander Borovsky will be the soloist, and the Magnificat, with the choruses and soloists who are to be heard in the Mass.

Friday afternoon a regular concert will be a part of this Bach Festival, with its programme listing the Suite for Orchestra No. 3, the Concerto for two violins, in which Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz of the first desk of the orchestra's first violins will be the soloist, and two cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit," with the Bach Cantata Club supplying the singers.

The programme of Saturday evening's concert, although resembling that of Friday afternoon, will on this occasion not be identical. Again there will be two cantatas, given with the assistance of the Bach Cantata Club, "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein Feste Burg"; the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto, for solo piano, violin and flute, and Preludes and Fugues from "The Well-Tempered Clavichord," performed by Alexander Borovsky, make the rest of the programme.

On Sunday afternoon and evening, at 4:30 and at 8:30, as on the previous Tuesday, the B minor Mass will be repeated as a Pension Fund Concert, with the same soloists and choruses.

HERALD P
MAR. 20-166
POST 20 166
GLOBE 28 166
TRANS-24-31

Mar. 22
Bos. Globe

Page 165

CONCERTS

HER. MAR 22

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. St. John Ervine voices in the Observer, what many of us have felt.

"I am sick with a great sickness, sick, sick of jazz and jazzers and of sleek young men, with fishy eyes, who come out and sing a lil' song entitled 'She's Ma Sweetie But A Hadden Got No Money So She Didden Wanna Play Witt Me-e!'". If I hear another over-brilliantined under-aired young man announcing in tones of tin that he wants to go, he wants to go back to the shack where the pop-eyed Susans grow, I shall say 'For God's sake go, and don't trouble to return!'"

The Bach Festival—orchestral, choral and chamber music of Bach—takes place this week beginning next Tuesday night and ending next Sunday night, Dr. Koussevitzky will be the conductor. The Festival will celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The choruses of the B minor Mass and the Magnificat will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club with the Radcliffe Chorus Society; the choruses of the cantatas by the Bach Cantata Club. The solo quartet: Amy Evans (Mrs. Fraser Gange), Margaret Matzenauer, Richard Crooks, Fraser Gange. The instrumental soloists will be Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Wallace Goodrich, organ.

Tuesday, March 24, at 4:30 and 8:30 o'clock, the mass in B minor. The first complete performance of this mass apparently was at Berlin, in 1861. The first complete performance in this country was by the Bach choir at Bethlehem, Pa., in 1900. Portions of the Mass were performed in Boston at a Handel and Haydn concert on Feb. 27, 1887: Lilli Lehmann, Mary H. How, G. J. Parker, Jacob Benzing. The Cecilia Society gave a complete performance on Dec. 3, 1901. Mmes. Hilke, Griggs, Hussey; Messrs. Van Hoose, Townsend and Hay were the solo singers, the performance, beginning at 8 o'clock, was not divided

Wednesday, 8:30 P. M., Bliss Perry will deliver an address, "Henry L. Higginson." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus will play harpsichord pieces: the Fantasia in C minor, the Italian concerto and a prelude and fugue from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord." Wallace Goodrich's selections will be a Fantasia in C minor, the beautiful Adagio from the Toccata in C major; a Fugue in C major; the Chorale-Prelude "Schmuecke dich, o liebe Seele," and the great and familiar Fugue in G minor.

Thursday, 8:30 P. M., the Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 (solo violin, Mr. Burgin; flute, Mr. Laurent; oboe, Mr. Gillet, and trumpet, Mr. Mager) and Piano Concerto in D minor (Mrs. Borovsky) and the Magnificat (chorus and orchestra). The Magnificat was apparently first performed in a complete form at the Cincinnati Festival of 1875. On Dec. 8 of that year Antoinette Sterling sang in Boston at a Theodore Thomas concert the solo "Esurientes implevit bonis." On March 1, 1876, the whole work was performed here at a Theodore Thomas concert: Mrs. H. M. Smith, Mrs. G. H. Oakes, E. Flora Barry, W. J. Winch, John F. Winch. The Sharland Choral Society sang the choruses, and John K. Paine was the organist.

Friday: 2:30 o'clock. Suite for orchestra No. 3, D major; concerto for two violins (Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz); cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt," for Easter, and the first half of "O Ewigkeit," the earlier form of that cantata for the first Sunday after Trinity.

Saturday: The cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden," for Easter. Brandenburg concerto No. 5 (with solo piano, Mr. Borovsky, violin, Mr. Burgin, and flute, Mr. Laurent). Preludes and fugues for piano, Mr. Borovsky, and the cantata "Ein feste Burg." Bach set music about 1716 for a text by Salomo Franck, and added in 1730 Luther's hymn for the Reformation festival. The earlier portions of the cantata's text were designed for the third Sunday in Lent.

Sunday, March 29, 4:30 and 8:30 P. M. Repetition of the mass in B minor for the pension fund of the orchestra.

Boston Herald

Land in Sicht.

Wenn man so manche Artikel in der Glaubercke lieft, kann kann man sehen, daß es immer wieder die Deutschen sind, die nicht Aufmerksamkeit wollen. Es will immer einer dem andern etwas vormachen. Warum halten diese Nationen aufammen? Ich habe hier schon Deutsche angetroffen, die noch garnicht lange im Lande sind, aber sie wollen nicht deutsch sprechen. Ist es nicht eine Schande? Die einzige Zeitung in der Glaubercke hängt einem schon zum Halse heraus? Zum Beispiel die vielen Artikeln auf den Artikel an die Arbeiterin. Es war nur immer ein und derselbe Inhalt und doch nichts Gedichtes, als auf zwei Artikel, die gut geschrieben waren. Nur allen Dingen waren nicht gemeine, grobe, unanständige Worte gebraucht. Warum immer gleich so ungeschickt werden, es geht auch mit anderen Worten zu machen. Es wird so manches in den Artikeln hineingeheimnißt, was nicht verantwortet werden kann.

Nun auf den Artikel "Ein Rentabler Vortrag" zurückzukommen: Egaen Sie

From a Summit of Music Boston's First Bach Festival Now Makes Its Start a Quarter of a Century Mass in B-minor Is tably Prepared by Many Hands

WHEN rumor first came, about a year ago, that the next festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra might be a ch Festival, there were those who were ick to say, "It can't be done. There is ot enough music available for an orchestra, and what there is, is not of sufficient variety to give a week's festival." The reply, "But Dr. Koussevitzky wants to do the B minor Mass," brought the less cock-sure answer, "Perhaps,—it can be done, if enough vocal works are included. But (again in a firmer tone of voice) it can't be a purely orchestral festival, such as we have been having." Whether that ...ained to be a demurrer or no, to many it brought the pleasant anticipation ...stival more varied than any that ...t come to pass since the ambition hou...r the centenary of the death of Beethoven first put the festival idea into the min...ds of the powers at Symphony Hall.

Thus ... has happened that a schedule of six ... certs is about to bring with it more ... orchestral works than works for ... chestra. Indeed of purely or- ch... orks, no more than four (two co... nd two suites) stand on the six ... st. While four cantatas, the great Magnificat and two performances of the Mass itself sums up the vocal works. If to the orchestral works be added the piano concerto, the concerto for two violins, the solos for piano, for harpsichord, for organ, it will be seen that instrumental works may nevertheless hold up their heads beside the vocal works, may add also an element of variety at first unsuspected.

Bach wrote in practically all the known forms of his day except that of opera and its off-shoot, the Handelian oratorio. Little does the organ student with his preludes and fugues, or the piano student with his inventions, or the violin student with his sonatas suspect that what Bach wrote for him is but an insignificant portion (quantitatively considered) of the total output of the great master. Little do all three know that the sum of the works for all of them, with all the other instrumental works thrown in for good measure, do not begin to equal the volume of the works for chorus—the cantatas, the passions, the masses, the motets, the chorales.

Bach's choral works fall naturally into two groups, the works in German and the works in Latin. Roughly, these are works inspired respectively by the needs of the services of the German Protestant Church and by the liturgy of the Roman Catholic Church. That Bach differentiated between the two in style may not be known to those whose acquaintance with the Leipzig cantor has been entirely through the instrumental works. Upon this point a writer in the Oxford History of Music expresses himself as follows:

"In setting music to Latin words, the fact that Bach altered his style considerably need not be demonstrated, as it is obvious to every one who has ears. But the wide gulf between the essentially German settings of the Passion or the cantatas for the Lutheran service, and the great mass, with its world-wide significance and universal appeal, is in some measure bridged by certain compositions to Latin words, in which the characteristics of the best Italian music of the day are adopted. [Four settings of the Sanctus.] Both here and in the great setting of the Magnificat [also to be heard in this festival] for the five-part choir, solos and full orchestra, there is clearly a recognition of the beauty and fitness of the best Italian style, and even such mannerisms as the two treble parts in opposition to the rest may be traced, as well as the habit of writing for these two mainly in thirds."

With the German style and the German cantatas a subsequent article will concern itself. At the moment one may inquire into some of the distinguishing characteristics of the Catholic church music of Bach's day. This ranged from a gorgeous and splendid objectivity on the one hand, to a triviality on the other, which causes historians to complain bitterly. A certain hard brilliance appears to have been a dominant quality. "When Roman Catholic composers," writes C. Hubert Parry, "had an orchestra and solo voices as well as choirs, their style became essentially mundane. The passionate words of prayer served mainly as syllables for vocal music which would gratify a gay and thoughtless throng."

One way in which this manifested itself was in the frequent presence of two soprano parts, chorus or solo. This was so general as to be almost a rule. In the simpler of the masses of the day, often the score of an entire number consisted of two sopranos and a bass with no intervening parts. "There are not wanting (continues the writer in the Oxford History) signs that the average musical person of the period thought little of the balance of the parts, or of the massive harmonies, in comparison with the brilliance that is undoubtedly gained by the association of two soprano parts, whether in duet or chorus. In the earlier instances the two are treated as of equal importance and cross one another with beautiful intertwinings, above a solid instrumental bass."

Both Bach's Mass in B minor and Bach's Magnificat are written for five-part chorus, that is chorus with two sopranos. But needless to say, Bach, close student of all styles that he was, followed the best rather than worst features of contemporary Italian style. The duet "Christe Eleison" (for two sopranos) brings much interweaving of the two voices, but also a little of the sweetness of successions of thirds. The duet for soprano and tenor "Domine Deus," though in part a strict canon, also has its occasional thirds. But the duet "Et in unum" is rigorously contrapuntal and largely canonic. The chorale-melody, so strong a bulwark of Bach's German choral works, is of course entirely absent from the Latin Catholic works.

Bach wrote in all five works which bear the name "mass." Says Professor Terry in Grove's dictionary: "Five of the Leipzig works bear the title 'Missa' (Messe: Mass)—the Mass in B minor, and four miscalled 'short' Masses in F major, G minor, A major, and G major. In Lutheran liturgical use the 'Missa' was a setting of the Kyrie and Gloria in Excelsis sung at the beginning of the 'Hauptgottesdienst' after the Introit. The four 'short' Masses are complete Lutheran 'Messen.' The Mass in B minor in its original form also was a Lutheran 'Messe,' composed in 1733 . . . The subsequent addition of the Credo, Sanctus (with Osanna and Benedictus) and Agnus Dei enlarged it to conform in structure to the Roman 'Ordinarium Missae,' though Bach neither wrote it for Roman use nor made it serviceable for use at Dresden by sending these addenda to his Roman Catholic sovereign. These added portions were to a large extent drawn from earlier works and the autograph of the complete Mass may be dated circa 1738."

The circumstances which caused Bach to start the composition of the mass were anything but a desire to express himself in this lofty form. By faith and temperament he was a devout Protestant. In his daily life he was an exceedingly busy man, training at the Thomasschule at Leipzig, the choristers for the choirs of four churches of the town, himself playing the organ at St. Thomas, writing music for the choirs, performing certain more onerous duties connected with the school instruction and discipline. It was not likely that he would go beyond that round of duties except for urgent reason. The reason lay in the situation in which he found himself in relation to the solid —and stolid—burghers on the Leipzig town council who were his masters. He was often pressed hard in his disagreements with them, even to the point of fearing for the security of his position. Could he receive a court appointment from the king, he could flaunt this in the faces of those who sought to do him an indignity. With this in mind he wrote the first portions of the mass (1733) and delivered them to the Catholic Augustus III of Poland-Saxony with this letter:

> I lay before your kingly Majesty this trifling proof of the science which I have been able to acquire in music, with the very humble petition that you will be pleased to regard it, not according to the meanness of the composition but with a gracious eye, as well befits your Majesty's world-famed clemency and condescend to take me under your Majesty's most mighty protection. For some years, and up to the present time, I have had the direction of the music in the two principal churches in Leipzig; but I have had to suffer, though in all innocence, from one or another vexatious cause, at different times a diminution of the fees connected with this function, which might be withheld altogether unless your kingly Majesty will show me grace and confer upon me a predicate of your Majesty's Court Capelle, and will issue your high command to the proper persons for the granting of a patent to that effect. And such a gracious accedence to my most humble petition will bind me by infinite obligation; and I hereby offer myself in most dutiful obedience to prove my indefatigable diligence in composing church music as well as in your orchestra, whenever it is your kingly Majesty's most gracious desire, and to devote my whole powers to your Majesty's service, remaining, in constant fidelity, your kingly Majesty's most humble and obedient servant, JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH

Dresden, July 27, 1733.

The letter had no immediate effect. But in 1736 Bach was made Hof-Komponist to Augustus III. Authorities are mystified as to the reasons that impelled Bach to write the rest of the mass, as well as to composition dates of later portions.

As Professor Terry has already hinted, portions of the Mass in B minor were originally composed for other works. Schweitzer gives the list: "The Gratias comes from the cantata 'Wir danken dir' (No. 29); the Qui tollis from 'Schauet doch und sehet' (No. 46); the Patrem omnipotentem from 'Gott, wie ist dein Name' (No. 171); the Crucifixus from 'Weinen, Klagen' (No, 12); the Osanna from the secular cantata 'Preise dein Glück'; the Agnus Dei from the cantata 'Lobet Gott in seinen Reichen' (No. 11). These are not mere transfers, however, but rearrangements, often so thoroughgoing that it is more correct to speak of their being suggested by the original than borrowed from it. We can estimate the musical value of these numbers without the necessity of taking into account that they exist in other forms and other texts of the same nature." For which Parry's "Bach" furnishes confirmation: "Among the amazing features of it all, not the least amazing is the aptness of the transference from the German words to the Latin. In all cases the connection of the music with the meaning of the words in the respective languages is very close, and the result not merely justifies the apparently anomalous procedure, but, in the particular instances, entirely stultifies abstract criticism."

One may even go farther. In every case where borrowing has occurred, the cantata in which the chorus originates is of subject matter identical with that portion of the mass into which it is placed. Is this not well-nigh irrefutable evidence that Bach associated one particular music so definitely with a given line of thought or feeling, that even the differences between Latin and German diction or between Roman and Protestant style could not stand in the way of associating that thought or feeling with the music which for him adhered to it? In short, these transfers seem to prove that expressiveness, definite expressiveness goes deeper than all the other considerations with Bach.

In the Mass in B minor, Bach's orchestra consists of flutes, oboes, bassoons, trumpets, drums and strings. The oboe is not the oboe of our day, but the oboe d'amore, pitched a third lower. The wind instruments are often used "obbligato," in the fashion of the day.

The mass of the Roman Catholic church includes of course the Kyrie, Gloria in Excelsis, Credo, Sanctus Agnus Dei. For Bach the three-fold "Kyrie eleison" (Lord, Have Mercy), "Christe eleison," "Kyrie eleison" means three extended musical numbers. The five-voiced fugue with which the Kyrie begins, at once sets the mood for the whole mass, that of penitence, of an ardent pleading for forgiveness of sins. As successive points rise higher and higher, the pleading seems to become more and more urgent until it reaches a point of almost painful insistence. The "Christe eleison," a duet for two sopranos, is in turn free from this passion for forgiveness. It is serene and confident, an expression of the faith that is certain of pardon, and that the Christ will grant it. The final Kyrie reduces the chorus to four parts. It breathes less gloom than the first. A fine tranquillity runs through it.

The Gloria in Excelsis Bach divides into eight distinct numbers—Gloria, Laudamus, Gratias, Domine Deus, Qui tollis Qui sedes, Quoniam, Cum sancto Spiritu. Gloria, Laudamus, Gratias form a first group of praise and thanksgiving. The radiance of a company of angels (naturally associated with ideas of "glory") bursts dazzlingly forth as trumpets sound the five rhythms, give voice to the exuberance of the "Gloria" theme. There is sudden change to a mood of meditative tranquility when the chorus reaches "et in terra pax." With it soon a gently florid theme with an air of serene joy on "bonae voluntatis" soon mingles. Laudamus comes as a soprano solo with violin obbligato. Says Schweitzer: "The fine violin accompaniment . . . is a typical specimen of Bach's 'joy' motif. In Bach's works there are at least two hundred motives constructed on this rhythm of joy, while it is scarcely met with in Handel or Beethoven." It is a rhythm of two-sixteenth notes alternating with an eighth. The Gratias expresses its thanks through an exceedingly plain theme, probably placed at this point as a sort of relief after the florid Laudamus. But when "magnam gloriam tuam" is reached, there is again an active theme more in the spirit of the original Gloria.

As the first three divisions of the Gloria have been praising God, the other five concern themselves with the Glory of the Christ. The duet for tenor and soprano Domine Deus, has been called a "charming intermezzo" by one commentator. Parry makes these enlightening observations: "The melodic material is in a singularly tender mood, the cue to which is a short descending figure of four notes from tonic to dominant, which Bach used rather frequently when in that vein. . . . Such a mood might not seem obviously appropriate to the words unless it be remembered that the name 'Jesus' always suggests to Bach, and probably to the majority of German Lutherans of that time, a feeling of tenderness and love."

The Qui tollis is one of the most expressive numbers of the entire mass. It is a four-part chorus, often in strict canon form. Its mood mirrors perfectly the reverent mood of the text: its theme of descending thirds would seem to grow out of the very diction of the Latin. But this happens to be one of the choruses that Bach re-made out of an existing cantata chorus of similar emotional import. And Antonia Lotti (1667-1740) had used a very similar theme in one of his masses. Qui sedes and Quoniam tu solus are respectively an alto solo with accompaniment of oboe d'amore and a broader and bolder bass solo with horn obbligato. This leads into one of the most magnificent choruses of the mass, the Cum sancto Spirito with which the Gloria ends. This brilliant chorus of rejoicing leads to an elaborate closing fugue on a fiery theme. It is one of the most magnificent fugues (or compositions, for that matter) on record.

The Credo falls into these divisions: Credo in unum Deum, Et in unum Dominum, Et incarnatus, Crucifixus, Et Resurrexit, Et in Spiritum sanctum, Confiteor. The old plain-song intonation for the Credo, Bach uses as the theme for the five-voiced fugue which is the introductory movement for this division. The solidity of the music here expresses affirmation, a statement of belief so positive as to be unshakeable. Bach's creed is "founded upon a rock"—this first chorus. Schweitzer asserts that the succeeding duet in canon (soprano and alto with two oboes) Et in unum Dominum, is a statement of theological dogma more convincing than words can ever be: "He makes both singers sing the same notes, but in such a way that it does not amount to the same thing; the voices follow each other in strict canonic imitation, the one proceeds out of the other as Christ proceeds of God. Even the instruments take part in the canon. They harmonize in a special way the community of substance and difference of persons; the notes [that are repeated] are always phrased in two distinct ways in the different instruments. Bach thus proves that the dogma can be expressed much more clearly and satisfactorily in music than in verbal formulae."

Et incarnatus has always fired the imagination of composers. Bach is no exception. Mystery, wonder, a solemn, awed tenderness breathe from these gentle string figures, from the poignant harmonies of this five-voiced chorus. Note the descending figures and the conclusive pause at the words, "and was made man," then the resumption of the figure in the lowest register "symbolizing" according to Schweitzer "the Spirit being abased into flesh." But the Crucifixus, (four-part chorus over a chromatic descending ground-bass) cuts even deeper.

Parry has a most discerning and sympathetic description: "Each voice enters separately as with an amazed soul-stricken ejaculation of the single word 'Crucifixus,' and then, all joining together in the reflective 'etiam pro nobis,' warm to a passion too deep for tears. Bach's supreme mastery of the expressive harmonies which are obtainable by polyphonic treatment here finds its highest manifestation. . . . The final passage to the words 'sepultus est' is one of the supreme moments in music. Its wonder lies in its combining, like a psychological condition, many different phases. While the rare harmonies and the melody descending to the lowest available notes in the voices express the depths of overwhelming sorrow, the subtle alteration of the progression of the bass from the long formula which has persisted throughout the movement suggests to the mind mysteriously the sense of something great that is coming. So the very passage which embodies the utmost exhaustion of despair suggests at the same time the premonition of the triumphant Resurrexit [brilliant five-part chorus] which seems to leap from the very close of the Crucifixus, and is sustained with a perfect blaze of jubilant exhilaration throughout." There follows a flowing bass air, "Et in unum spiritum."

The closing "Confiteor" is another huge five-part fugal chorus. After a time the old plain-song intonation is introduced. But with "et expecto resurrectionem mortuorum" the "resurrection" motif bursts in with unspeakable brilliance. The chorus closes with a joyous "Amen."

Commentators vie with each other in singing the praises of the Sanctus as the grandest conception in the mass. Schweitzer conceives that Bach, with Isaiah, saw "how the Lord sat on His high throne, surrounded by the seraphims, who cried unto one another, 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God of Hosts' so loudly that 'the posts of the door moved.'" For this crying to one another Bach requires a six-voiced chorus, the three upper in antiphonal effect with two middle voices, the whole above a most magnificent bass. Similar is the Osanna. The Benedictus, a tenor solo with violin obbligato, is contemplative in character. The Agnus Dei, an alto solo of deep pathos, is one of the most expressively beautiful solos in the entire work. "The mass concludes," says Parry, "with a repetition of the music of the Gratias from the earlier part of the work, to the concluding words, 'Dona nobis pacem,' the noble simplicity of style making a very fitting and solemn conclusion to the immense scheme."

In conclusion, for general view, let authorities speak. Rutland Boughton, in "Bach, the Master," writes that "whatever of vital force the mass possesses derives from a depth beyond personal understanding." Schweitzer: "The salient quality of the B minor Mass is its wonderful sublimity. . . . Some of the splendid and brilliant chief choruses have quite a 'Catholic' tinge. Yet in other movements we get the same subjective, intimate spirit as in the cantatas, which we may regard as the Protestant element in Bach's religion. The sublime and the intimate do not interpenetrate; they co-

Continued on Following Page

An Etching by Orlick

In the Collection of Mme. Wanda Landowska

Backward to the Composer and His Day—Forward Through The Work That Sealed His Fame

Bach's Mass

Continued from Preceding Page

exist side by side; they are separable from each other like the objective and the subjective in Bach's piety; and so the B minor Mass is at once Catholic and Protestant, and in addition as enigmatic and unfathomable as the religious consciousness of its creator." The Oxford History describes thus: "Not unlike a magnificent Gothic cathedral, full of mystery and confusion to the unaccustomed eye, with its distances lost in a perplexing maze of interwoven arches, and aisles dim with incense-smoke, beside the typical church of the Italian Renaissance, where everything is definite and bright and hard, and where smoothness of surface in pavement, walls, or columns has evidently been the builder's first object. . . . The qualities which entitle it to rank among the supreme masterpieces of music, and in particular to be counted with Palestrina's Missa Papae Marcelli and Beethoven's Mass in D, as one of the three greatest of all masses, are to be found rather in the choruses than in its solo numbers. Not even in his settings of the Passion had Bach revealed anything like such a wealth of massive conceptions, every theme of which is not only noble and expressive, but individual." Parry sums up much that Schweitzer has touched on and ends with a ringing assertion: "Bach, though using the same Latin words as were employed in the Roman church, took them to heart with a depth of earnestness which was essentially Teutonic. And this attitude was the ultimate source of the unique qualities of the work as a whole; for as an example of the setting of the mass it stands quite alone, even Beethoven's great mass appearing artificial and operatic by comparison."

A. H. M.

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians

Bach's Mass Outpoured by Young Voices

Composer, Conductor, Chorus, Divide the Honors of A Rare Occasion

REASONABLY, Bach's Mass in B minor should be heard at long intervals and on exceptional occasions. In England or in Germany audiences and performers "put up banks and hold firm through three hours of song" in the concert-hall with no more than usual intermissions. Americans, it is said, are a less enduring breed. It is certain that on this side of the Atlantic the Mass—as it was sung in Symphony Hall—in two "sessions," each approximately an hour and a half in length, with as long, or longer, intervals for rest and refreshment. This being what life is, only on festival occasions can many of us adjust the concert-schedule that closes us in at four in the afternoon and releases us at ten in the evening. At the first "session" on Tuesday, there were empty seats; at the second there were many: much is proof for the asking. On Sunday, however, when the Mass is to be repeated, Symphony Hall will be crowded to the doors—because, for most, the day is a holiday.

To the practical objection, add the spiritual. The Mass in B minor is choral music of largest dimensions and most exacting content. It exhausts the choir and the conductor, as witnessed the weary Koussevitzky when he turned to answer the thrice of applause at the end of the evening's session." It taxes also the orchestra and the solo-singers. The audience is at proportionate strain. Solos and duets aside, it listens to music that makes rare conditions. It copes with magnitude, fervors, sublimities, to be found nowhere else. They are cast in an idiom strange to ears habitually turned to nineteenth or twentieth-century composers.

These hearers are bred in the belief that the Mass in B minor overtops all other choral music; that to prepare it and to hear it constitute an event, not to recur too often. Reduce the Mass to a repertory piece, and it might become, to the lay listener, as institutional as "Messiah"; while the specialists would arrive and depart, as they do in London or Berlin, wrangling about this, that and the other pedantry. Even Bethlehem of Pennsylvania, whither most go for two days of Bach unalloyed and unperturbed, may err when it installs the Mass in B minor as annual rite. Practice may make perfect; but repetition also brings routine. Before Bach's mighty monument, the sense of surprise is part of the sense of transport.

Practical wisdom, then, guided Dr. Koussevitzky when he reserved his long-projected revival of the Mass for the jubilee of the Symphony Orchestra and for a Bach Festival designed in particular to honor the memory of the founder and sustainer through forty-five years. The conductor was as wise when he gave the two concerts no ritual or religious aspect. Those archeologists believe that numbers from the Mass may have been sung now and again in Bach's church at Leipsig; but, as a whole, it is impossible to the Roman or any other liturgy. When he handed considerable parts of the score to his august master, the King of Saxony, Bach may have hoped that the Kyrie or the Gloria might be heard at the Court Church in Dresden. At bottom however, he wrote the Mass to release his powers and unfold his imaginings under the spur of a classic text. The outcome was highly delineative and highly emotionalized music, scaling heights and sounding depths incompatible with church-walls. In our time, such music belongs to the concert-hall; may be heard there only; lays hold as such upon listeners, transporting them into the Bachian world of sound and vision.

To listen to the Mass in B minor is to believe that Bach's imagination, working upon the churchly text, forthwith transmuted it. There were pious painters, and painters more pictorial than pious, who saw humanity in hosts before its God. In multitudes they sued for mercy; from the Divine Presence drew consolation and healing. In multitudes they affirmed their faith. In multitudes assembled in Paradise, proclaimed the glories of their thrice-holy Lord. Occasionally a single figure, in petition, meditation or adoration, stood forth from the rest, exalted. Such hosts crowd even the most spacious altar-pieces. For them, in his turn, Bach could outspread the immeasurable canvas of music. In vision he also descried the host of heaven, men and angels, singing the praises of their God—and put to music-paper in his Sanctus the sublimities of their song. He saw the single figure, heard the individual but all-penetrating voice. Then he wrote his Benedictus for tenor and violin; the Agnus Dei for alto and orchestra.

To the painter's eye Bach joined the composer's ear, and in his Kyrie humanity entreats the Divine Mercy, receives the Divine Solace. Through the splendors of the Gloria they sing in devout rejoicing the praises and the compassion of their Lord. Bach passes to the profession of their faith, and into tones dramatizes the Creed. A hushed world awaits the Incarnation; a despairing world turns away from the Crucifixion; a world elate hails the Resurrection. Hearing, seeing, believing, it uprears its faith at the beginning; to high heaven cries it at the end.

To the translation of these visions into tones Bach brought an exhaustless resource. Every form in musical use in his time—fugue, canon, duet, air, what not—was at his command. There was no end to the range of his counterpoint. He not only manipulated his orchestra, he felt the instruments in it—oboes, violins, horns, trumpets—as we use the word of the master-composers of our time. In these seventeen-thirties, he also was coloring airs and duets. He upreared the great framework of his choruses. He filled it with puissant sonorities to this day overwhelming those that hear. They were and are as the magnitude of his visions of humanity and the Godhead. The fervors and the glories of those visions were also upon him. They heated him and he pictured and dramatized. His composing spirit became a very crucible of emotion. In it music was molten. He put it to paper and in the notes upon the staves it was congealed.

Bach, moreover, compassed these visions, knew these sensations, wrought them into tones, as believing and devout Christian. For him the Mass-book was no mere text to be occasion for music. Humanity entreated the Divine Pity. He also had need of it. The hosts of earth and heaven praised God, the Lord. In his place among them stood Johann Sebastian Bach. The Creed affirmed a universal faith. It was his own as well. The Creed narrated the Incarnation, Passion, Resurrection of the Son of God. The Divine Tragedy, it is true, but also the tragedy and the triumph of his individual faith. In him, whether or not he knew them, were "immortal longings" and of them he made his Mass.

Performance should achieve the magnitude and the grandeur of the Mass as music of the largest choral forms, the utmost choral sonorities, to be the voice of human hosts before God the Lord. It should release also the fervors and the sublimities of the spirit that saw and heard in vision; was holden and possessed. That spirit cast its visions and sensations, its humilities and exaltations into an incandescent music. Because it had no other way, set it down in the black and white of notation. Performance must regain this heat and glow. The present Bachian world is over-crowded with scholars and pedants. So far as this review is concerned, they shall be left to debate among themselves whether this or that movement was properly integrated in the present performance of the Mass; whether a tempo was advisedly chosen, a rhythm over or under accented; whether there were departures from the Bachian tradition, variations from the Bachian style. The lay listener was concerned with other tests.

Dr. Koussevitzky tends to intensify—structurally, pictorially, dramatically—whatever music he undertakes. He answers to music surcharged with vision, emotion, exaltation. With both mastery and passion he uprears music wrought upon a vast scale. The manipulation and the stimulation of choral and orchestral masses kindle him. He chooses instinctively the re-creative function of the conductor, which is to make the music before him live again in very voice and motion, sounding its passion, unfolding its imagery. Under his hand, Bach's choral forms rose firm-set, full-shapen, large of motion, mighty line upon mighty line. He filled them with manifold sonorities, full-throated, full-freighted. Within them he missed few of the finer shadings of airs or duets; for might and majesty overlooked none of the fine simplicities that Bach interspersed into the Kyrie or wrought into the final measures of the whole.

The Gloria and the Sanctus sounded as the music of visioned hosts. The Creed strode four-square or beat clear, deep or high with the changing emotion. Only in the Kyrie, and then for no more than a moment, did a progression seem to lose edge and falter as though conductor and choir were still feeling their way. To the end of the Sanctus the Mass rose magnificent, magniloquent, multifarious, was then suffused with the blessing and the peace of the end.

By himself no conductor may accomplish these things. His forces must work by his will and in his image. The orchestra, as well proportioned as might be to the vasty chorus, gave back flexibility, sensibility and power; excelled individually when the first violin (Mr. Burgin), the first horn (Mr. Böttcher), the old oboe d' amore (Mr. Speyer and Mr. Devergie)—far richer than its modern successor—had solo measures to sound. In the airs and duets, the singers strove against a form and style that Bach himself can seldom make sympathetic to modern ears. Mme. Matzenauer overcame this handicap by the sonorous body and the measured emotion of her tones; Mr. Crooks and Mr. Gange by breadth of voice and large manner. Mme. Evans had neither sonorities nor fervors; so strove in vain.

The chorus, three hundred strong, made ready at Harvard by Dr. Davison, at Radcliffe by Mr. Woodworth, matched the conductor himself. The freshness of these young voices lent wondrous lustre in the Creed to the measures of Resurrection; yet lacked nothing of mystery and awe and woe in the preceding measures of Incarnation and Crucifixion. The sonorities of the Gloria and the Sanctus filled the heaven and the earth of Bach's vision. The firm texture, the rhythmic march and weight in the music of faith and affirmation might have come from the maturest choir. Ornate passages in the ancient manner were sung as to that manner born. Long familiarity with the music set this young chorus free to enrich it with every expressional virtue. Long schooling in the elementary necessities of choral song gave them the means and range. The courage of youth kept them eager and unflagging to their task. Sounding Bach, they released also those inner selves of which none of us speak. With Dr. Koussevitzky, and of right, they divided the final tumults of applause.

H. T. P.

Newcomer in Old Music

Alexander Borovsky

Summoned, as Specialist, from Europe, to Play Piano-Pieces at the Current Bach Festival

Musical Murmurs

Likely Enough

AS a distinguished musician of this city [New York] recently remarked, with a condescension characteristic of his exalted mind and station, "Oh, yes, there is a place for Sibelius!" It would almost seem so. Even musicians, let alone critics and public, are awaking to this astonishing fact. [The Times

Placing Him Again

At the Courtauld-Sargent concert we had, in addition to Beethoven and Debussy, Stravinsky conducting his "Fire Bird" Suite. Here was the not infrequent case of a composer who makes few pretentions to being a conductor giving may a professional conductor a lesson. He knew perfectly well what he wanted and how to get it, and the orchestra understood and responded to him. The result was a performance of exceptional clearness, sobriety and beauty. We needed the "Fire Bird" to reconcile us to Stravinsky, for his Capriccio, in which he himself had played the piano-part earlier in the concert, is poor stuff, ranging from insignificance to complete nullity. No man with Stravinsky's experience and technique could fail to put a good face at times even on music as empty as this; but when all is said, the work amounts to nothing. Even its manipulation of jazzical elemen matter of calculated cerebration without any genuine impulse behind it.

The truth is that Stravinsky is a Russian composer pure and simple. He is never a genius, or even a first-rate talent, when he leaves his native soil. He has produced nothing but the second-rate when, as in the Concerto, the Capriccio, and other works, he has coquetted with a Western musical culture that may indeed have an attraction for him, but the essence of which he is racially incapable of assimiliating. One does not know which is worst, his reclaimed Bach, his reclaimed Handel, or his reclaimed Weber. There seems no hope of our ever getting anything of the first quality from him again until he returns to his native culture—unless, indeed, as one sometimes suspects, his Russian vein was itself a narrow one, musically speaking, and the gold in the workings has been exhausted. [Ernest Newman

Deadly Reverence

I can never bring myself to admire those staid, traditional performances of classical music, so dear to German Academies, however conscientious, however competent. Of these, Weingartner's interpretations of Beethoven seem to me a typical, though by no means dishonorable, example. Every bar, every phrase is approached with a reverence, a sense of responsibility that, to me, suggest the Book of Common Prayer rather than a score by the most impetuous of composers.

This kind of reverence is the most deadly because the most subtle enemy of all art; it has almost, if not quite, killed Shakspeare, and, if persisted in, it will assuredly perform a like function for Beethoven. Beethoven was a great thinker as well as a great poet in music, but his thought and his poetry can have no value to us unless we feel them as living things. Wrapped up in tissue paper and presented as prizes for good conduct to musical appreciation classes, they cease to have any genuinely æsthetic significance; they become museum pieces at the best. [Francis To consequence is that for every Englishm who thinks of Shakspeare as a poet a entertainer, there are a dozen who rega him as a duty and a bore.

It is this more than anything else th keeps his work out of the fashionab theaters. If you will go by omnibus underground railway into outlying qua ters of London, you will find Shakspea at the end of the journey. If you w go to places where seats are hard a cheap and no one wears evening dres again you will find Shakspeare. If yo will go to playhouses supported by litt leagues or charitably aided by financie who believe in the educational value the drama, you may have Shakspeare abundance. But not in those parts London where, having dined, peopl in festive search of entertainment. Because, it is said, Shakspeare d pay on the West End. And why Because nine people out of ten h his plays thrust upon them as subject and inflicted upon the object for charity. Far from the poor man, we have str with our idolatry and embarr our reverence. [Charles M

The Feudist

Gordon Craig is to foll Henry Irving" by a boo which will be issued by Low, Marston & Co., publication of "Ellen Shaw: A Correspo said, in an intervi Ellen Terry woul on the heels of am not treadin he continued. mother as she fictitious per a life on the people. T her and t her chil When stage-d We k peop

158

MUSIC

Hr. BACH FESTIVAL Mar 25
By PHILIP HALE

The Bach Festival, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitsky, conductor, in its 50th season and in honor of its founder, Henry L. Higginson, began yesterday afternoon and evening with a performance of the Mass in B minor. The orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone. The violin solos were played by Mr. Burgin; the horn obbligato to "Quoniam tu solus sanctus," by Mr. Boettcher; the two oboe d'amore by Messrs. Speyer and Devergie. There was a very large audience.

The chorus showed the long and careful training under Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth. The singing of a great chorus is too often the roaring of multitunous mediocrity—roaring and nothing more. Dr. Koussevitsky would not have been content with this; the respective conductors knew it, nor would they themselves have sent their singers poorly prepared to him. Under his direction there were the requisite nuances; the poetic and dramatic effects; his artistic sensitiveness and personal magnetism inspired the chorus to sing with enthusiasm and musical understanding. It should be remembered that this chorus is not made of professional singers; that the members have not stood side by side for many years; their achievement last night was the more remarkable. There was not only a magnificent volume of tone in exultant outbursts and imposing climaxes; tonal swelling and diminishing, unfaltering execution of long roulades, sudden contrasts from forte to piano, precision in attack—these made the performance truly memorable.

To the chorus Bach entrusted his greatest musical thoughts, his noblest pages; it was as if the singers recognized it; for they were particularly effective in the opening of the "Kyrie," the ending of the "Gloria in Excelsis" —Cum sancto spiritu" was sung with amazing brio—the section of the "Credo" beginning "Et incarnatus est" and the "Sanctus." To some in the audience the choruses, "Cum sancto spiritu" and "Crucifixus" were the commanding features of the choral performance.

The solo singers in this mass often have an ungrateful task. It has been said that when Bach wished to be particularly emotional he called on a contralto for full expression. Certainly in this mass Mme. Matzenauer was the one most favored by the composer. Her singing of "Qui Sedes" and the "Agnus Dei" will not soon be forgotten. Mr. Crooks's delivery of the "Benedictus qui venit" was characterized by a skilful use of his fine voice and by a taste that did not allow him to seek favor through a specious but undue display of the sentiment that falls into sentimentalism. Donald Frances Tovey recently made changes in Bach's score for a performance in Edinburgh. His most surprising alteration was the substitution of an oboe solo for the violin in the "Benedictus." He argued that as the autograph score does not name the instrument and the violin is here confined within the compass of the flute, Bach clearly intended the obbligato for a wind instrument. This did not prevent Mr. Burgin from playing in a masterly manner. The same is to be said of Mr. Boettcher's horn obbligato.

Yes, Mr. Crooks sang like a man and a musician, not after the manner of the beeping, bleating tenor who mistakes palsy for emotion in oratorio or other forms of supposedly sacred music. And Mr. Gange, too, sang like a man and made the most of music that in itself is of little interest. Miss Evans was heard to better advantage in the evening than in the afternoon, but one would have preferred a voice with more body and of a more decided character. It is hardly necessary to add that the orchestra responded sympathetically to Dr. Koussevitsky's every wish. The Mass will be heard next Sunday at the concert in aid of the orchestra's pension fund.

The second concert of the Festival will take place tonight at 8:30 o'clock. Mme. Patorni-Casadesus will play these harpsichord pieces: Italian concerto; Fantasia No. 3, C minor; Gigue in D minor. Wallace Goodrich, organist, will play a Fantasia in C minor, Adagio from the Toccata in C major, a Fugue in C major, the chorale prelude "Schmuecke dich, O liebe Seele," and the great Fugue in G minor. Bliss Perry will deliver an address: "Henry L. Higginson."

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS FESTIVAL

Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses Take Part

Globe Mar 25

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach Festival, the culmination of its 50th anniversary celebration, began yesterday with a performance of the B minor Mass in which the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society took part. The soloists were Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; and Fraser Gange, bass.

A very large audience listened in reverent silence, except for the inescapable few whisperers and rustlers of programs, until the end of each of the two parts, and then burst into tumults of applause.

The performance began at 4:30. There was an intermission from 6 to 8:30. It ended just before 10. From the point of view of the audience it would have been preferable to give the whole work in the evening, with no prolonged break. But no doubt the performers needed a rest midway in their very arduous task.

The B minor Mass of Bach is by common consent one of the great masterpieces of music. Yet before yesterday there seems to have been but one complete performance of it in Boston, that given by the Cecilia Society Dec 3, 1901. Nor is the work often heard anywhere. It will be repeated next Sunday for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. But another 30 years may elapse before we again are offered a chance to hear it.

There are several obvious reasons for this neglect of the B minor mass, its great demands on the performers, its length, its austerity, its failure to maintain throughout the work the intense emotional quality of the finest sections. Yet the overwhelming effect of a fine performance like yesterday's gives cause for wonder that music so noble should go unheard.

Bach was, of course, a Lutheran. The B minor mass is not suited, nor was it probably intended for use in Catholic churches, though it follows the general plan of masses used in the Roman liturgy. It expresses the dramatic and emotional content of the words with amazing power, though some of the music was borrowed by Bach from his previously written church music.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading stressed the dramatic contrasts in the music. He felt keenly such moments as the ilneffably solemn Crucifixus, and the subsequent outburst of exultation "Et ressurexit." The Sanctus, music never surpassed by anyone, left a listener hearing it for the first time overwhelmed by its sublimity. The orchestra and chorus not only triumphed over the difficulties of the music, they conveyed its meaning to the hearer.

It is astonishing that a group of college boys and girls should be able to sing such very difficult music. The enthusiasm, the imaginative power of their performance showed once more the unparalleled success Dr Davison, to whom the present high estate of choral singing at Harvard and Radcliffe is wholly due, has had in developing these student choruses. No wonder they cheered him, and his able assistant, Mr Woodworth, at the end.

Mme Matzenauer's singing, especially in the Agnus Dei, was the finest thing she or any other soloist has achieved at a choral concert here in the past 20 years. She had memorized her music, and was able to put her whole heart and soul, as well as her very great vocal gift, into her performance. Those who heard her last night will not soon forget it. The other soloists, though competent enough, were not in the same class with the great contralto.

Tonight the Bach Festival continues with a concert at which Bliss Perry will speak on Maj Higginson, whose memory is being honored by this festival. Chamber music and organ pieces by Bach will be performed. P. R.

MASS BY BACH IS FEATURED

Post Mar 25

Symphony Chorus and Solo in Memory of Higginson

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With a performance of the Mass in B minor, unheard in this city for 30 years, there began at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and evening the Bach Festival, designed to be the outstanding event of the 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to serve as memorial to Henry L. Higginson, founder and for many years sustainer of that band.

AFTERNOON AND EVENING

Yesterday's performance of the Mass, assigned by many chief place among the compositions of Bach yet rarely heard, was given by a chorus made up of members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, with Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass, as the solo singers, and with the orchestra, needless to say, to furnish the instrumental support. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

The B minor Mass is long. Wisely and considerately, then, the powers at Symphony Hall decreed that it should be given in two installments. Yesterday afternoon brought the first two parts, the Kyrie and the Gloria, roughly an hour and a half of music; and in the evening were heard the Credo, Sanctus and Agnus Dei.

Intensifies Effect

Dull, not necessarily because Bach was at a loss for salient ideas, though there are passes that seem mechanical and perfunctory, but rather because of the monotony engendered by his method of composition, the persistent repetition throughout an entire section of a characteristic rhythmic and melodic figure.

To be sure, in the Crucifixus, such insistence upon the originally announced pattern occasionally heightens and intensifies rather than detracts from the general effect. Moreover, the aforesaid monotony is far more in evidence in the solos and duets than in the choruses, and especially in those pieces that occur in the first two divisions of the Mass. In other words, those parts that were heard in the evening are far more sustained in interest. And if there is in the final three divisions no chorus so stirring as the justly famous Cum Sancto Spiritu which ends the Gloria, most of this second part, as yesterday's performance divided the work, is touched with that blend of spiritual fervor and exultation that is typical of Bach's sacred music at its best. In the evening, too, came the most beautiful of the solos, the Agnus Dei, sung with rare persuasiveness by Mme. Matzenauer.

Ungrateful Orchestrad Parts

Often ungrateful, too, are the instrumental obbligati to the solo pieces, of which Bach was always so fond, and there was the feeling that the flute of Mr. Laurent, the violin of Mr. Burgin, the horn of Mr. Boettcher had often shone to better advantage, though perhaps with less credit to the performer. More effective than most of these obbligati were those of the two oboe d'amore as played by Mr. Speyer and Mr. Devergie in the Et In Spiritum Sanctum for bass.

Considering the difficulties which beset it, too, it may be said that the chorus covered itself with glory. Now and then a firmer, fuller body of tone might have been desired from the sopranos; the need was felt for singers of more maturity. With the tenors and basses, on the other hand, little or no fault was to be found, and Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, who has trained the two choirs, fully deserved the torrent of applause vouchsafed them when, at the close of the evening, Dr. Koussevitzky brought them to the front of the platform.

OPENING OF BACH FESTIVAL BRILLIANT TRIUMPH

Globe Mar 25

By MOSES SMITH

THE BACH FESTIVAL, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving on the occasion of its 50th anniversary in honor of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson, began in Symphony Hall with a performance of the Mass in B minor, yesterday afternoon and evening. The chorus was the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. The soloists were Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer, Richard Crooks, and Fraser Gange.

No review written on the evening of performance, with the music still ringing fresh in the ears of the writer, can be adequate; it can scarcely be articulate. Only once before, 30 years ago, was this Mass given in Boston. Hearing it now for the first time we were not tempted to make wise-cracks about it, in the vein of the professional modernists, to say that "a little of this goes a long way." For quite aside from the astonishing technical mastery, the miraculous workmanship, exhibited in this work, most hearers yesterday must have been moved by the sublimeness of the music, by the magnificence of expression.

In these choruses the heights attained are Olympian. To transfer the metaphor to one less pagan, and to quote Bach's great biographer, Prof. Terry, Bach "saw the heavens opened, and was prophetically oracular." In the solo passages, as in the "Agnus Dei," beautifully sung last night by Mme. Matzenauer, there is an emotional poignancy that almost stifled the mortal listener.

Our debt to the genius who wrote this work was expressed by Schumann: "Music owes as much to Bach as a religion to its founder." On a different level we are similarly indebted to those who made yesterday's performance possible and to the performers themselves, to Drs. Davison and Woodworth who have labored (we are told) two years in rehearsing the choruses. The performance under Serge Koussevitzky's baton may or may not have been great (we have no means of comparison); it was certainly more than competent and, especially in the evening, inspired. Never have these choruses sung better. The quartet of soloists was excellent. And, finally, Richard Burgin played the violin solo with consummate artistry.

TRANS. MARCH 25.

Higginson Bust Gift to City

Copy of Symphony Hall Memorial

Long-Hoped for Remembrance of Henry L. Higginson, the Founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Will Be Placed in the Higginson Auditorium of the Municipal Building, South End, and Memorial Exercises Will Be Held There by the City in Connection with the Patriots' Day Celebration in Honor of the Semi-Centennial of the Founding of the Orchestra

BOSTON TRAVELER, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 25, 1931

Higginson Bust Presented

The bronze bust of Henry Lee Higginson to be placed in the Higginson auditorium in the John J. Williams municipal building in the South end was presented to Mayor Curley today by G. E. Judd, W. H. Brennan and Paul Hanson, executives of Symphony hall, in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Photo shows mayor and the bust.

REDUCTION RATIO 19x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Bach Provides Interludes in Speech-Making

Organ and Harpsichord Pieces In a Memorial Evening For the Founder

[illegible] Bach [illegible] the Symphony [illegible] Mary's [illegible] Wednes[illegible] yesterday it is[illegible] dedicated [illegible] to the memory of Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, and in 1918 a world in travail. For this musical year, 1930-31, is the year of the orchestra's golden jubilee. Flowering shrubs green and gold, [illegible] the motto. At the foot of the pedestal lay a wreath tied with gold ribbon—tribute of friendly rivalry from the trustees of the Philadelphia Orchestra. At either side of the stage rows of gilded chairs from The Hops renewed the prevailing color. They faced toward two tables, set wide apart, with a few chairs around them, at middle center. Less decoratively the console of the organ to the left, the closed harpsichord to the right, shared the foreground. Beyond tubbed trees completed the prospect.

Promptly at the hour, present and past members of the orchestra—of course without their instruments—entered singly or in pairs and seated themselves in the gilt chairs. Then followed what universities authorities would call the procession. Judge Cabot, escorting the venerable widow of the founder, led it. Behind them came the grandson of the house of Higginson; trustees and their consorts; the speaker of the evening; Dr. and Madam Koussevitzky; the musically illustrious of the town, more or less affiliated with the Symphony Orchestra. Judge Cabot and Mrs. Higginson took the table to the left; Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, and their wives, the table to the right. The congregation, which nearly filled the hall, had risen in salute; but, since the entry of the procession was slow, many sat again, to the confusion for the twentieth time of these well-meant, but seldom unanimous, "homages."

A delegate from the orchestra nervously laid a bunch of spring flowers before Mrs. Higginson. Judge Cabot rose beside the table to begin the ceremonies. He read congratulatory telegrams from the governing boards of the Philadelphia, the Chicago and other orchestras. One, seemingly, had come from the Philharmonic Society in New York, whereat the knowing smiled discreetly—behind their programs.) Laying aside the messages, Judge Cabot touched briefly on the anniversary year of the orchestra, the current festival, the merit of each and all who had contributed to it. He passed then to the occasion that had convoked the company; recalled the founder and his works; presented Dr. Bliss Perry, the founder's friend, to celebrate both.

Elsewhere on this page Dr. Perry's speech (as he prefers to call it) is printed in extenso. Standing in the center of the stage—a tall and slender figure—he read it from manuscript with apt emphasis, in spaced and rounded phrases, with pauses where pauses most would tell, with light glints of quiet humor. Such presence and speaking renewed the patrician manner of an older day. Gone from all tongues and all ears, had vanished the intonations of gentle breeding, cultivated living, the pursuit of letters and the unpractical arts. Dr. Perry shunned the truisms of the occasion, called no hackneyed facts; kept clear of routine chronicle. He proferred, instead, the sympathetic and fine-grained analyses of intimacy; remembered anecdotes and letters of friendship; set forth the times as well as the man; penetrated within as well as sketched without; drew and colored the portrait of Henry Higginson. To others he left photograph and record, unless, here and there, he could add a novel footnote. His speech was literary and allusive biography become for the instant spoken words. His hearers heard him intently; applauded him warmly. Tenfold their number will read him gladly.

After intermission, and harpsichord pieces, there was more speech-making. Judge Cabot sounded the praises of the chorus of Harvard and Radcliffe youth who had shared in the performance of Bach's Mass. (Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth sat by, hearing benignantly). Then noted other participants in the present festival; invited Dr. Koussevitzky to speak for them, the orchestra, and himself. The eminent conductor rose in his place; from one pocket drew his pince-nez, from another a sheet of notes; spoke earnestly, if, for the hearer, rather confusedly. There were sentences about the "Bach Renaissance"; about the student-choir; about Mr. Higginson, the orchestra he had called to life, "the miracle" that he had wrought. Sentences also about the beauty, the power, the pleasure of music; about "God's life in men"; praises of the orchestra; phrases of proud humility about himself. Often Dr. Koussevitzky spoke brokenly, as one in stress of emotion, as well as in labor with a foreign tongue. The flood of applause, before and afterward, should have re-assured him.

There was music, besides. To begin and to end the evening, Mr. Wallace Goodrich played organ-pieces of Bach—the Fantasia in C minor; fugues in C major and C minor; the Adagio from the Toccata in C major, the Chorale-Prelude, "Schmücke dich." Direction of the Conservatory and care of Boston's only opera have not lessened Mr. Goodrich as organist. He still plays as ready and masterful technician; with feeling for his manifold instrument as voice to music; with clear, full and enhancing response to the piece in hand. Out of the Chorale-Prelude and the fragment of the Toccata, he summoned Bach, rhapsodist and tone-poet, through the organ speaking intimately, by the organ warmed. From the Fugues rose the Bach who winged forms with motion and clothed them with power; whose hands and spirit played upon the organ in an exhaustless energy of creation.

From Paris had come Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, mistress of the harpsichord, to set forth examples of Bach's minor handiwork—an Italian Concerto in miniature; a little Fantasia; a lively Gigue; another trifle added at Dr. Koussevitzky's request to please the insistent audience. Her tone was limpid and edgeless. Her sensibility of ear and finger achieved every possible shading. Rarely has the thin, gentle, narrow-ranging harpsichord sounded with such resilience, grace, vivacity. Writing for it, Bach bade it to line-lined, lightly decorated patterns, to play with rhythmic figures, to light melancholy, to pretty gayety. What he bade, Mme. Casadesus accomplished as though the two were touching the keys. A rounded festival had included Bach as miniaturist.

H. T. P.

Henry L. Higginson: Address by Bliss Perry, His Friend

Spoken at the Memorial Concert in the Bach Festival of the Boston Orchestra's Year of Jubilee

From the Drawing by Sargent in the Manager's Office at Symphony Hall

[illegible] had an everlasting memory. Also he knew men at once when he looked into their eyes." That last clause is true of Lincoln, but it is not quite true of Major Higginson. Sometimes his swift judgments of men were mistaken. Some of his swans turned out to be geese, and worse. Professional confidence men found him easy, and his humor was never more delightful than in his stories of how he had been fooled.

He disclaimed any skill with words, and usually talked of literature as if that were one of the fine arts whose mysteries were beyond him. Yet on occasion he spoke in public with a grave, restrained beauty which reminded one of President Eliot, and in the sketches of his women friends which he read at Radcliffe there was an exquisite delicacy of touch, a quaint romantic idealism which was all his own. No one in his generation, surely, wrote more charming notes, especially to women. Letter-writing, in fact, was the only art about which he held a consistent theory: You should visualize your correspondent, and then write precisely as if you were talking with him. It seems easy, but it is not; and Henry Higginson triumphed in this rare art from his boyhood to his death.

Consistencies as Well

I am well aware that in stressing these contradictions of mood, these strange diversifications of gift in Major Higginson—a man by turns patient and impatient, gentle and obstinate, simple and subtle, wise and foolish—I am recalling qualities which greatly endeared him to his friends; yet to those who did not know him such an attempt to sketch his portrait by assembling apparently irreconcilable traits, each of which has a special bearing upon the history of the Symphony Orchestra. One was his supreme interest in persons: the other, not unrelated to the first, was his passion for music and his dream of making the finest music accessible to all.

Friend among Friends

Everyone who knew Henry Higginson was aware of his tendency to judge institutions and problems in terms of personality. To him our world was a world of persons, not of theories and abstractions. He was drawn to other men by quick and almost fierce affection; and even his repulsions were instinctive rather than reasoned. His bonds of family and kinship were exceptionally strong. His friends in the Latin School, in Harvard College and in the army became friends for life, and many of these men were the choicest spirits of his generation.

But even when there was no specially intimate friendship involved, his curiosity and interest in individuals were insatiable. He knew the name of every soldier in each of his two regiments. For many years he knew every player in the orchestra. We are all aware that what seems like a phenomenal memory for names and faces can be cultivated, as it is by hotel-clerks and taxi-drivers and politicians. But Henry Higginson began where such experts leave off. He carried in his heart these hundreds of personal accounts, brooding with a sleepless solicitude over the most intimate personal problems of his friends. He wrote in 1910: "The number of folks who are to be smoothed, admonished, touched up, is wonderful." And wonderful it was.

He did not always like to take advice himself—holding in that matter, as in others, that it is more blessed to give than to receive. However pathetic or sordid or absurd might be the occasion, his counsels were always on a high plane. He undertook, by copious correspondence, to straighten out Presidents Roosevelt and Taft and Wilson, all of whom he liked personally, but whose official policies he frequently disapproved. Yet he was just as ready to hearten up a green office-boy, or an over-sensitive musician, or a discouraged college professor or a client who happened to be on the wrong side of the market.

Persons First

It was not, then, with mankind in general, and not often with what we call "causes" or "reforms," that his memory and imagination were occupied. When corporations were attacked, he leaped to the defense, not of any theory of corporate control, but of certain high-minded individuals with whom he had been associated—like his father and his uncle. Henry Lee, like Quincy Shaw and Alexander Agassiz, like Charles Coffin and Theodore Vail and Charles Perkins. Would such men consciously do wrong? To that question there was of course but one answer, and to Mr. Higginson that was the only question which was pertinent. He served for many years as a member of the Corporation of Harvard University, but according to his associates he was not so much interested in theories of education as in loyally supporting the concrete proposals of President Eliot and President Lowell. He cared for undergraduates rather than for studies and methods. No act of his life was more typical of his mind than his placing upon the tablet in Soldiers Field the names of his intimate friends who fell in the Civil War. Their unfulfilled purposes of service [illegible] somehow. [illegible] boys and [illegible] done if their lives had been spared. [illegible] was an idealism which seemed to some men fantastic; but it has touched the imagination of heroic boys as no abstract argument for patriotism could ever do.

The founder of the Symphony Orchestra was first of all a friendly person who wished to serve a community of friends. Impersonal "Foundations" and "Funds," however admirable their purpose and administration, often seem remote and merely monumental. Mr. Higginson put himself into every detail of the enterprise. It is true that it cost him a great deal of money, but he would have said that that was not the point. He put his life into it. Other men and women have bequeathed great legacies to this city, and splendid gifts will certainly continue to be made to the orchestra itself. But there are other tests of generosity than the sum total of dollars. By the rules of the arithmetic of heaven what counts is not how much you gave, but how much you had left. If Henry Higginson could have bequeathed a permanent endowment for the orchestra, he would have done so; but even that long-planned generosity would have been less characteristic of the man than putting his whole resources of mind and purse and character behind it for nearly forty years.

Disappointment into Dream

It is strange to think tonight that this magnificent orchestra, which is now a permanent institution with devoted Trustees, with a loyal public, generous private donors, and with artists and a conductor unsurpassed, should all have come from the dream and the disappointment of a boy. Every dream has its origin, obscure or clear. Henry Higginson had a passion for music in his childhood, and even in the eighteen-forties and fifties Boston was not without artists and a musical public. It was in 1823, in fact, that the Handel and Haydn Society commissioned Beethoven to write an oratorio for them—a commission unfortunately never executed, though some of Beethoven's symphonies were played by the Boston Academy of Music in Higginson's boyhood. He heard the concerts of the Musical Fund Society, of the Germania Orchestra, and of the Harvard Musical Association. He listened to Italian opera from the twenty-five cent seats in the upper gallery. The diary of his first visit to Europe, before he was eighteen, is full of excitement over Mario and Grisi, then singing in London, and over the operas he heard in Milan and Munich. In Leipzig he heard for the first time the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra, and at Dresden, during the winter of 1852-53, he made his first acquaintance with "Tannhäuser" and Mozart's "Requiem" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. In Berlin it was the same story. At twenty-two young Higginson was off to Europe again for four years. He settled in Vienna, just then, as he thought, the musical center of Europe. He studied voice, piano and composition, in the hope of becoming a professional musician. He wrote occasional articles for J. S. Dwight's Journal of Music. Some of his fellow-students, like his "Jewish chum," Epstein, were coming rapidly to the front. Higginson studied audiences as well as harmony. He saw conservatives "walk out on" Wagner, just as some Bostonians, in Henschel's first season, walked out on Brahms, and as we have seen them tempted to walk out on Stravinsky. Through all his excitement and enthusiasm he was learning a scale of values, the enduring standards of his chosen art. Then came the tragic blow that ended his professional [illegible] period of personal disappointment—1857, as he afterward told Presi[illegible] Eliot—when one dream was dissolved, [illegible] dream began to take [illegible] was lost—an artist of [illegible] talent, but probably without what we

Continued on Following Page

Four Cantatas Of the Church Bring the End

On Friday and Saturday, the Bach Who Lent Genius To Routine

O[illegible] [illegible] perspective [illegible] and St. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Henry L. Higginson: Address by Bliss Perry, His Friend

Spoken at the Memorial Concert in the Bach Festival of the Boston Orchestra's Year of Jubilee

From the Drawing by Sargent in the Manager's Office at Symphony Hall

I WAS [illegible] Tuesday [illegible] Trustees [illegible] personal honor, in this fiftieth [illegible] son of the Orchestra [illegible] careers of its Founder [illegible] [illegible] ear [illegible] Major Higginson [illegible] farewell address to the O[illegible] surrender [illegible] the enterprise [illegible] small [illegible] and [illegible] sustained [illegible] We [illegible] together. [illegible] He [illegible] year. [illegible] birthday [illegible] many [illegible] the Symph[illegible]ers who knew [illegible] people by [illegible] remains a living [illegible] other [illegible] as when he lived [illegible] We [illegible] of this hall to [illegible] Yet there are many [illegible] orchestra, and many [illegible] this season's concerts will [illegible] and inexpli[illegible] [illegible] of course. To many [illegible] said, who can [illegible] as the memory of Henry Hig[illegible] I may repeat what his boyhood [illegible] Stephen Perkins, once wrote to [illegible] though Perkins would have been too shy to say it to his face: "Wherever you are, there is a hearth and roses bloom. What better place for a gathering [illegible] than this hall which he [illegible] built! And what guests could be more welcome to him, as in the old days, than authors and lovers of music! It is true that the presence of our host tonight must be perceived by something finer than the bodily senses. But if Johann Sebastian Bach—whose body [illegible] more than ninety years in a [illegible] grave, until Mendelssohn, in [illegible] raised a monument to his memory—was lived again for us this week, and lived perhaps more truly than ever, through the creative imagination of Dr. Koussevitzky and his fellow artists, surely the spirit of Henry Higginson may be evoked this evening in Symphony Hall. "Wherever you are, there is a hearth and roses bloom."

Opposites Joined

If Major Higginson had not actually walked the streets of Boston and been known more or less intimately by so many of us, it would seem incredible that such a combination of apparently contradictory qualities could be found in any one man. It was the contradictions that made the charm. This typical Bostonian was born in New York. This "ideal Harvard man," as President Hadley described him when he received his honorary degree from Yale, left Harvard before Christmas of his freshman year, owing to trouble with his eyes, and never went back. He looked every inch the soldier, even to the saber-scar across his face; but as an officer in the Second Massachusetts Regiment of Volunteer Infantry, and in the First Massachusetts Cavalry, he was forced to wait twenty bitter months before leading his men into action, and was then struck down in an unlucky skirmish, receiving wounds that incapacitated him from further service. It seemed an ironic fate. After two disastrous failures in business, he became a partner in a banking house; but in his later life he took humorous delight in insisting that he had been taken into the firm as a matter of charity. He made, as everyone knows, a great deal of money; but in many years he gave it away faster than he earned it, and more than once, even in his eightieth year, he came very close to personal bankruptcy. Yet he had invincible pertinacity. As Mr. Kipling wrote of Lord Roberts, he marched from Kabul to Kandahar, and never told anyone how near he came to breaking down.

"I hope you understand," said Francis Lee Higginson once, "that my brother Henry was a gambler." He had the quizzical Higginson smile as he said it, mingled of affection, pride and reprehension. And indeed the founding of the Symphony Orchestra was a gambler's willingness to take a chance, and so was the gift of Soldiers Field, and the Harvard Union, and a hundred other benefactions of which the public knew nothing. It is proper to mention here that it was Francis Lee Higginson—always an exponent of anonymous munificence—who in that anxious year of 1914, knowing the state of his brother's finances, quietly insisted upon assuming the entire burden of the orchestra, refusing to let his name be known. Henry was not the only "gambler" in that family.

"Strange Contrasts"

It was not merely in the external events of Major Higginson's picturesque career, but also in his character and attitudes, that strange contrasts were to be seen. Photographers caught many differing aspects of his face. The bronze bust by Bela Pratt is a most veracious likeness, as is John Sargent's superb portrait. Yet there are those who dislike the portrait. When it was hung here in Symphony Hall a few months ago, I overheard the comments of two ladies, neither of whom had known Major Higginson. One called his face "arrogant," the other "insolent." Never were two adjectives more confidently wrong, yet that was the impression which the portrait made. And indeed Major Higginson, with his head thrown back and his eyes narrowed, might well seem hard, ruthless. In reality he was modest and even shy, but he had had to take the reins in his own hands more than once, and he must have known that he could drive. He said of his cavalry company: "They were a remarkably tough set of men of all sorts of occupations, among them prize-fighters, bar-keepers and the like. They had had as their [illegible] [illegible] charge. That was [illegible] his account of the Boston Fire of 1873 he wrote of the necessity of bringing powder to blow up buildings: "A number of kegs of powder were sent to the end of Long Wharf, but there was nobody to fetch it up. So I found a covered wagon open at the sides, got it to the end of Long Wharf and loaded some thirty kegs of powder on it and drove up State Street, which was full of engines pumping and sparks were flying in every direction." There was no powder, and he brought it. That was all.

A disciplinarian and a dare-devil, certainly; "tough-minded," as William James used to say. Yet he was just as certainly "tender-minded," brimful of sentiment, of pity, of solicitude, of misgiving. "The nobler a soul," wrote Francis Bacon, "the more objects of compassion it hath." Henry Higginson's moments of self-pity were relatively infrequent. In his old age, particularly, he enjoyed such tributes of honor and affection as come to few men; but he had also fully his human share of bitterness, disappointment and ingratitude. Such things do not and cannot get into the biographies.

Further Example

Like all humorists surrounded by persons without humor, he was bound to be misunderstood. It might be said of him, as was once said of another great patron of the arts, Cosimo di Medici: "His answers were short and sometimes dark, so that men might take them in divers senses. And he had an everlasting memory. Also he knew men at once when he looked into their eyes." That last clause is true of Lincoln, but it is not quite true of Major Higginson. Sometimes his swift judgments of men were mistaken. Some of his swans turned out to be geese, and worse. Professional confidence men found him easy, and his humor was never more delightful than in his stories of how he had been fooled.

He disclaimed any skill with words, and usually talked of literature as if that were one of the fine arts whose mysteries were beyond him. Yet on occasion he spoke in public with a grave, restrained beauty which reminded one of President Eliot, and in the sketches of his women friends which he read at Radcliffe there was an exquisite delicacy of touch, a quaint romantic idealism which was all his own. No one in his generation, surely, wrote more charming notes, especially to women. Letter-writing, in fact, was the only art about which he held a consistent theory: You should visualize your correspondent, and then write precisely as if you were talking with him. It seems easy, but it is not; and Henry Higginson triumphed in this rare art from his boyhood to his death.

Consistencies as Well

I am well aware that in stressing these contradictions of mood, these strange diversifications of gift in Major Higginson—a man by turns patient and impatient, gentle and obstinate, simple and subtle, wise and foolish—I am recalling qualities which greatly endeared him to his friends; yet to those who did not know him such an attempt to sketch his portrait by assembling apparently irreconcilable traits might seem to result in a confusing picture. And indeed the task would be hopeless if there were not deep consistencies in his character, fully as striking and more fundamental than the inconsistencies.

Let us select two of these underlying traits, each of which has a special bearing upon the history of the Symphony Orchestra. One was his supreme interest in persons; the other, not unrelated to the first, was his passion for music and his dream of making the finest music accessible to all.

Friend among Friends

Everyone who knew Henry Higginson was aware of his tendency to judge institution, and problems in terms of personality. To him our world was a world of persons, not of theories and abstractions. He was drawn to other men by quick and almost fierce affection; and even his repulsions were instinctive rather than reasoned. His bonds of family and kinship were exceptionally strong. His friends in the Latin School, in Harvard College and in the army became friends for life, and many of these men were the choicest spirits of his generation.

But even when there was no specially intimate friendship involved, his curiosity and interest in individuals were insatiable. He knew the name of every soldier in each of his two regiments. For many years he knew every player in the orchestra. We are all aware that what seems like a phenomenal memory for names and faces can be cultivated, as it is by hotel-clerks and taxi-drivers and politicians. But Henry Higginson began where such experts leave off. He carried in his heart these hundreds of personal accounts, brooding with a sleepless solicitude over the most intimate personal problems of his friends. He wrote in 1910: "The number of folks who are to be smoothed, admonished, touched up, is wonderful." And wonderful it was.

He did not always like to take advice himself—holding in that matter, as in others, that it is more blessed to give than to receive. However pathetic or sordid or absurd might be the immediate occasion, his counsels were always on a high plane. He undertook, by copious correspondence, to straighten out Presidents Roosevelt and Taft and Wilson, all of whom he liked personally, but whose official policies he frequently disapproved. Yet he was just as ready to hearten up a green office-boy, or an over-sensitive musician, or a discouraged college professor or a client who happened to be on the wrong side of the market.

Persons First

It was not, then, with mankind in general, and not often with what we call "causes" or "reforms," that his memory and imagination were occupied. When corporations were attacked, he leaped to the defense, not of any theory of corporate control, but of certain high-minded individuals with whom he had been associated—like his father and his uncle, Henry Lee, like Quincy Shaw and Alexander Agassiz, like Charles Coffin and Theodore Vail and Charles Perkins. Would such men consciously do wrong? To that question there was of course but one answer, and to Mr. Higginson that was the only question which was pertinent. He served for many years as a member of the Corporation of Harvard University, but according to his associates he was not so much interested in theories of education as in loyally supporting the concrete proposals of President Eliot and President Lowell. He cared for undergraduates rather than for studies and methods. No act of his life was more typical of his mind than his placing upon the tablet in Soldiers Field the names of his intimate friends who fell in the Civil War. Their unfulfilled purposes of service [illegible] somehow, Mr. [illegible] hopes [illegible] need [illegible] boys and Robert Gould [illegible] done if their lives had been spared. It was an idealism which seemed to some men fantastic; but it has touched the imagination of heroic boys as no abstract argument for patriotism could ever do.

The founder of the Symphony Orchestra was first of all a friendly person who wished to serve a community of friends. Impersonal "Foundations" and "Funds," however admirable their purpose and administration, often seem remote and merely monumental. Mr. Higginson put himself into every detail of the enterprise. It is true that it cost him a great deal of money, but he would have said that that was not the point. He put his life into it. Other men and women have bequeathed great legacies to this city, and splendid gifts will certainly continue to be made to the orchestra itself. But there are other tests of generosity than the sum total of dollars. By the rules of the arithmetic of heaven what counts is not how much you gave, but how much you had left. If Henry Higginson could have bequeathed a permanent endowment for the orchestra, he would have done so; but even that long planned generosity would have been less characteristic of the man than putting his whole resources of mind and purse and character behind it for nearly forty years.

Disappointment into Dream

It is strange to think tonight that this magnificent orchestra, which is now a permanent institution with devoted Trustees, with a loyal public, generous private donors, and with artists and a conductor unsurpassed, should all have come from the dream and the disappointment of a boy. Every dream has its origin, obscure or clear. Henry Higginson had a passion for music in his childhood, and even in the eighteen-forties and fifties Boston was not without artists and a musical public. It was in 1853, in fact, that the Handel and Haydn Society commissioned Beethoven to write an oratorio for them—a commission unfortunately never executed, though some of Beethoven's symphonies were played by the Boston Academy of Music in Higginson's boyhood. He heard the concerts of the Musical Fund Society, of the Germania Orchestra, and of the Harvard Musical Association. He listened to Italian opera from the twenty-five cent seats in the upper gallery. The diary of his first visit to Europe, before he was eighteen, is full of excitement over Mario and Grisi, then singing in London, and over the operas he heard in Milan and Munich. In Leipzig he heard for the first time the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra, and at Dresden, during the winter of 1852-53, he made his first acquaintance with "Tannhäuser" and Mozart's "Requiem" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. In Berlin it was the same story. At twenty-two young Higginson was off to Europe again for four years. He settled in Vienna, just then, as he thought, the musical center of Europe. He studied voice, piano and composition, in the hope of becoming a professional musician. He wrote occasional articles for J. S. Dwight's Journal of Music. Some of his fellow-students, like his "Jewish chum," Epstein, were coming rapidly to the front. Higginson studied audiences as well as harmony. He saw conservatives "walk out on" Wagner just as some Bostonians, in Henschel's first season, walked out on Brahms, and as we have seen them tempted to walk out on Stravinsky. Through all his excitement and enthusiasm he was learning a scale of values, the enduring standards of his chosen art. Then came the tragic blow that ended [illegible] professional

Conquering Fate

Yet if was in that bl[illegible] period of personal disappointment—in 1867, as he afterward told President Eliot—when one dream was dissolving, that a richer dream began to take form. An artist was lost—an artist of taste and some talent, but probably without what we

Continued on Following Page

Amusements

TRADER HORN
NOW PLAYING
TWICE DAILY, 2.30, 8.30
SUNDAYS 3 and 8.30
All Seats Reserved
Mats. 50c–75c–$1.00
Eves. 50c–75c–$1.00–$1.50
MAJESTIC

TOM SAWYER
WITH JACKIE COOGAN
MARCH 28, SATURDAY 10.30 A. M.
EXETER STREET THEATRE
Benefit of the Habit Clinic for Child Guidance
Tickets 50c and $1.50, obtainable at Theatre, Filene's, Herrick's, and Mrs. William Dexter, 67 Marlboro St.

REPERTORY THEATRE
NOW PLAYING
THE GIRL FROM THE REEPERBAHN
Continuous Show from 1 P. M.

LANCASTER
"SCANDAL SHEET"
George Bancroft
"GIRLS DEMAND EXCITEMENT"
Virginia Cherrill

Amusements

2nd WEEK
and still taking Boston
by storm!

THE LAST PARADE
The Daring, Dashing Expose of the Racketeer
JACK HOLT
Tom Moore—Constance Cummings
A Columbia Picture
30c
RKO KEITH'S

EXETER "The Place Where You Forget Your Troubles"
Jack Oakie in "GANG BUSTER"
Dorothy Mackaill in "ONCE A SINNER"

Bach Provides Interludes in Speech-Making

Organ and Harpsichord Pieces In a Memorial Evening For the Founder

H[illegible] [illegible] was [illegible] the e[illegible] [illegible] Bo[illegible] [illegible] Pres[illegible] [illegible] Perry, [illegible] Dr. Kou[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Bach Provides Interludes in Speech-Making

Organ and Harpsichord Pieces In a Memorial Evening For the Founder

HOWEVER high the festival at Bach's churches in Leipzig, the spoken word of the preacher was joined to the tones of the composer. Before or after song, the sermon. So also with the current Bach Festival at Symphony Hall. On Tuesday, the congregation heard his Mass in B minor. On this Thursday evening, it will hear a Brandenburg Concerto for orchestra; a Concerto for piano; the setting of Mary's hymn, the Magnificat. On the Wednesday between, which was yesterday, it listened to organ and harpsichord pieces; but the essential part of the evening rites were speeches—by Judge Cabot, as President of the Board of Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra; by Bliss Perry, as spokesman of the occasion; by Dr. Koussevitzky responding for the orchestra and himself. Hitherto the festival had celebrated Bach; hereafter it will renew that celebration, marking therewith the fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts. Now it paused to recall and honor the memory of Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the concerts in 1881; the continuator until, in 1918, he withdrew from a troubled scene.

The stage was prepared for the occasion. Below the organ and on the sidewalls hung a wainscot of neutral tapestries. At the back, centered, stood Bela Pratt's bust of Mr. Higginson—bronze upon a brown pedestal. Above, as for shallow canopy, a bright golden festoon curved to right and to left. For this musical year, 1930-31, is the year of the orchestra's golden jubilee. Flowering shrubs, green and gold, repeated the motiv. At the foot of the pedestal lay a wreath tied with gold ribbon—tribute of friendly rivalry from the trustees of the Philadelphia Orchestra. At either side of the stage rows of gilded chairs from The Pops renewed the prevailing color. They faced toward two tables, set wide apart, with a few chairs around them, at middle center. Less decoratively the console of the organ to the left, the closed harpsichord to the right, shared the foreground. Beyond tubbed trees completed the prospect.

Promptly at the hour, present and past members of the orchestra—of course without their instruments—entered singly or in pairs and seated themselves in the gilt chairs. Then followed what universities authorities would call the procession. Judge Cabot, escorting the venerable widow of the founder, led it. Behind them came the grandson of the house of Higginson; trustees and their consorts; the speaker of the evening; Dr. and Madam Koussevitzky; the musically illustrious of the town, more or less affiliated with the Symphony Orchestra. Judge Cabot and Mrs. Higginson took the table to the left; Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, and their wives, the table to the right. The congregation, which nearly filled the hall, had risen in salute; but, since the entry of the procession was slow, many sat again, to the confusion for the twentieth time of these well-meant, but seldom unanimous, "homages."

A delegate from the orchestra nervously laid a bunch of spring flowers before Mrs. Higginson. Judge Cabot rose beside the table to begin the ceremonies. He read congratulatory telegrams from the governing boards of the Philadelphia, the Chicago and other orchestras. (None, seemingly, had come from the Philharmonic Society in New York, whereat the knowing smiled discreetly—behind their programs.) Laying aside the messages, Judge Cabot touched briefly on the anniversary year of the orchestra, the current festival, the merit of each and all who had contributed to it. He passed then to the occasion that had convoked the company; recalled the founder and his works; presented Dr. Bliss Perry, the founder's friend, to celebrate both.

Elsewhere on this page Dr. Perry's speech (as he prefers to call it) is printed in extenso. Standing in the center of the stage—a tall and slender figure—he read it from manuscript with apt emphasis, in spaced and rounded phrases, with pauses where pauses most would tell, with light glints of quiet humor. Such presence and speaking renewed the patrician manner of an elder day. Not yet, from all tongues and all ears, had vanished the intonations of gentle breeding, cultivated living, the pursuit of letters and the unpractical arts. Dr. Perry shunned the truisms of "tribute": recalled no hackneyed facts; kept clear of routine chronicle. He proferred, instead, the sympathetic and fine-grained analyses of intimacy; remembered anecdotes and letters of friendship; set forth the times as well as the man; penetrated within as well as sketched without; drew and colored the portrait of Henry Higginson. To others he left photograph and record, unless, here and there, he could add a novel footnote. His speech was literary and allusive biography become for the instant spoken words. His hearers heard him intently; applauded him warmly. Tenfold their number will read him gladly.

After intermission, and harpsichord pieces, there was more speech-making. Judge Cabot sounded the praises of the chorus of Harvard and Radcliffe youth who had shared in the performance of Bach's Mass. (Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth sat by, hearing benignantly). Then noted other participants in the present festival; invited Dr. Koussevitzky to speak for them, the orchestra, and himself. The eminent conductor rose in his place; from one pocket drew his pince-nez, from another a sheet of notes; spoke earnestly, if, for the hearer, rather confusedly. There were sentences about the "Bach Renaissance"; about the student-choir; about Mr. Higginson, the orchestra he had called to life, "the miracle" that he had wrought. Sentences also about the beauty, the power, the pleasure of music; about "God's life in men"; praises of the orchestra; phrases of proud humility about himself. Often Dr. Koussevitzky spoke brokenly, as one in stress of emotion, as well as in labor with a foreign tongue. The flood of applause, before and afterward, should have re-assured him.

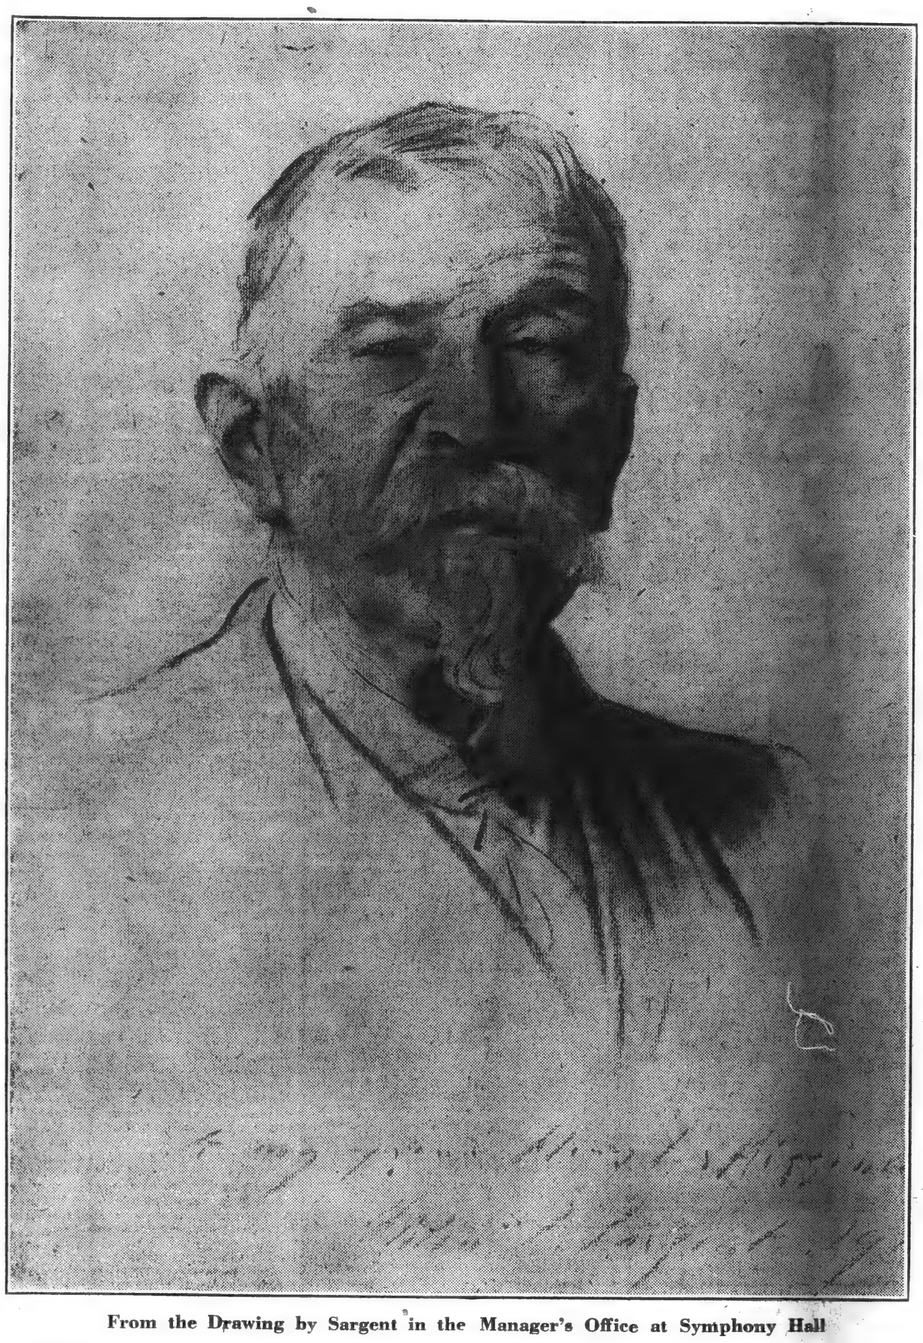
There was music, besides. To begin and to end the evening, Mr. Wallace Goodrich played organ-pieces of Bach—the Fantasia in C minor; fugues in C major and G minor; the Adagio from the Toccata in C major; the Chorale-Prelude, "Schmücke dich." Direction of the Conservatory and care of Boston's only opera have not lessened Mr. Goodrich as organist. He still plays as ready and masterful technician; with feeling for his manifold instrument as voice to music; with clear, full and enhancing response to the piece in hand. Out of the Chorale-Prelude and the fragment of the Toccata, he summoned Bach, rhapsodist and tone-poet, through the organ speaking intimately, by the organ warmed. From the Fugues rose the Bach who winged forms with motion and clothed them with power; whose hands and spirit played upon the organ in an exhaustless energy of creation.

From Paris had come Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, mistress of the harpsichord, to set forth examples of Bach's minor handiwork—an Italian Concerto in miniature; a little Fantasia; a lively Gigue; another trifle added at Dr. Koussevitzky's consent to please the insistent audience. Her tone was limpid and edgeless. Her sensibility of ear and finger achieved every possible shading. Rarely has the thin, gentle, narrow-ranging harpsichord sounded with such resilience, grace, vivacity. Writing for it, Bach bade it to fine-lined, lightly decorated patterns, to play with rhythmic figures, to light melancholy, to pretty gayety. What he bade, Mme. Casadesus accomplished as though the two were touching the keys. A rounded festival had included Bach as miniaturist.

H. T. P.

Henry L. Higginson: Address by Bliss Perry, His Friend

Spoken at the Memorial Concert in the Bach Festival of the Boston Orchestra's Year of Jubilee



From the Drawing by Sargent in the Manager's Office at Symphony Hall

IT WAS a gracious thought of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Trustees to pay special honor, in this fiftieth anniversary season of the Orchestra, to the memory of its Founder. It is nearly thirteen years since Major Higginson made his farewell address to the Orchestra, and surrendered to younger men the burden and the glory of carrying forward the enterprise which, single-handed, he had initiated and sustained. He was then in his eighty-fourth year. He died in the following year, 1919, just before his eighty-fifth birthday.

To his friends, and to many patrons of the Symphony concerts who knew him only by sight, he remains a living presence, as nobly vital as when he used to walk down the aisle of this hall to his accustomed seat. Yet there are many artists in the present orchestra, and many subscribers to this season's concerts, who never saw him, so swiftly and inexorably run the currents of change. To such listeners tonight, who join the old guard in honoring the memory of Henry Higginson, I may repeat what his boyhood friend, Stephen Perkins, once wrote to him, though Perkins would have been too shy to say it to his face: "Wherever you are, there is a hearth and roses bloom." What better place for a hearth-fire, for the warmth of affection and fragrant memories, than this hall which he helped to build! And what guests could be more welcome to him, as in the old days, than artists and lovers of music! It is true that the presence of our host tonight must be perceived by something finer than the bodily senses. But if Johann Sebastian Bach—whose body rested for more than ninety years in a neglected grave, until Mendelssohn, in 1842, raised a monument to his memory—has lived again for us this week, and lived perhaps more truly than ever, through the creative imagination of Dr. Koussevitzky and his fellow artists, surely the spirit of Henry Higginson may be evoked this evening in Symphony Hall. "Wherever you are, there is a hearth and roses bloom."

Opposites Joined

If Major Higginson had not actually walked the streets of Boston and been known more or less intimately by so many of us, it would seem incredible that such a combination of apparently contradictory qualities could be found in any one man. It was the contradictions that made the charm. This typical Bostonian was born in New York. This "ideal Harvard man," as President Hadley described him when he received his honorary degree from Yale, left Harvard before Christmas of his freshman year, owing to trouble with his eyes, and never went back. He looked every inch the soldier, even to the saber-scar across his face; but as an officer in the Second Massachusetts Regiment of Volunteer Infantry, and in the First Massachusetts Cavalry, he was forced to wait twenty bitter months before leading his men into action, and was then struck down in an unlucky skirmish, receiving wounds that incapacitated him from further service. It seemed an ironic fate. After two disastrous failures in business, he became a partner in a banking house; but in his later life he took humorous delight in insisting that he had been taken into the firm as a matter of charity. He made, as everyone knows, a great deal of money; but in many years he gave it away faster than he earned it, and more than once, even in his eightieth year, he came very close to personal bankruptcy. Yet he had invincible pertinacity. As Mr. Kipling wrote of Lord Roberts, he marched from Kabul to Kandahar, and never told anyone how near he came to breaking down.

I hope you understand," said Francis Lee Higginson once, "that my brother Henry was a gambler." He had the quizzical Higginson smile as he said it, mingled of affection, pride and reprehension. And indeed the founding of the Symphony Orchestra was a gambler's willingness to take a chance, and so was the gift of Soldiers Field, and the Harvard Union, and a hundred other benfactions of which the public knew nothing. It is proper to mention here that it was Francis Lee Higginson—always an expert in anonymous munificence—who in that anxious year of 1914, knowing the state of his brother's finances, quietly insisted upon assuming the entire burden of the orchestra, refusing to let his name be known. Henry was not the only "gambler" in that family!

"Strange Contrasts"

It was not merely in the external events of Major Higginson's picturesque career, but also in his character and aptitudes, that strange contrasts were to be seen. Photographers caught many differing aspects of his face. The bronze bust by Bela Pratt is a most veracious likeness, as is John Sargent's superb portrait. Yet there are those who dislike the portrait. When it was hung here in Symphony Hall a few months ago, I overheard the comments of two ladies, neither of whom had known Major Higginson. One called his face "arrogant," the other "insolent." Never were two adjectives more confidently wrong, yet that was the impression which the portrait made. And indeed Major Higginson, with his head thrown back and his eyes narrowed, might well seem hard, ruthless. In reality he was modest and even shy, but he had had to take the reins in his own hands more than once, and he must have known that he could drive. He said of his cavalry company: "They were a remarkably tough set of men of all sorts of occupations, among them prize-fighters, bar-keepers and the like. . . . They had had as their first [illegible] with them, and he was [illegible] was put in charge." That was all. In his account of the Boston Fire of 1873 he wrote of the necessity of bringing powder to blow up buildings: "A number of kegs of powder were sent to the end of Long Wharf, but there was nobody to fetch it up. So I found a covered wagon open at the sides, got it to the end of Long Wharf and loaded some thirty kegs of powder on it and drove up State Street, which was full of engines pumping and sparks were flying in every direction." There was no powder, and he brought it. That was all.

A disciplinarian and a dare-devil, certainly; "tough-minded," as William James used to say. Yet he was just as certainly "tender-minded," brimful of sentiment, of pity, of solicitude, of misgiving. "The nobler a soul," wrote Francis Bacon, "the more objects of compassion it hath." Henry Higginson's moments of self-pity were relatively infrequent. In his old age, particularly, he enjoyed such tributes of honor and affection as come to few men; but he had also fully his human share of bitterness, disappointment and ingratitude. Such things do not and cannot get into the biographies.

Further Example

Like all humorists surrounded by persons without humor, he was bound to be misunderstood. It might be said of him, as was once said of another great patron of the arts, Cosimo di Medici: "His answers were short and sometimes dark, so that men might take them in divers senses. And he had an everlasting memory. Also he knew men at once when he looked into their eyes." That last clause is true of Lincoln, but it is not quite true of Major Higginson. Sometimes his swift judgments of men were mistaken. Some of his swans turned out to be geese, and worse. Professional confidence men found him easy, and his humor was never more delightful than in his stories of how he had been fooled.

He disclaimed any skill with words, and usually talked of literature as if that were one of the fine arts whose mysteries were beyond him. Yet on occasion he spoke in public with a grave, restrained beauty which reminded one of President Eliot, and in the sketches of his women friends which he read at Radcliffe there was an exquisite delicacy of touch, a quaint romantic idealism which was all his own. No one in his generation, surely, wrote more charming notes, especially to women. Letter-writing, in fact, was the only art about which he held a consistent theory: You should visualize your correspondent, and then write precisely as if you were talking with him. It seems easy, but it is not; and Henry Higginson triumphed in this rare art from his boyhood to his death.

Consistencies as Well

I am well aware that in stressing these contradictions of mood, these strange diversifications of gift in Major Higginson—a man by turns patient and impatient, gentle and obstinate, simple and subtle, wise and foolish—I am recalling qualities which greatly endeared him to his friends; yet to those who did not know him such an attempt to sketch his portrait by assembling apparently irreconcilable traits would be hopeless if there were not deep consistencies in his character, fully as striking and more fundamental than the inconsistencies.

Let us select two of these underlying traits, each of which has a special bearing upon the history of the Symphony Orchestra. One was his supreme interest in persons: the other, not unrelated to the first, was his passion for music and his dream of making the finest music accessible to all.

Friend among Friends

Everyone who knew Henry Higginson was aware of his tendency to judge institutions and problems in terms of personality. To him our world was a world of persons, not of theories and abstractions. He was drawn to other men by quick and almost fierce affection; and even his repulsions were instinctive rather than reasoned. His bonds of family and kinship were exceptionally strong. His friends in the Latin School, in Harvard College and in the army became friends for life, and many of these men were the choicest spirits of his generation.

But even when there was no specially intimate friendship involved, his curiosity and interest in individuals were insatiable. He knew the name of every soldier in each of his two regiments. For many years he knew every player in the orchestra. We are all aware that what seems like a phenomenal memory for names and faces can be cultivated, as it is by hotel-clerks and taxi-drivers and politicians. But Henry Higginson began where such experts leave off. He carried in his heart these hundreds of personal accounts, brooding with a sleepless solicitude over the most intimate personal problems of his friends. He wrote in 1910: "The number of folks who are to be smoothed, admonished, touched up, is wonderful." And wonderful it was.

He did not always like to take advice himself—holding in that matter, as in others, that it is more blessed to give than to receive. However pathetic or sordid or absurd might be the immediate occasion, his counsels were always on a high plane. He undertook, by copious correspondence, to straighten out Presidents Roosevelt and Taft and Wilson, all of whom he liked personally, but whose official policies he frequently disapproved. Yet he was just as ready to hearten up a green office-boy, or an over-sensitive musician, or a discouraged college professor or a client who happened to be on the wrong side of the market.

Persons First

It was not, then, with mankind in general, and not often with what we call "causes" or "reforms," that his memory and imagination were occupied. When corporations were attacked, he leaped to the defense, not of any theory of corporate control, but of certain high-minded individuals with whom he had been associated—like his father and his uncle, Henry Lee, like Quincy Shaw and Alexander Agassiz, like Charles Coffin and Theodore Vail and Charles Perkins. Would such men consciously do wrong? To that question there was of course but one answer, and to Mr. Higginson that was the only question which was pertinent. He served for many years as a member of the Corporation of Harvard University, but according to his associates he was not so much interested in theories of education as in loyally supporting the concrete proposals of President Eliot and President Lowell. He cared for undergraduates rather than for studies and methods. No act of his life was more typical of his mind than his placing upon the tablet in Soldiers Field the names of his intimate friends who fell in the Civil War. Their unfulfilled purposes of service [illegible] somehow, [illegible] Dalcon[illegible] boys and Robert Gould [illegible] might [illegible] done if their lives had been spared. [illegible] was an idealism which seemed to some men fantastic; but it has touched the imagination of heroic boys as no abstract argument for patriotism could ever do.

The founder of the Symphony Orchestra was first of all a friendly person who wished to serve a community of friends. Impersonal "Foundations" and "Funds," however admirable their purpose and administration, often seem remote and merely monumental. Mr. Higginson put himself into every detail of the enterprise. It is true that it cost him a great deal of money, but he would have said that that was not the point. He put his life into it. Other men and women have bequeathed great legacies to this city, and splendid gifts will certainly continue to be made to the orchestra itself. But there are other tests of generosity than the sum total of dollars. By the rules of the arithmetic of heaven what counts is not how much you gave, but how much you had left. If Henry Higginson could have bequeathed a permanent endowment for the orchestra, he would have done so; but even that long-planned generosity would have been less characteristic of the man than putting his whole resources of mind and purse and character behind it for nearly forty years.

Disappointment into Dream

It is strange to think tonight that this magnificent orchestra, which is now a permanent institution with devoted Trustees, with a loyal public, generous private donors, and with artists and a conductor unsurpassed, should all have come from the dream and the disappointment of a boy. Every dream has its origin, obscure or clear. Henry Higginson had a passion for music in his childhood, and even in the eighteen-forties and fifties Boston was not without artists and a musical public. It was in 1823, in fact, that the Handel and Haydn Society commissioned Beethoven to write an oratorio for them—a commmission unfortunately never executed, though some of Beethoven's symphonies were played by the Boston Academy of Music in Higginson's boyhood. He heard the concerts of the Musical Fund Society, of the Germania Orchestra, and of the Harvard Musical Association. He listened to Italian opera from the twenty-five cent seats in the upper gallery. The diary of his first visit to Europe, before he was eighteen, is full of excitement over Mario and Grisi, then singing in London, and over the operas he heard in Milan and Munich. In Leipzig he heard for the first time the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra, and at Dresden, during the winter of 1852-53, he made his first acquaintance with "Tannhäuser" and Mozart's "Requiem" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. In Berlin it was the same story.

At twenty-two young Higginson was off to Europe again for four years. He settled in Vienna, just then, as he thought, the musical center of Europe. He studied voice, piano and composition, in the hope of becoming a professional musician. He wrote occasional articles for J. S. Dwight's Journal of Music. Some of his fellow-students, like his "Jewish chum," Epstein, were coming rapidly to the front. Higginson studied audiences as well as harmony. He saw conservatives "walk out on" Wagner, just as some Bostonians, in Henschel's first season, walked out on Brahms, and as we have seen them tempted to walk out on Stravinsky. Through all his excitement and enthusiasm he was learning a scale of values, the enduring standards of his chosen art. Then came the tragic blow that ended his professional hopes. I need not [illegible] call musical genius. What was found was an iron will, and a plan, vague as yet, for creating sometime an orchestra in his native country. Let me use his own words here, written long afterward. He wrote me in 1909: "I, too, wished to write music, studied two or three years in earnest and very hard, and wrote a few songs good enough for the fire in the grate. Disappointed! Yes, but what of it? I could saw wood, and so have sawed. There are wood-sawers needed and they are paid well—in cash, though not in joy, unless the woodpile can light a good fire and heat mankind."

I do not know whether our friend ever read William Vaughn Moody's "The Fire-Bringer," but there is in that poem a song of Pandora which describes exactly the terms of Henry Higginson's triumph over adverse fate:

> Of wounds and sore defeat
> I made my battle-stay;
> Winged sandals for my feet
> I wove of my delay;
> Of weariness and fear,
> I made my shouting spear;
> Of loss, and doubt, and dread,
> And swift oncoming doom
> I made a helmet for my head
> And a floating plume.
> From the shutting mist of death,
> From the failure of the breath,
> I made a battle-horn to blow
> Across the vales of overthrow.
> O hearken, love, the battle-horn!
> The triumph clear, the sliver scorn!
> O hearken where the echoes bring,
> Down the grey disastrous morn,
> Laughter and rallying!

It is victory that we are celebrating this evening, a victory born out of defeat. We need not linger over the slowly dragging years of the Civil War, over Major Higginson's ill-starred business ventures and his ultimate success in State Street. These were facts obvious to all. What the Boston public did not know in 1881 was that the new Symphony Orchestra was the very plan formed in exile and in sorrow and secretly nurtured through years of hope deferred.

Fulfillment

The story of the establishment and development of the orchestra is too long to be repeated here. It is admirably told in Mr. Howe's historical sketch of the first thirty-three years of the orchestra, closing with November, 1914, the date of Major Higginson's eightieth birthday. New chapters have now been added to this book, dealing with the difficult period of the World War, the conductorships of Rabaud and Monteux, and the new and triumphant era of musical achievement under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky. It is hoped that this revised volume will shortly be published.

What we recall tonight is not the details of fifty years of musical history, intimately related as that is to the growth of musical appreciation in Boston and throughout the United States. We think chiefly of the one person who was so greatly fortunate as to create a fellowship of artists, in which he himself was a comrade. He made one vast field of beauty accessible to persons having little other enjoyment, "people"—as Major Higginson said so perfectly in his farewell address in 1918—"unknown to me, who, leading gray lives, have needed this sunshine."

How simple it all seemed to him, at the end! Nothing had been wasted, nothing lost. As in a symphony where one instrument after another takes up the theme, everything had counted; the pioneers like Dwight and Zerrahn and Theodore Thomas, the organizations of musical enthusiasts, the supporting public—curious, critical, enraptured by turns—an efficient and devoted business management, with which the name of Charles A. Ellis must always be associated; expert musical criticism, an orchestra steadily growing in numbers and discipline, conductors of varied temperaments and gifts, composers of long-tested worth and of daring innovation, and upholding and dominating it all, the perception of beauty, the sense of happiness. I know I am speaking to some persons who are grateful to Henry Higginson for giving them a whole half-century of sunshine.

Transition

The men and women of his own generation are nearly gone. The Boston of his youth and manhood has changed beyond recognition. A new race of music-lovers has succeeded to the old. Fresh conceptions of the fine arts are molding the imaginations of a new era. Yet beauty and truth do not go out of fashion any more than old Johann Sebastian Bach goes out of fashion. They are forever being re-created; and whatever new and rich pleasures come to the patrons of the orchestra in the next fifty years, they can never quite forget the noble gentleman who first lighted the fire on this hearth.

With Mr. Kipnis on The Concert Stage

ALEXANDER KIPNIS was the singer last evening at the seventh concert of the Wellesley Concert Fund, the series given each year at Alumnæ Hall of Wellesley College. Mr. Kipnis is well remembered for his visits to Boston as bass of the Chicago Opera Company. There are others who remember him as notable singer at the Wagnerian festivals in the summer at Bayreuth. Mr. Kipnis last evening divided his program into four groups—songs of Schubert, songs of [illegible], and an air [illegible]los." There were [illegible] Schubert's songs [illegible] song of Geretch[illegible] air out of [illegible] Mr. K[illegible] acterized [illegible] the depth, the insight, the genial humanness of his interpretations. Cheap histrionics or obvious mouthings and gesturings do not enter into his operatic scheme of things. Thus when one sees and hears him on the concert platform one would hardly expect that he

Continued on Following Page

Four Cantatas Of the Church Bring the End

On Friday and Saturday, the Bach Who Lent Genius To Routine

ON Friday and Saturday the Bach Festival progresses to the cantatas, which remain the great bulk of his entire work. They constitute the "Hauptmusik" (principal music) at the "Hauptgottesdienst" (principal service of worship) in the Lutheran Church of Bach's day. . . . In the two principal churches of Leipzig (St. Thomas and St. Nicholas) there were four services every Sunday. "Fühgottesdienst" (early service) began at 6 A. M., but was intended chiefly for those (servants, for example) who found it impossible to attend the "Hauptgottesdienst." That began at 7 A. M. and must have continued through most of the morning; for the sermon normally occupied the time from eight to nine, with a celebration of Holy Communion still to follow. At noon came the "Mittagspredigt" (literally, noon-day sermon), again for those who had not attended the principal service. There was also a "Nachmittagsgottesdienst" (or afternoon service), which in importance was second only to the "Hauptgottesdienst."

It was said in these columns in connection with the Magnificat that the liturgy of the early Lutheran Church follows closely that of the Roman Church. The "Hauptgottesdienst" is really only a variant of the Mass. At Liepzig the order was not absolutely fixed. Professor C. S. Terry's invaluable "J. S. Bach's Cantata Texts, Sacred and Secular" gives the exact order of service, including the hymns, and collects (both German and Latin) used for every Sunday in the church year, in addition to translations of the words of all the cantatas. It is interesting to note the variations in the service, the curious mixture of German and Latin, in the several parts of the service.

Generally Speaking

As early as 1655 a 'piece" of "figural" music was prescribed after the Gospel "wherever practicable." In time this came to be variously known as "Concerto," "Dialogus," "Stück" (piece), "Hauptmusik," "Cantata." In subject matter it was closely related to the dominant thought of the day; it was indeed often founded upon the appointed chorale or hymn. Following the Gospel, it came imediately before the sermon. Terry's liturgies show that on several days of the church-year the Cantata was to come both before and after the sermon. One finds that Bach's Cantatas for those days days are always written in two parts, one before the other after the sermon. And any Cantata of Bach that is so written is intended for one of those days.

On ordinary Sundays at Leipzig the Cantata "was sung either in St. Thomas or in St. Nicholas but not in both" (Terry). On high festivals the Cantata was heard in St. Nicholas at the "Hauptgottesdienst" on the first and the third day of the festival and at vespers of the second; in St. Thomas at vespers of the first day and the "Hauptgottesdienst of the second. (It must be remembered that in the Lutheran churches of that time a major festival was always celebrated for three days. I.e., there was a first, second and third Christmas day).

Bach wrote almost two hundred Church Cantatas that are known to us at present. Schweitzer also speaks of seven "lost Cantatas." Further there are twenty-one Secular Cantatas" on a variety of subjects for as many occasions. All this of course in addition to the works in Latin, the motets, the oratorios, the passions. The Cantata was usually based on a Chorale. Each verse became a separate number within the Cantata—chorus, air, or ensemble piece. Sometimes there were also recitatives, or even extraneous verses from sources other than the Chorale. The form of the Cantata is so well illustrated in the four to be sung on Friday and Saturday that further generalizations would be superfluous.

"The Good Shepherd"

On Friday the two Cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" ("I am a Good Shepherd") and "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort" ("Eternity, thou Word of Thunder") come to performance. "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" is a Cantata for Easter Monday, or second Easter day as it was often called. It was probably written for the year 1735. It is a Cantata essentially for solo quartet. The six verses are respectively an air for bass; an air for alto; a solo for soprano in the form of a chorale-prelude on the melody of "Allein Gott in der Höh' sei Ehr" ("To God on High Alone be Glory"); a recitative and an air for tenor; a Chorale for all four, "God is my Shield and Shepherd true." The Cantata is lyrical in style throughout. Bach never loses sight of the idea of Jesus as the Good Shepherd. The words of the first verse are evidently put into His mouth. "I am the Good Shepherd," sings the base; "Jesus is the Good Shepherd" continues the alto; "The Lord is the Good Shepherd" concludes the soprano. After which the tenor sings appropriate commentary with "See what Love has done." And the final Chorale rightly ends with a note of serene confidence.

Parry's comment is to the point: "Though the conditions are not so favorable in solo-cantatas as in choral cantatas, Bach contrived to give Chorales a prominent position in many of them. But in some cases the conditions practically excluded them except at the end." It has already been noted that in the present instance there is a Chorale at the end and a Chorale-prelude or Chorale-fantasia at about the middle of the work.

Amusements

TRADER HORN

NOW PLAYING

TWICE DAILY, 2.30, 8.30
SUNDAYS 3 and 8.30
All Seats Reserved

Mats. 50c—[illegible]c-$1.00
Eves. 50c-75c-[illegible].00-$1.50

MAJESTIC

TOM SAWYER
WITH JACKIE COOGAN
MARCH 28, SATURDAY 10.30 A. M.
EXETER STREET THEATRE
Benefit of the Habit Clinic for Child Guidance
Tickets 50c and $1.50, obtainable at Theatre, Filene's, Herrick's, and Mrs. William Dexter, 67 Marlboro St.

REPERTORY THEATRE
NOW PLAYING
THE GIRL FROM THE REEPERBAHN
Continuous Show from 1 P. M.

LANCASTER
"SCANDAL SHEET"
George Bancroft
EXCITEMENT"
"GIRLS DEMAND
Virginia Cherrill

Amusements

2nd WEEK
and still taking Boston
by storm!

THE LAST PARADE
The Daring, Dashing Expose of the Racketeer
JACK HOLT
Tom Moore—Constance Cummings
(A Columbia Picture)
Today 9 to 1
30c
Han. 2720

RKO KEITH'S

EXETER
"The Place Where You Forget Your Troubles"
Jack Oakie in "GANG BUSTER"
Dorothy Mackaill in "ONCE A SINNER"

Four Cantatas Of the Church Bring the End

Continued from Preceding Page

[illegible] which concerns us here. The latter Cantata is known as a great Dialogue Cantata. The present Cantata is cast into two parts. That is, a Cantata a portion of which was sung before, another portion after the sermon. The day is the first Sunday after Trinity, the year probably 1725. All Cantatas assigned to this Sunday in Leipzig were two-part cantatas.

Bach makes no dramatic attempt at expressing the "Word of Thunder." His usual realistic methods might lead one to expect the contrary. "Eternity" causes him to deal entirely with ideas of the Last Judgment and the life beyond. The opening chorus runs in the form of the French overture. Maestoso, Vivace, Maestoso. "Each movement that succeeds," writes Parry, "presents fresh attitudes of contemplation of the overwhelming idea, the first half of the Cantata ending with the Chorale associated with the words 'O Ewigkeit.' The second half—not to be sung on Friday—begins appropriately with a powerful bass solo, 'Wachet auf' ('Awake, Awake'), with a brilliant trumpet accompaniment. To this succeeds a duet for alto and tenor, and the whole concludes with a repetition of the Chorale of the [illegible]

Luther Plus Bach

To conclude the [illegible] edition of the [illegible] magnificent Cant[illegible] ('A Mighty Fortr[illegible] Luther's famous [illegible] have been written [illegible] fest" of 1730. [illegible] on the Forty-six[illegible] refuge and [illegible] Cantata to be su[illegible] is in the strictest[illegible] tata. There are [illegible] ments: (1) a cho[illegible] (2) a duet for s[illegible] oboe and unison [illegible] verse; (3) a bass r[illegible] child of God to po[illegible] loves thee"; (4) a[illegible] the thought of th[illegible] with "O take my [illegible] unison chorus on t[illegible] wonn die Welt vo[illegible] the world of devils [illegible] orchestra; (6) ano[illegible] exhorting the so[illegible] "neath thy Sav[illegible] banner"; (7) a du[illegible] "What [illegible] treatment, to lea[illegible] ultation suitable [illegible] In the second [illegible] break up the C[illegible] phrases which t[illegible] the third, a ten[illegible] fluid version of [illegible] Four, "It was [illegible] Death's dominio[illegible] still shorter not[illegible] vigorous and so[illegible] Verse Five is a[illegible] bass, now in t[illegible] flowing orchestr[illegible] piano and tenor[illegible] duet. At the end[illegible] forward harmoni[illegible] four-part chorus.

fore leading his men into action, and was then struck down in an unlucky skirmish, receiving wounds that incapacitated him from further service. It seemed an ironic fate. After two disastrous failures in business, he became a partner in a banking house; but in his later life he took humorous delight in insisting that he had been taken into the firm as a matter of charity. He made, as everyone knows, a great deal of money; but in many years he gave it away faster than he earned it, and more than once, even in his eightieth year, he came very close to personal bankruptcy. Yet he had invincible pertinacity. As Mr. Kipling wrote of Lord Roberts, he marched from Kabul to Kandahar, and never told anyone how near he came to breaking down.

"I hope you understand," said Francis Lee Higginson once, "that my brother Henry was a gambler." He had the quizzical Higginson smile as he said it, mingled of affection, pride and reprehension. And indeed the founding of the Symphony Orchestra was a gambler's willingness to take a chance, and so was the gift of Soldiers Field, and the Harvard Union, and a hundred other benfactions of which the public knew nothing. It is proper to mention here that it was Francis Lee Higginson—always an expert in anonymous munficence—who in that anxious year of 1914, knowing the state of his brother's finances, quietly insisted upon assuming the entire burden of the orchestra, refusing to let his name be known. Henry was not the only gambler" in that family!

Strange Contrasts"

It was not merely in the external events of Major Higginson's picturesque career, but also in his character and aptitudes, that strange contrasts were to be seen. Photographers caught many differing aspects of his face. The bronze bust by Bela Pratt is a most veracious likeness, as is John Sargent's superb portrait. Yet there are those who dislike the portrait. When it was hung here in Symphony Hall a few months ago, I overheard the comments of two ladies, either of whom had known Major Higginson. One called his face "arrogant," the other "insolent." Never were two adjectives more confidently wrong, yet what was the impression which the portrait made. And indeed Major Higginson, with his head thrown back and his eyes narrowed, might well seem hard; but thless. In reality he was modest and even shy, but he had had to take the reins in his own hands more than once, and he must have known that he could drive. He said of his cavalry company: "They were a remarkably tough set of men of all sorts of occupations, among them prize-fighters, bar-keepers and the like. . . . They had had as their first senses. And he had an everlasting memory. Also he knew men at once when he looked into their eyes." That last clause is true of Lincoln, but it is not quite true of Major Higginson. Sometimes his swift judgments of men were mistaken. Some of his swans turned out to be geese, and worse. Professional confidence men found him easy, and his humor was never more delightful than in his stories of how he had been fooled.

From the Drawing by Sargent in the Manager's Office at Symphony Hall

He disclaimed any skill with words, and usually talked of literature as if that were one of the fine arts whose mysteries were beyond him. Yet on occasion he spoke in public with a grave, restrained beauty which reminded one of President Eliot, and in the sketches of his women friends which he read at Radcliffe there was an exquisite delicacy of touch, a quaint romantic idealism which was all his own. No one in his generation, surely, wrote more charming notes, especially to women. Letter-writing, in fact, was the only art about which he held a consistent theory: You should visualize your correspondent, and then write precisely as if you were talking with him. It seems easy, but it is not; and Henry Higginson triumphed in this rare art from his boyhood to his death.

Consistencies as Well

I am well aware that in stressing these contradictions of mood, these strange diversifications of gift in Major Higginson—a man by turns patient and impatient, gentle and obstinate, simple and subtle, wise and foolish—I am recalling qualities which greatly endeared him to his friends; yet to those who did not know him such an attempt to sketch his portrait by assembling apparently irreconcilable traits must seem hopeless if there were not deep consistencies in his character, fully as striking and more fundamental than the inconsistencies.

Let us select two of these underlying traits, each of which has a special bearing upon the history of the Symphony Orchestra. One was his supreme interest in persons: the other, not unrelated to the first, was his passion for music and his dream of making the finest music accessible to all.

Friend among Friends

Everyone who knew Henry Higginson was aware of his tendency to judge institutions and problems in terms of personality. To him our world was a world of persons, not of theories and abstractions. He was drawn to other men by quick and almost fierce affection; and even his repulsions were instinctive rather than reasoned. His bonds of family and kinship were exceptionally strong. His friends in the Latin School, in Harvard College and in the army became friends for life, and many of these men were the choicest spirits of his generation.

But even when there was no specially intimate friendship involved, his curiosity and interest in individuals were insatiable. He knew the name of every soldier in each of his two regiments. For many years he knew every player in the orchestra. We are all aware that what seems like a phenomenal memory for names and faces can be cultivated, as it is by hotel-clerks and taxi-drivers and politicians. But Henry Higginson began where such experts leave off. He carried in his heart these hundreds of personal accounts, brooding with a sleepless solicitude over the most intimate personal problems of his friends. He wrote in 1910: "The number of folks who are to be smoothed, admonished, touched up, is wonderful." And wonderful it was.

He did not always like to take advice himself—holding in that matter, as in others, that it is more blessed to give than to receive. However pathetic or sordid or absurd might be the immediate occasion, his counsels were always on a high plane. He undertook, by copious correspondence, to straighten out Presidents Roosevelt and Taft and Wilson, all of whom he liked personally, but whose official policies he frequently disapproved. Yet he was just as ready to hearten up a green office-boy, or an over-sensitive musician, or a discouraged college professor or a client who happened to be on the wrong side of the market.

Persons First

It was not, then, with mankind in general, and not often with what we call "causes" or "reforms," that his memory and imagination were occupied. When corporations were attacked, he leaped to the defense, not of any theory of corporate control, but of certain high-minded individuals with whom he had been associated—like his father and his uncle, Henry Lee, like Quincy Shaw and Alexander Agassiz, like Charles Coffin and Theodore Vail and Charles Perkins. Would such men consciously do wrong? To that question there was of course but one answer, and to Mr. Higginson that was the only question which was pertinent. He served for many years as a member of the Corporation of Harvard University, but according to his associates he was not so much interested in theories of education as in loyally supporting the concrete proposals of President Eliot and President Lowell. He cared for undergraduates rather than for studies and methods. No act of his life was more typical of his mind than his placing upon the tablet in Soldiers Field the names of his intimate friends who fell in the Civil War. Their unfulfilled purposes of service p[illegible] somehow, M[illegible] boys and Robert Gould [illegible] aw might h[illegible] done if their lives had been spared. was an idealism which seemed to some men fantastic; but it has touched the imagination of heroic boys as no abstract argument for patriotism could ever do.

The founder of the Symphony Orchestra was first of all a friendly person who wished to serve a community of friends. Impersonal "Foundations" and "Funds," however admirable their purpose and administration, often seem remote and merely monumental. Mr. Higginson put himself into every detail of the enterprise. It is true that it cost him a great deal of money, but he would have said that that was not the point. He put his life into it. Other men and women have bequeathed great legacies to this city, and splendid gifts will certainly continue to be made to the orchestra itself. But there are other tests of generosity than the sum total of dollars. By the rules of the arithmetic of heaven what counts is not how much you gave, but how much you had left. If Henry Higginson could have bequeathed a permanent endowment for the orchestra, he would have done so; but even that long-planned generosity would have been less characteristic of the man than putting his whole resources of mind and purse and character behind it for nearly forty years.

Disappointment into Dream

It is strange to think tonight that this magnificent orchestra, which is now a permanent institution with devoted Trustees, with a loyal public, generous private donors, and with artists and a conductor unsurpassed, should all have come from the dream and the disappointment of a boy. Every dream has its origin, obscure or clear. Henry Higginson had a passion for music in his childhood, and even in the eighteen-forties and fifties Boston was not without artists and a musical public. It was in 1823, in fact, that the Handel and Haydn Society commissioned Beethoven to write an oratorio for them—a commmission unfortunately never executed, though some of Beethoven's symphonies were played by the Boston Academy of Music in Higginson's boyhood. He heard the concerts of the Musical Fund Society, of the Germania Orchestra, and of the Harvard Musical Association. He listened to Italian opera from the twenty-five cent seats in the upper gallery. The diary of his first visit to Europe, before he was eighteen, is full of excitement over Mario and Grisi, then singing in London, and over the operas he heard in Milan and Munich. In Leipzig he heard for the first time the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra, and at Dresden, during the winter of 1852-53, he made his first acquaintance with "Tannhäuser" and Mozart's "Requiem" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. In Berlin it was the same story.

At twenty-two young Higginson was off to Europe again for four years. He settled in Vienna, just then, as he thought, the musical center of Europe. He studied voice, piano and composition, in the hope of becoming a professional musician. He wrote occasional articles for J. S. Dwight's Journal of Music. Some of his fellow-students, like his "Jewish chum," Epstein, were coming rapidly to the front. Higginson studied audiences as well as harmony. He saw conservatives "walk out on" Wagner, just as some Bostonians, in Henschel's first season, walked out on Brahms, and as we have seen them tempted to walk out on Stravinsky. Through all his excitement and enthusiasm he was learning a scale of values, the enduring standards of his chosen art. Then came the tragic blow that ended his professional hopes. I need not [illegible]

Conquering Fate

Yet it was in that bl[illegible] period of personal disappointment—1857, as he afterward told Presi[illegible]t Eliot—when one dream was dissolvi[illegible], that a richer dream began to take [illegible]rm. An artist was lost—an artist of [illegible]aste and some talent, but probably [illegible]hout what we and throughout the United States. We think chiefly of the one person who was so greatly fortunate as to create a fellowship of artists, in which he himself was a comrade. He made one vast field of beauty accessible to persons having little other enjoyment, "people"—as Major Higginson said so perfectly in his farewell address in 1918—"unknown to me, who, leading gray lives, have needed this sunshine."

How simple it all seemed to him, at the end! Nothing had been wasted, nothing lost. As in a symphony where one instrument after another takes up the theme, everything had counted; the pioneers like Dwight and Zerrahn and Theodore Thomas, the organizations of musical enthusiasts, the supporting public—curious, critical, enraptured by turns—an efficient and devoted business management, with which the name of Charles A. Ellis must always be associated; expert musical criticism, an orchestra steadily growing in numbers and discipline, conductors of varied temperaments and gifts, composers of long-tested worth and of daring innovation, and upholding and dominating it all, the perception of beauty, the sense of happiness. I know I am speaking to some persons who are grateful to Henry Higginson for giving them a whole half-century of sunshine.

Transition

The men and women of his own generation are nearly gone. The Boston of his youth and manhood has changed beyond recognition. A new race of music-lovers has succeeded to the old. Fresh conceptions of the fine arts are molding the imaginations of a new era. Yet beauty and truth do not go out of fashion any more than old Johann Sebastian Bach goes out of fashion. They are forever being re-created; and whatever new and rich pleasures come to the patrons of the orchestra in the next fifty years, they can never quite forget the noble gentleman who first lighted the fire on this hearth.

With Mr. Kipnis on The Concert Stage

ALEXANDER KIPNIS was the singer last evening at the seventh concert of the Wellesley Concert Fund, the series given each year at Alumnæ Hall of Wellesley College. Mr. Kipnis is well remembered for his visits to Boston as bass of the Chicago Opera Company. There are others who remember him as notable singer at the Wagnerian festivals in the summer at Bayreuth. Mr. Kipnis last evening divided his program into four groups—songs [illegible] Schubert, songs of [illegible] songs, and an air [illegible]los." There were [illegible] Schubert's songs [illegible] song of Geretch[illegible] air out of

Mr. K[illegible] as operatic s[illegible] acterized [illegible] the depth, the insight, the present [illegible] genial humanness of his interpretations. the end and a C[illegible] Cheap histrionics or obvious mouthings fantasia at about the m[illegible] and gesturings do not enter into his operatic scheme of things. Thus when one sees and hears him on the concert platform one would hardly expect that he

Continued on Following Page

Amusements

TRADER HORN

NOW PLAYING

TWICE DAILY, 2.30, 8.30
SUNDAYS 3 and 8.30
All Seats Reserved

Mats. 50c—75c-$1.00
Eves. 50c-75c-$1.00-$1.50

MAJESTIC

TOM SAWYER
WITH JACKIE COOGAN
MARCH 28, SATURDAY 10.30 A. M.
EXETER STREET THEATRE
Benefit of the Habit Club for Child Guidance
Tickets 50c and $1.50, obtainable at Theatre, Filene's, Herrick's, and Mrs. William Dexter, 67 Marlboro St.

REPERTORY THEATRE
NOW PLAYING
THE GIRL FROM THE REEPERBAHN
Continuous Show from 1 P. M.

LANCASTER "SCANDAL SHEET"
George Bancroft
"GIRLS DEMAND EXCITEMENT"
Virginia Cherrill

Amusements

2nd WEEK
and still taking Boston
by storm!

THE LAST PARADE

The Daring, Dashing Expose of the Racketeer

JACK HOLT
Tom Moore—Constance Cummings
(A Columbia Picture)
Today 9 to 1 30c Han. 2720

RKO KEITH'S

EXETER "The Place Where You Forget Your Troubles"
Jack Oakie in "GANG BUSTER"
Dorothy Mackaill in "ONCE A SINNER"

r tone was limpid and edgeless. Her nsibility of ear and finger achieved ry possible shading. Rarely has the n, gentle, narrow-ranging harpsichord nded with such resilience, grace, vicity. Writing for it, Bach bade it to e-lined, lightly decorated patterns, to y with rhythmic figures, to light melanoly, to pretty gayety. What he bade, ne. Casadesus accomplished as though two were touching the keys. A nded festival had included Bach as niaturist.

H. T. P.

rther Example

Like all humorists surrounded by pers without humor, he was bound to be understood. It might be said of him, was once said of another great patron the arts, Cosimo di Medici: "His wers were short and sometimes dark, that men might take them in divers days are always written in two parts, one before the other after the sermon. And any Cantata of Bach that is so written is intended for one of those days.

On ordinary Sundays at Leipzig the Cantata "was sung either in St. Thomas or in St. Nicholas but not in both" (Terry). On high festivals the Cantata was heard in St. Nicholas at the "Hauptgottesdienst" on the first and the third day of the festival and at vespers of the second; in St. Thomas at vespers of the first day and the "Hauptgottesdienst of the second. (It must be remembered that in the Lutheran churches of that time a major festival was always celebrated for three days. I.e., there was a first, second and third Christmas day).

Bach wrote almost two hundred Church Cantatas that are known to us at present. Schweitzer also speaks of seven "lost Cantatas." Further there are twenty-one Secular Cantatas" on a variety of subjects for as many occasions. All this of course in addition to the works in Latin, the motets, the oratorios, the passions. The Cantata was usually based on a Chorale. Each verse became a separate number within the Cantata—chorus, air, or ensemble piece. Sometimes there were also recitatives, or even extraneous verses from sources other than the Chorale. The form of the Cantata is so well illustrated in the four to be sung on Friday and Saturday that further generalizations would be superfluous.

"The Good Shepherd"

On Friday the two Cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" ("I am a Good Shepherd") and "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort" ("Eternity, thou Word of Thunder") come to performance. "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" is a Cantata for Easter Monday, or second Easter day as it was often called. It was probably written for the year 1735. It is a Cantata essentially for solo quartet. The six verses are respectively an air for bass; an air for alto; a solo for soprano in the form of a chorale-prelude on the melody of "Allein Gott in der Höh' sei Ehr" ("To God on High Alone be Glory"); a recitative and an air for tenor; a Chorale for all four, "God is my Shield and Shepherd true." The Cantata is lyrical in style throughout. Bach never loses sight of the idea of Jesus as the Good Shepherd. The words of the first verse are evidently put into His mouth. "I am the Good Shepherd," sings the base; "Jesus is the Good Shepherd" continues the alto; "The Lord is the Good Shepherd" concludes the soprano. After which the tenor sings appropriate commentary with "See what Love has done." And the final Chorale rightly ends with a note of serene confidence.

Parry's comment is to the point: "Though the conditions are not so favorable in solo-cantatas as in choral cantatas, Bach contrived to give Chorales a prominent position in many of them. But in some cases the conditions practically excluded them except at the end." It has already been noted that in the [illegible] instance there is a Chorale at [illegible] Chorale-prelude or Chorale-[illegible] middle of the work.

Four Cantatas Of the Church Bring the End

Continued from Preceding Page

lier of which concerns us here. The later Cantata is known as a great Dialogue Cantata. The present Cantata is cast into two parts. That is, a Cantata a portion of which was sung before, another portion after the sermon. The day is the first Sunday after Trinity, the year probably 1725. All Cantatas assigned to this Sunday in Leipzig were two-part cantatas.

Bach makes no dramatic attempt at expressing the "Word of Thunder." His usual realistic methods might lead one to expect the contrary. "Eternity" causes him to deal entirely with ideas of the Last Judgment and the life beyond. The opening chorus runs in the form of the French overture—Maestoso, Vivace, Maestoso. "Each movement that succeeds," writes Parry, "presents fresh attitudes of contemplation of the overwhelming idea, the first half of the Cantata ending with the Chorale associated with the words 'O Ewigkeit.' The second half—not to be sung on Friday—begins appropriately with a powerful bass solo, 'Wachet auf' ('Awake, Awake'), with a brilliant trumpet accompaniment. To this succeeds a duet for alto and tenor, and the whole concludes with a repetition of the Chorale of the first half."

The Cantata as a whole is in eleven numbers. Three of them are prose recitatives (No. 2 or tenor, No. 4 for bass, No. 9 for alto), picturing luridly the horrors of eternity should it be an eternity of punishment. No. 4, for example, contains such lines as "'Suppose the torture of the damned to last as many years as hath the grass its leafy blades or stars in heaven are shining." Or "It may be you your lot will bear, O lost soul, for a thousand million years, in hell with other souls tormented!" The last recitative exhorts: "O man, give up this world's vain pomp and pelf, rule, power, honor pride and wealth." Schweitzer thinks that in the alto aria, No. 6, "O man, see to thy soul's salvation," "the musical illustration of the test, 'From sins's strong chains thyself break free,' is quite excessive. Nowhere else in music has the painful writhing of a body been so realistically depicted." The Chorale melody, beginning with a proudly dignified ascending scale passage is prominent only in the huge opening contrapuntal chorus in French overture form, and in the two Chorales which ends the two parts..

For Easter

Saturday's audience will hear the cantatas, "Christ lag in Todesbanden" ("Christ in the bonds of death hath lain") and "Ein feste Burg" ("A Mighty Fortress"). "Chrst lag in Todesbaden" is an Easter cantata, written for Bach's first Easter service in Leipzig,—1724.

> Christ lay in Death's grim prison;
> He for our sins was given.
> But now today He's risen
> And brings us life from Heaven!

Thus begins the first verse in Terry's translation. Each of the seven verses is a sort of variation on the melody associated with the Chorale text. That melody is first heard as the sustained soprano part of the elaborate opening chorus of the Chorale-fantasia type. This chorus ends with a thrilling sequence of Hallelujahs. Without departing materially from the theme, without leaving the minor mode or the key of E, without a single aria in the entire [illegible] theme, Bach [illegible] tune with elaborate variation of

Luther Plus Bach

To conclude the festival—save the repetition of the Mass—there stands the magnificent Cantata, "Ein feste Burg" ("A Mighty Fortress"). This Cantata, on Luther's famous hymn, is supposed to have been written for the "Reformationsfest" of 1730. Luther based his hymn on the Forty-sixth Psalm—"God is our refuge and strength." Like the other Cantata to be sung Saturday evening it is in the strictest sense a Chorale Cantata. There are eight numbers or movements: (1) a chorus on the first verse; (2) a duet for soprano and bass with oboe and unison strings on the second verse; (3) a bass recitative exhorting the child of God to ponder "how much Jesus loves thee"; (4) a soprano air extending the thought of the preceding recitative with "O take my willing heart"; (5) a unison chorus on the famous verse "Und wonn die Welt voll Teufel wär" ("if all the world of devils were full") with full orchestra; (6) another recitative (tenor) exhorting the soul to take its stand "'neath thy Saviour's blood-bespatted banner"; (7) a duet for alto and tenor, "What blessedness is theirs on God who're ever calling, O'th[illegible] four-part Chorale in plain, majestic harmonization. There can be no better description than one culled from Parry and Schweitzer:

"The first chorus is of huge dimensions, and overwhelming energy, expressing in some indefinable way the strenuous confidence in the 'feste Burg.' . . . It begins at once, without instrumental preliminary, with the first phrase of the famous Chorale, slightly ornamental in detail, and treated fugally by the voices, which enter successively. This must, of course, be regarded as anticipatory to the entry of the actual recital of the Chorale, which comes in, in long notes, as the culmination of the opening passage. . . . being presented, not, as usual, by the voices, but by the accompanying instruments.

"When Bach introduced the Chorale in the trumpets and oboes as the culmination of the initiaal part of the chorus, he must have welcomed the discovery that this phrase of the tune admitted of being treated in canon, because the brilliant sound of the trumpets and oboes could be answered at once at the opposite end of the scale by the basses, thus enveloping the whole music from top to bottom in the Chorale phrase, which is, as it were, the radiating symbol expressing the exhilarating confidence in the 'feste Burg.' But having once presented a phrase of the Chorale in canon, Bach was bound by his sense of artistic responsibility not to drop so noticeable a feature, and therefore faced the arduous task of treating all the other phrases of the Chorale in canon on the same terms. . . . Bach achieves the approximately impossible without having to take the smallest trouble about it. Every phrase of the Chorale enunciated by the high and piercing instruments is answered immediately by the basses in the next bar, while the voices go on vivaciously discoursing in elaborate polyphony; and not only so but the very device of the canon is made to minister to the intrinsic expression of the music itself. . . .

"The Chorale makes conspicuous appearance in the second movement, which, though called an aria, is a recital of the il, by soprano solo, accompanied by pendent solo for bass and brilliant ages for the instrument. . . . 'Und wenn die Welt voll Teufel wär' ches the first chorus in strength and ressiveness. It depicts the assault of devil on the citadel of God. There is out a signal formed from the open- notes of the melody, whereupon a of horrid contorted bodies throws lf on the walls. They mount, sink k again, recover themselves once re, again make the assault, again fall k into the depths. . . . Every now then we hear shattering trumpet fares. . . . After a final effort the ious assault falls to pieces. . . . The so-called recitatives are both amalgated with passages in arioso form—ideal Teutonic type lying between formal aria and the dry recitative. e final movement is the usual four-t Chorale very strikingly harmonized. Lutheranism and mysticism—this confession of faith that the can- of St. Thomas's brought to the Reformation Festival and to a Bach Festival New England in 1931.

A. H. M.

160

SYMPHONY IN HONOR OF FOUNDER

Bach Festival in Form of Memorial for Higginson

Post MAR. 26

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The second evening of the current Bach Festival at Symphony Hall took the form of memorial exercises for Henry L. Higginson, founder and maintainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was music, to be sure — organ pieces from Wallace Goodrich and pieces for the harpsichord played by Mme. Patorni-Casadesus—but the central event last evening was an address by Bliss Perry, which was itself preceded and followed by briefer addresses by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees, and by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Orchestra.

MRS. HIGGINSON ON STAGE

The stage of Symphony Hall was appropriately bedecked for so personal an occasion. In the centre, at the rear was placed the familiar bust of Major Higginson, the Bela Pratt. Tapestries covered the walls. Greenery and flowers played their part in a well ordered decorative scheme, and there were many wreaths, the gift of individuals and of sister organizations. Two tables covered with gold brocade were placed in readiness respectively to receive Mrs. Higginson and members of her family and Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky, Mrs. Goodrich and Mr. Perry.

First to take their places on the stage were the members of the orchestra, who rose, as did the audience, when Judge Cabot escorted Mrs. Higginson to her chair. The trustees and their wives and other distinguished guests completed the company on the platform.

Opens With Bach

It was Bach who had the first say, through the medium of Mr. Goodrich's masterly and dignified performance of a Fantasia, Adagio and Fugue. Next Judge Cabot explained the nature and purpose of the evening's exercises, read telegrams from the presidents of other orchestras, those of Chicago, Omaha and San Francisco, congratulating the Boston Symphony on 50 years of notable achievement and paying tribute to the extent of its influence and the generous spirit of its founder.

Then came the turn of Mr. Perry, and no better spokesman could have been found to pay tribute to the one who had been called the first citizen of Boston. Mr. Perry's praise was not fulsome, and for that it rang the truer and impressed the more, while his pen picture of the man in whose memory a six-day festival of the music of Bach had been arranged, recalled or created, as the case might be, a vivid impression of a strong and lovable figure.

The programme further announced only the pieces for the harpsichord, the Italian Concerto, C minor Fantasia and a Gigue, and from Mr. Goodrich the most beautiful of the Choral Preludes, "Schmucke dich, o liebe Seele," and the G minor Fugue. But after Mme. Patorni Casadesus' delightful playing of the compositions for harpsichord (the Gigue was redemanded) Judge Cabot called upon Dr. Koussevitzky for a few words. In response to this request the conductor felicitously remarked that it was fitting that Major Higginson's memory should be honored by a Festival devoted to the music of the greatest of all composers, Johann Sebastian Bach, and he further emphasized Boston's and America's debt to the one who made possible the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HONORS FOUNDER

Bliss Perry Speaks on Henry L. Higginson

Notables on Stage Hear Great Tribute at Bach Festival

GLOBE MAR. 26

The current Bach festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced as "in honor of its founder, Henry L. Higginson. Last night, the second evening of the festival, was devoted partly to a commemorative address by Bliss Perry on Major Higginson, and partly to music by Bach for organ and harpsichord.

The organist was Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory. The harpsichord player was Mme Regina Patorni-Casadesus. Both musicians were heartily applauded for their performance of familiar masterpieces.

The stage of Symphony Hall was transformed into a beautiful approximation of a great room in a mansion. It was hung with tapestries and bedecked with plants and flowers. The bust of Major Higginson had been brought from the lobby and placed in the center of the rear of the stage, surrounded by masses of laurel.

At its foot lay a wreath, sent by the Philadelphia Orchestra. At the sides were massed chairs for the invited guests. At the left center was a table with a few armchairs, for the notables. At the right, balancing it, another similar table was for the speakers and performers. The organ console and the harpsichord gave the appearance of a room about to be used for chamber music.

Players on Stage

After the audience had assembled, filling floor and balconies, the members, present and past, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra filed onto the stage, and took their seats at either side. Then there was a pause, and Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the orchestra, entered. By his side came Mrs Higginson, widow of the founder. Everyone in the hall stood up until she was seated at the table on the left. Following came the other invited guests, including notables from other cities, and finally Dr and Mrs Koussevitzky and the performers of the evening.

Besides the music and Bliss Perry's address, there were brief remarks by Judge Cabot, mentioning the many congratulations sent by other American orchestras, some of which he read to the audience, and paying in a sentence or two a heartfelt tribute to Maj Higginson.

Dr Koussevitzky also spoke briefly near the end of a very long program. He stressed the nobility of Bach's music, which made a series of performances of it a peculiarly fitting tribute to the memory of such a man as Henry Lee Higginson.

Bliss Perry's address, read in a clear voice that carried to every part of the hall, held the attention of the audience. It was applauded with unusual warmth. One important detail in what he said was new to the public. Maj Higginson in 1914, at the age of 80, was on the verge of bankruptcy. His brother, Francis Lee Higginson, stepped in, and for the time being took over the full financial support of the Boston Symphony, refusing, however, to let his name be mentioned to anyone in connection with it.

Mr Perry's address, phrased and delivered with the felicity of diction one would expect from a former editor of the Atlantic and professor of English at Princeton and Harvard, ran, in part, as follows:

"It is nearly 13 years since Maj Higginson made his farewell address to the orchestra, and surrendered to younger men the burden and the glory of carrying forward the enterprise which, single-handed, he had initiated and sustained. He was then in his 84th year. He died in the following year, 1919, just before his 85th birthday.

A Living Presence

"To his friends, and to many patrons of the Symphony concerts who knew him only by sight, he remains a living presence, as nobly vital as when he used to walk down the aisle of this hall to his accustomed seat. Yet there are many artists in the present orchestra, and many subscribers to this season's concerts, who never saw him, so swiftly and inexorably run the currents of change.

"If Major Higginson had not actually walked the streets of Boston and been known more or less intimately by so many of us, it would seem incredible that such combination of apparently contradictory qualities could be found in any one man. It was the contradictions that made the charm.

"This typical Bostonian was born in New York. This 'ideal Harvard man,' as Pres Hadley described him when he received his honorary degree from Yale, left Harvard before Christmas of his freshman year, owing to trouble with his eyes, and never went back.

"He looked every inch the soldier, even to the sabre scar across his face, but as an officer in the Second Massachusetts Regiment of Volunteer infantry, and in the First Massachusetts Cavalry, he was forced to wait 20 bitter months before leading his men into action, and was then struck down in an unlucky skirmish, receiving wounds that incapacitated him from further service. It seemed an ironic fate.

"After two disastrous failures in business, he became a partner in a banking house, but in his later life he took humorous delight in insisting that he had been taken into the firm as a matter of charity. He made, as everyone knows, a great deal of money; but in many years he gave it away faster than he earned it, and more than once, and even in his 80th year, he came very close to personal bankruptcy.

"Yet he had invincible pertinacity. As Mr Kipling wrote of Lord Roberts, he marched from Kabul to Kandahar, and never told anyone how near he came to breaking down.

Had Quizzical Smile

"'I hope you understand,' said Francis Lee Higginson, 'that my brother, Henry, was a gambler.'

"He had the quizzical Higginson smile as he said it, mingled of affection, pride and reprehension. And indeed the founding of the orchestra was a gambler's willingness to take a chance, and so was the gift of Soldiers Field and the Harvard Union and a hundred other benefactions of which the public knew nothing.

"It is proper to mention here that it was Francis Lee Higginson—always an expert in anonymous munificence—who in that anxious year of 1914, knowing the state of his brother's finances, quietly insisted upon assuming the entire burden of the orchestra, refusing to let his name be known. Henry was not the only 'gambler' in that family.

"I am well aware that in stressing these contributions of mood, these strange diversifications of gift in Maj Higginson—a man by turns patient and impatient, gentle and obstinate, simple and subtle, wise and foolish—I am recalling qualities which greatly endeared him to his friends; yet to those who did not know him, such an attempt to sketch his portrait by assembling apparently irreconcilable features must seem as hopeless as to try to fix upon a single canvas the changing mood of a New England April. And indeed the task would be hopeless if there were not deep consistencies in his character, fully as striking and more fundamental than the inconsistencies.

"Let us select two of these underlying traits, each of which has a special bearing upon the history of the Symphony Orchestra. One was his supreme interest in persons; the other, not unrelated to the first, was his passion for music and his dream of making the finest music accessible to all."

MUSIC

Mar 26

BACH FESTIVAL

The second concert of the Bach Festival, given last night at Symphony hall, paid special tribute to the memory of the noble founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Maj. Henry L. Higginson. Dr. Bliss Perry, who knew Maj. Higginson, gave the great audience a vivid picture of the man, his ideals, and his dreams . . . recalling a fine friend to those who knew him, and acquainting those who did not know him, with the charm and generosity of his character. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky paid eloquent tribute to this great friend of music, and to the music of Johann Sebastian Bach, whose works are being played in this festival to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the man who founded it, and who through so many years supported it, alone.

The music of Bach that was played last night—organ music, and music for the harpsichord—is some of the loveliest he wrote. The Italian Concerto, the Gigue in D Minor, and the Fantasia in C Minor, that were played by Madame Patorni-Casadesus, embody all the lively humor, the grace, piquancy, and graciousness of Bach's best "entertainment" music. Madame Patroni-Casadesus's playing was all that could be desired. Not unknown to Symphony audiences here, she played even more delightfully than at previous concerts, and she was recalled continuously until Dr. Koussevitzky requested that she repeat the Gigue.

Wallace Goodrich, organist, played the Fantasia in C Minor; Adagio from the Toccata in C Major; Fugue in C Major; Choral-prelude "Schmueckedich, o liebe Seele"; and the great Fugue in G Minor. This admirable selection of organ music was played with taste and brilliance. Perhaps most impressive was the great G Minor Fugue, in which the bold, sonorous structure of the Fugue, rising to a tremendous climax, most appeals to organ-music lovers today.

Dr. Bliss Perry's splendid word-portrait of Henry Higginson was the outstanding feature of the evening. Without making the talk a ceremony, and without investing it with the entirely laudatory character of things forever gone and very unreal, he struck the note of appreciation surely and truly. In his own words, "Beauty and truth do not go out of fashion, any more than Johann Sebastian Bach goes out of fashion. They are forever being recreated; and whatever new and rich pleasures come to the patrons of the orchestra in the next 50 years, they can never quite forget the noble gentleman who first lighted the fire on this hearth."

E. B.

TRIBUTE PAID HIGGINSON AT SYMPHONY

Mar 26

By MOSES SMITH

FOR THE second program of the Bach Festival at Symphony Hall an evening with ceremonials as its central feature had been planned. Prof. Emeritus Bliss Perry of Harvard delivered an address on Henry Lee Higginson, founder and sustainer of the orchestra for almost 40 years, to whose memory this festival is dedicated. He spoke not only to a goodly audience, but to a large group on the stage that included the members of the orchestra, the conductor, the trustees and distinguished guests. Among the latter was, appropriately and happily, the nonogenarian Mrs. Higginson.

There were occasional remarks by Judge Cabot, head of the trustees, and Dr. Koussevitzky spoke briefly, but feelingly. For music there was a group of harpsichord works played by Mme. Pantorni-Casadesus; and as prelude and postlude, Wallace Goodrich played organ works of the great master.

The audience, which did not tax the capacity of the hall, was a curious one, for it was about evenly divided between stately dowagers and their necessary escorts on the one hand, and extremely youthful people on the other. Its size and character prompt the criticism, which we do not intend as presumptuous, that this affair might have been given entirely for invited guests —non-payment guests—and in a smaller hall.

For Symphony Hall was too large for those seated in the rear to hear and note the charm of Prof. Perry's mellow address of tribute. It was too small for the audience to appreciate fully the dignity on stage. And it was certainly too small for the rarely-heard harpsichord. Incidentally, Mme. Casadesus played with facility and even brilliance, for which she was heartily applauded, but without the profound understanding which her reputation had led us to expect. The organ music alone on the program seemed suited to the size of the auditorium.

Higginson Bust Will Be Dedicated April 19

Bos. Post MAR. 26.

MAYOR ACCEPTS HIGGINSON BUST

Mayor Curley yesterday accepted the gift of Symphony Hall officials of a bust of the late Major Henry L. Higginson for the South End Municipal Building.

A reproduction of the bronze bust of the late Major Henry L. Higginson, which stands in Symphony Hall, yesterday was presented to Mayor Curley, to be ensconsed in the Henry L. Higginson auditorium of the new South End Municipal building. The agents for the donors were G. E. Judd, W. H. Brennan and Paul Sanson of Symphony Hall, which supplied the piece of statuary.

It will be suitably dedicated in its proper position in the hall April 19, as a part of the city's Patriots' Day exercises, the Mayor announced.

To the Bach Of Concertos And Canticle

Court-Piece, House-Piece, and The Human Fervors of The Magnificat

BEFORE intermission at the third concert of the Bach Festival, the listener last evening at Symphony Hall, was on relatively familiar ground. The Second Brandenburg Concerto has been played more than once in this Koussevitzkyan day; while Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gillet and Mager are no strangers in the solo-parts. Bach's piano-concertos are less frequent comers; but one or another returns often enough to make them no surprise. The choice, for the festival, was the Concerto in D minor, counted by learned judges the best of the seven; now heard with Mr. Alexander Borovsky in the piano-part. Five or six seasons ago, he was called to Symphony Hall to be soloist—at the other end of the scale—in Chaikovsky's well-worn Concerto. Through the intervening years he has gathered European reputation as a "Bach specialist"; now plays as such. An audience of notable numbers and quality applauded him warmly; was as cordial to the familiar quartet from the orchestra. At the moment when the festival is to merge into the inaccessible Symphony Concerts, it has caught, more than ever, the musical interest of the town. Fortunately there remains, for climax, the repetition on Sunday in two "sessions" of the Mass in B minor.

Bach's setting of the Magnificat—Luke's hymn of the thankful and rejoicing mother of Jesus—filled the second half of the concert. Through fifty-five years it has not been heard in Boston. To most it must have sounded new and strange. Unlike the Mass, it is no monument of music, set apart in solitary grandeur. It does not overwhelm an audience and leave it exhausted under weight of attention, sensation, emotion. It is readily comprehensible; fills no vast formal patterns; is instant and exhilarating in effect. Though Bach still visions in multitudes, though his canticle of praise mounts from earth to heaven, generation unto generation, he is more human and less apocalyptic. He is also more timeless and timely.

Seldom in the Magnificat does the listener feel that the airs and duets belong to another age and style, now difficult of approach. The choruses teem with rhythmic life—and in these days, mistakenly or not, it is habit to exalt rhythm above any other musical quality. Consequently, immediate and ardent response from both singers and hearers; at the end waves of applause from auditorium and stage, upon which Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth who had schooled the Harvard and the Radcliffe choirs, Dr. Koussevitzky as directing genius of the whole; the solo-singers incidentally—all tossed like happy corks. . . . When stamping is the word, or rather the action, three hundred young persons from the two colleges can beat us Bostonians, feet down.

As Bach read the Magnificat, as he set it for his choir and congregation at Leipzig, it is little the song that the poet of the New Testament wrote for Mary blessed with divine motherhood. Holy church, Roman or Reformed, prefers to regard it as a canticle of impersonal rejoicing and universal praise for the goodness and the greatness of God. It remains for some pagan modernist to hear the voice of Mary's pride and wonder and joy, lowly yet exalted, remembering and foretelling; then in his tones to send it upleaping, sweet from the springs of her heart, poignant in exultation. Meanwhile there is Bach, seeing and hearing "the voice of a great multitude"—the adoring faithful of all the lands and all the ages. Their souls magnify their Lord. Chorus and orchestra are jubilant in reiterated and mounting praise. (As often, a single word possesses Bach. Upon it he rings the changes.) For all time and for all the folk—and he writes the second chorus with the repetitions of "omnes" rising from the pedal-point of earth to the gates of heaven. . . .

"He hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts." Dispersit superbos as the Latin has it, and these two words generate a chorus of epical power and sweep and vision. Two hundred years ago there was also irresistible rhythm. . . . Finally the memory of the past and the promise for the future in grave fugal austerities; last of all the glory of the triune God. The trumpets sound it; the voices proclaim it. Of the light eternal from the Godhead shining Bach makes his music. It is music for young voices such as John, the other poet of the New Testament, heard in Patmos. It is music of rhythm, driving period after period ever higher—the eternal rhythm, the devout and the poetic may call it. Possessed by a music they had mastered; feeling rather than knowing, the young choirs sang above themselves. Bach and three conductors had persuaded massed emotion to speak out from American throats in the concert-hall.

The airs, the duets, the three-part number for women's voices, sung last evening as trio, not chorus, all gain in impression upon modern audiences by the musical conciseness, the emotional directness, of Bach through the Magnificat. Singers approach them more sympathetically, find the style less impediment to expression. According to his imaginative habit, Bach heard these individual voices as though they outsprung, intensified or contrasting, from the massed tones of all the faithful. Against the jubilant beginning, he poses in the first air the graver exultation of a single spirit—some call it Mary's. The soprano sings of her whom "all generations shall call blessed." On the instant the reiterating chorus, "Omnes," "omnes," "omnes," takes cue. The bass voice sounds the Divine Power; kindled, the alto and the tenor answer with the Divine Mercy. "Dispersit superbos" cries the chorus. Forthwith the tenor voice also remembers: "He hath put down the mighty from their seats and exalted them of low degree." Again the alto recalls the compassionate God and her voice flows through the gentle air of the hungry fed; while the rich are turned empty away.

Each of these several numbers evokes in tones the poet's vision. It is more than expressed. It is delineated until the composer's emotion becomes the emotion of all within hearing. Nowhere did Mme. Matzenauer or Mme. Evans, Mr. Crooks or Mr. Gange fall short of Bach's intention, misuse his means. Everywhere the sharing instruments and Mr. Sanromá's accompanying (and re-enforced) harpsichord were at one with them. As long as singing and playing humanity remains as imperfect as it is, there are bound to be shortcomings in the Mass. The Magnificat is within human compass—when so divining a conductor as Dr. Koussevitzky insists upon the human note. In Bach's imagination the hosts of heaven and earth join together in the Mass. In the Magnicat humankind suffices him.

In the Brandenburg Concerto, Mr. Mager, using a short and small trumpet in F, sought to overcome the difficulties of the part as Bach wrote it for the instrument of his time, to gain as well the veritable timbre. To some ears the experiment was not fortunate, since the tone was thin and flickering; while the technical effort absorbed the player to the exclusion of all else. Otherwise the solo-quartet excelled, whether flowing, florid or fugal measures engaged it. The conductor, in his turn, kept the whole in changeful motion and constant animation; attained, indeed, with a larger ensemble, what may plausibly have been the effect of such courtly music in Bach's time—manifold and vitalizing rhythm laid in light vigors upon the quick movements; melodic charm and grace in the meetings, partings and interweavings of the slow movement; the sentiment that threads it; the air of ease, distinction and the apt matching of means to ends pervading the whole. The noble patron and his circle had reason to smile as they heard.

Though the Piano-Concerto was played down the tunnel-like spaces of Symphony Hall, it also might have been music for a salon at the Cöthen court, or for the meetings of the Telemann Society at Leipzig, or even a house-music for the living-room of Bach himself. (His family and his friends were well provided with instruments. They did not lack practised talents.) The first division of the Concerto is soberly patterned, broadly phrased, vigorous of movement, decorated here and there, more remarkable for musical science and creative energy than for any fineness of feeling. The second division curves from period to period musingly. The finale is quick-rhythmed, florid, exuberant—Bach at light play with inventions and conventions. Mr. Borovsky was all for as intimate performance as the hall permitted. Dr. Koussevitzky proportioned accordingly the accompanying strings.

The pianist escaped the pitfalls. He neither dried the first movement into a scholastic exercise nor coated it with a false "expression." It rose sturdily upon the ear as a musical design, both firm and flexible, upspringing from itself in bold outline and comely proportion. Mr. Borovsky was as clear as he was sensitive. He unfolded the slow movement in tempered warmth of tone, as a rich and spacious music felt but also measured. He laid a light cool hand upon the finale, keeping the rhythmic figures in spirited motion, spinning the arabesques in bright threads. An impersonal performance it is easy to say; but "very personal" in its Bach-like spirit and Bach-like truth. H. T. P.

Before he departs, Mr. Borovsky, the remarkable pianist of the Bach Festival, will be heard in the music of another composer. With the Symphony Orchestra, at Cambridge next Thursday, he will play Weber's Concert-Piece in F minor.

AMERICAN BOROVSKY IS SOLOIST AT BACH FETE

By MOSES SMITH

INSTRUMENTAL music divided the program with choral at the third evening of the current Bach Festival in Symphony Hall. An excellent performance of the Second Brandenburg Concerto, with its fiendishly difficult trumpet part played by Georges Mager, began the concert. It was followed by the D minor Concerto for piano and string orchestra.

The soloist in the Concerto was Alexander Borovsky, who had come from Europe for this festival. His reputation as a Bach player was amply justified by his performance last night, for never have we heard a rendering of Bach's piano music so subtly imaginative yet thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of the master (as we conceive it). It was playing in which elements of drama and showmanship were noticeable by their utter absence. Here was a sincere musician and inspired artist com. to reproduce a masterpiece, not to win applause by meretricious means. It was, therefore, a credit to the intelligence of the large audience that it applauded the performer at the end with extraordinary fervor.

The choral work, with which the concert closed, was the Magnificat. It suffers, of course, in comparison with the B minor Mass, but it is a masterpiece, none the less, on a smaller scale. The opening chorus, and the reminiscence of it at the end, are especially notable. The singing of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society rivalled its work in the Mass on Tuesday night, which is superlative praise. The soloists—Amy Evans, Adelle Alberts, Margaret Matzenauer, Richard Crooks and Fraser Gange—had music less noble than that in the Mass, but acquitted themselves ably. Our principal reservation is for Mr. Koussevitzky, who on two or three noteworthy occasions, so radically altered tempo as we could on no account justify by a study of the music and text.

CANTATAS ON PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

Orchestral and choral music again shared the program at the fourth concert of the Bach Festival at Symphony Hall yesterday. The Third Suite for Orchestra, in D major, and the Concerto for two Violins in D minor were followed by the Cantata "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" ("I am a good shepherd") and the first half of "Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort" ("Oh, Eternity, Thou Thunderous Word").

This mixed program, while of not uniform greatness, exposed the master at a high general level of accomplishment. The Suite has the celebrated Air by which Bach is exclusively known to multitudes; it also has other movements of charm and beauty. The Concerto has, in the slow movement, one of the loveliest melodies in all music; and the interplay of the two solo voices, while the quasi-improvised string accompaniment goes on inexorably, is the flower of Bach's contemplative Muse. Nor are the two fast movements far behind in the quality of inspiration. The Concerto was done with fine musical feeling by the soloists, Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, who were enthusiastically applauded. The accompaniment, under Mr. Koussevitzky, seemed to us over-discreet. But it and the preceding Suite were comparatively free from his usual mannerisms.

The cantatas were by no means of pure gold. The soloists, Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer, Richard Crooks, and Fraser Gange, often had to deliver measures sounding dull to 20th century ears. Yet for the most part, their efforts, those of Mr. Koussevitzky and of the well-trained, smoothly singing Bach Cantata Club prevailed, and Bach sounded out in his mighty majesty and peaceful beauty.

The program had been painstakingly prepared and was for the most part very well performed, with a single minor mishap. The subscription audience took its Bach diet with good grace, applauding the performers warmly. The program was an unusually long one, lasting more than two hours; but the usual exodus towards the end was comparatively limited. Bach—or a sense of duty—held the listeners;

ANOTHER SESSION OF BACH

Symphony Plays Suite and Concerto—Cantatas Sung

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, as will that of this evening with a wholly different programme, formed part of the Bach Festival now in progress at Symphony Hall. And since an entire afternoon or evening of Bach's instrumental music might easily result in monotony, Dr. Koussevitzky placed upon each programme two of the seldom-heard Church cantatas, with the Bach Cantata Club of Boston, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, and the regular soloists of the Festival to sing them.

FOR TWO VIOLINS

Yesterday the cantatas formed the second half of the programme. To the first fell the Suite for orchestra in D major, that from which comes the so-called Air for the G string, perhaps the best known of all Bach's instrumental pieces, and the less frequently heard Concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra, with Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz to bear the solo parts.

The D major Suite is, and justly, the best liked of all Bach's larger instrumental works, and not only because of the celebrated Air, generally heard outside the suite in transposition a tone lower. The Overture displays in turn agreeable pomp and bustle; the two Gavottes, the Bourree and the Gigue are charming; while the Air, it need hardly be said, is one of Bach's noblest melodies.

Pure, Beautiful Melody

As that devoted disciple of Bach, Sir Charles Hubert Parry, himself admitted, the slow movement of the D minor Concerto is "by a very long way the most attractive feature of the work," and he goes on to say that "it is quite possible that it stands absolutely in the front rank of all Bach's movements whose reason for existence is pure beautiful melody."

Perhaps Sir Charles has overstated the case, but that this Largo is beautiful none can deny, and it was beautifully played yesterday by the two soloists. Admirable, too, was their performance of the other movements, but in these, as in so many of Bach's Allegros, there comes the feeling that the performers are caught in the toils of a sort of musical treadmill.

Lovely Air, Expressively Sung

It was a disappointment that the Bach Cantata Club, which proved itself yesterday a most excellent chorus, had not fuller opportunity in the two cantatas selected for that programme, No. 85, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt," and No. 20, "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort." The Chorale that ends the first of these and that with which what was given of the second concluded, are of the Bach of whom one cannot hear too much. As we have been rediscovering since Tuesday, Bach was not at his happiest in writing for solo voice. There are, of course, notable exceptions, and one of them came yesterday in the lovely and touching air, "The hirelings may sleep," so expressively sung by Richard Crooks. Here the accompaniment for muted strings is as pleasing as the song itself, and Bach's accompaniments to the airs in his choral works are too often distractingly and obtrusively contrapuntal, frequently marred by an over-prominence of a reedy oboe tone which, as they say of inharmonious colors, "fights" with the voice.

The other soloists yesterday were Mmes. Evans and Matzenauer and Mr. Gange, but to no one of them came on this occasion flattering opportunity.

SYMPHONY IN THIRD OF BACH LIST

Ten Soloists Help Out in Concerto and Magnificat

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening at Symphony Hall brought the third concert of the Symphony Orchestra's Bach Festival, and that concert offered the Second Brandenburg Concerto, the D minor Concerto for piano and orchestra, and the Magnificat.

CHORUS AGAIN LEADS

In the Brandenburg Concerto, as in recent performances at the Symphony concerts, Messrs. Burgin, Laurent and Gillet performed respectively the solo parts for violin, flute and oboe, while Mr. Mager wrestled with the all but impossible exactions of the superhumanly high part for solo trumpet. In turn the piano concerto returned to us Alexander Borovsky, unheard here since Dr. Koussevitzky's second year when he appeared as soloist at a pair of symphony concerts.

Finally the Magnificat elicited the services of the chorus which sang on Tuesday the B minor Mass, a chorus drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, and of these solo singers: Amy Evans and Adelle Alberts, sopranos; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; and, Fraser Gange, baritone.

Borovsky at Piano

One of the most delightful of Bach's larger instrumental compositions, the Second Brandenburg Concerto gave pleasure to last evening's large audience as it has to many a company at the symphony concerts. The Piano Concerto in D minor is, by comparison, of the work-a-day Bach, though there is a grave dignity not untouched by beauty in the Adagio, and the third movement is agreeably fluent in style. Mr. Borovsky enjoys in Europe a great reputation as interpreter of the music of Bach, but his true measure in this will be better gauged by us of Boston when he plays four Preludes and Fugues from the well-tempered clavichord at the Symphony Concert of tomorrow evening.

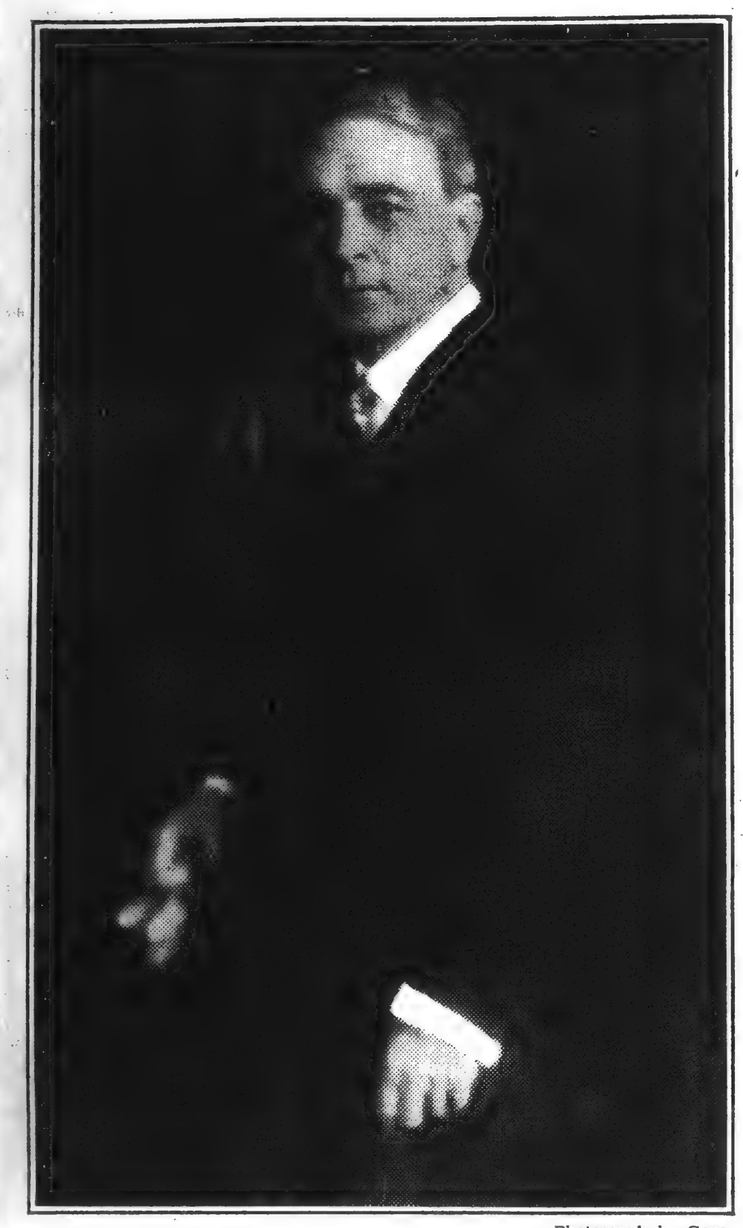
His performance of the Concerto last evening showed him a pianist thoroughly at home in the more showy instrumental style of the period, and he was most enthusiastically applauded.

A Virtual Novelty

The Magnificat came last evening as a virtual novelty, so long had it been unsung in this city. Any who sought to find in it a recurrence of the grandeur and sublimity, the deep human pathos, of the B minor Mass were doomed to disappointment. The Mass, even though it does not exhibit plenary inspiration, came from the heart; the Magnificat from Bach's ready resource in the spinning of contrapuntal designs and in the easy, yet brilliant, handling of large choral forces. In the Magnificat as in the Mass, the choral portions greatly outweigh in interest and, as it would seem, found themselves often faced with a vocally ungrateful task.

For its work throughout the piece the chorus is again to be warmly commended, reflecting credit upon Mr. Woodworth and Dr. Davison who trained it, and Dr. Koussevitzky who rehearsed and led it.

the World—Theatrical News



Photograph by Garo

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston's Bach Festival

By L. A. SLOPER

MUSIC of Johann Sebastian Bach filled the programs of the festival (March 24-29) in celebration of the fiftieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and in honor of its founder, Henry L. Higginson. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky had selected choral and instrumental compositions to comprise six concerts in the home of the orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston.

The great Mass in B minor filled the first program, and was scheduled for repetition, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, at the final concert. Other choral music included the Magnificat, the Easter Cantata, No. 4, and the Cantatas numbered 20, 80 and 85. The Brandenburg Concertos No. 2 (violin, flute, oboe and trumpet) and No. 5 (piano, violin and flute), the Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, the Concerto for two violins and the Suite No. 3 were the orchestral items. Organ solos, harpsichord pieces and selections from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord" were listed. Prof. Bliss Perry of Harvard College gave an address on Major Higginson.

The orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor, and by the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists were Amy Evans and Adelle Alberts, sopranos; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Patorni-Casadésus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ, and the following members of the orchestra: Richard Burgin, concertmaster; Julius Theodorowicz, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Georges Mager, trumpet; Albert Snow, organ, and Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboe d'amore.

The B Minor Mass

The B minor Mass, which had not been heard in its entirety in Boston for nearly 30 years, was naturally a central feature, and its performance was one of the high points of the festival. In the performance of this sort of music there is much to be said for using such fresh and eager young voices as those of the Harvard and Radcliffe undergraduates. Nor is it necessary to say in this instance that they made up in enthusiasm what they lacked in training. For they had been rehearsed for more than a year in this difficult music by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, and under the vital baton of Dr. Koussevitzky they were revealed as an interpretive medium of extraordinary expressiveness. The balance of the choirs was sensitively maintained; the altos were equal partners with the others. Tonal quality was good, and phrasing and dynamics were subtle and musical. There was no dependence upon mere volume of sound. The "Crucifixus" was no less impressive than the opening "Kyrie," and the "Dona nobis pacem" was delivered with significant emotional values.

The chorus of course was the principal actor in the Mass, yet certain items in the solo work made a deep impression. Mme. Matzenauer in particular distinguished herself in the "Qui sedes" and the "Agnus Dei." Mme. Evans, if with less authority, sang with intelligence, and Mr. Crooks and Mr. Gange were satisfying. At the end of the opening performance the audience lingered for prolonged applause in which the unusual manifestations of cheers and stamping of feet were conspicuously included.

A similar triumph was achieved by the same forces (with Mme. Alberts added to the soloists) in the Magnificat on the evening of March 26. This work is even less familiar to Boston than the B minor Mass; for apparently it had not been heard before in that capital of music for more than half a century. Its power immediately conquered the audience of 1931. Here again Mme. Matzenauer stood out for the quality of her art in her solo parts.

At the same concert Mr. Borovsky played the D minor Concerto with a beauty of tone, a legato and a musicality worthy of all commendation. This concert had opened with a performance of the Second Brandenburg Concerto which, besides reminding us that it is one of the loveliest things in all music, raised also a question of Dr. Koussevitzky's judgment in an instrumental problem. In his desire to employ as far as possible the instruments of Bach's time, he had required Mr. Mager to use through the festival a small trumpet of high range with which to follow the florid flights which the composer gave to this instrument.

As everybody knows, the modern trumpet cannot play these passages except by dropping an octave now and then. Unfortunately, the timbre of this high trumpet consorted very badly with the other instrumental voices. Wherever it entered, it rose shrilly above the orchestral ensemble and the chorus too. This fault of course became uncomfortably noticeable in the Second Brandenburg Concerto—to the extent of marring an otherwise exquisite performance. It is possible to indulge too far a taste for the archaic. And it is no reply to say that presumably those sounds were what Bach heard. We should hear more beautiful sounds today, and above all, sounds from the trumpet that accord with those of the other instruments.

The Cantatas

For the cantatas, the more mature voices of the Bach Cantata Club were substituted for those of the college choirs, while the original quartet of soloists was retained. The cantatas do not uniformly offer the opportunities provided by the Mass and the Magnificat; it cannot be maintained that every measure in every one of them resulted from the master's highest inspiration. Nevertheless they contain some beautiful music, none of it perhaps more beautiful than the tenor aria in the Cantata No. 85, sung sympathetically by Mr. Crooks at the concert on the afternoon of March 27, which incidentally was the twentieth in the Friday subscription series. In this work and in Cantata No. 20, "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort," the club chorus responded with a will, if not always with tonal perfection, to the exhortations of Dr. Koussevitzky.

At this concert also the orchestra gave a brilliant performance of the Suite in D major, which was warmly received, and not alone because it contains the famous Air; and Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz contributed much to the pleasure of the reunion by their rendition of the Concerto for two violins.

And in 1932?

Dr. Koussevitzky has again earned laurels by an ambitious undertaking and by the mastery with which he has carried it through. He sees Bach, as he sees other composers, through his own dramatic temperament, and his tempi sometimes cause shaking of heads. But the notion that Bach is quite emotionless has by now been discouraged, and Dr. Koussevitzky does not forget that his music always is a pattern of sound; indeed, as it flows from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of particularly beautiful sound.

Speculation is already heard as to what composer will be honored by Dr. Koussevitzky next season; for it is assumed that the annual festival plan will be continued. Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert, Bach—not many composers remain whose musical output would pass this test. Mozart, Strauss, Stravinsky? Perhaps Stravinsky is most likely to be favored, not merely because he is a Russian, but because his numerous styles offer sufficient variety for festival purposes, and because it would not be necessary to repair to the opera house in order to give him a fair representation.

Alternately, First Beauty, Then Tedium

The Symphony Concert Becomes Fifth Episode in The Bach Festival

IT WAS the twentieth matinée in the fiftieth series of Symphony Concerts. It was also the fifth concert in the first Bach Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The twain met yesterday at Symphony Hall, but did not quite synchronize. The discrepancy came about in this wise. "Rush-seats" and two "guest-seats" aside, every place on a Friday is taken by subscription. Nowadays there are few "rush-seats" and the waiting line soon exhausts them. Often the "guest-seats" are bespoken long in advance. Consequently the management has at disposal only such sittings as subscribers may give up by return of their tickets. On an occasion like yesterday they were bound to be few. Yet strangers to these conditions had come from New York, Washington and other cities resolved to attend the whole Bach Festival, disappointed if they missed so much as a single concert. They asked first politely, then insistently, for any available places. No explaining of the manners and customs of the Symphony Concerts would appease them. A courteous management distributed aid and comfort as best it might. Every one who had room to spare proffered it. At the end, few (as the psychologists say) were mal-adjusted. Just how calm succeeded confusion might make a pleasing footnote to the anniversary chapter in the forthcoming history of the Symphony Orchestra.

Even Bach, in his tomb through more than a century and three-quarters, did not escape the divisions of the day. In the first half of the concert he was composer for courts; in the second, composer for churches. The orchestral Suite in D major—the Suite of the celebrated and hackneyed air—began the afternoon. The Concerto in D minor for two violins with string orchestra followed. The venerable and learned compiler of the program-book affirmed that both "belonged to the happy Cöthen period." That is to say, they were written in the years (1717-23) when Bach, still a youngish man, was director, composer and performer of the music at the little court of the young Prince of Anhalt-Cöthen. . . . After intermission and from a later day came two Church Cantatas, written for St. Thomas's and St. Nicholas's at Leipzig. One, "Ich bin ein gute Hirt (No. 85), for a Sunday between Easter and Ascension, praised Jesus as the good Shepherd. The other, "O Ewigkeit" (No. 20), recited the eternal tortures of the damned; bade death-haunted sinners turn, while there was yet time, to salvation. Never before (some said) had Church Cantatas of Bach been sung at a Symphony Concert. With two more, to be heard this evening, they completed the festival epitome of the composer.

Though the devotees of Bach may resent the suggestion, possibly the Church Cantatas—save here and there the exceptions that prove the rule—are not for all who hear his other music gladly. When they are, and when they are not, works of genius, they were written equally for the services of Sundays and Feast-days in the Leipzig churches, with thought of no other place, time or purpose. Archæologists have reconstructed the ritual for us; but to throw back into it exacts a deal of historical imagination. The nineteen-thirties must, indeed, take the Church Cantatas as the nineteen thirties find them. Two hundred years on, the pieties of many a text wear an unlovely air. Bach, pressed with work, could not have been fastidious about them; in his devout self found the spur to composition. Usually the "sacred poetry" is pedestrian; the pious imagery commonplace. Sticky sentimentalities abound. A morbid preoccupation recurs—with death and judgment, salvation and damnation, eternal punishment and eternal fear. In these different days, the "poem" of "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort," depicting the tortures of hell, would be hideous were it not grotesque; while the good old New-England adjective, "wishy-washy," precisely describes the verses of "Ein gute Hirt." To some of us the Cantata-texts often affront the religious mind, the believing heart, the visioning spirit of the tone-poet of the Passions, the Magnificat and the Mass.

By the music in which Bach clothed them, the Church Cantatas live on to these latter days. Yet to some of us, declining the full lengths of the Bachian cult, that music is not altogether blameless, or at all times poignant, ecstatic, exalted. Often incessant and prescribed production formalizes it. The current festival has centred about the choral Bach of the Mass and the Magnificat. There are choral Cantatas, to be sure. But the capable chorus of the Bach Cantata Club had small share in the Cantatas of yesterday—three numbers out of thirteen; while those numbers were hardly deep-tinged with the contemplative or the apocalyptic Bach. Both "Ein gute Hirt" and "O Ewigkeit" were essentially music of recitatives and airs. Often the recitatives were conceived and written on the grand scale; swept forward spaciously and sonorously: exemplified Bach's ability to distill from a pale word graphic or rich or poignant musical delineation. The homely images of "The Good Shepherd" prompt him to contemplative airs for the alto and the tenor voice. His own pure pieties prompt as well, and he writes a music, for the tenor's "See what love has done" of an ineffable and changeless beauty. The alto air lags not too far behind.

Again, in "O Ewigkeit," the bass voice sings with both the humanity and the majesty of Bach visioning between time and eternity, warning mortality. Elsewhere the unbridgable gulf reopens between the ears of the nineteen-thirties and the Bachian air as stylistic formula. Much too often one finds one's self listening to the incipient or vivid delineation of the orchestral part, even when Mme. Matzenauer, Mr. Crooks or Mr. Gange is singing—and the two men-singers, yesterday, were remarkable. No doubt, these "solo" Cantatas were chosen as contrast to the choral masterpieces that had gone before. They were indeed of another quality, texture, inspiration. Inevitably they made less impression; left far less residue behind. There were even departures from the congregation—a forbidden thing at St. Thomas's or St. Nicholas's.

So it was that the Bach of the "happy Cöthen period" more prevailed yesterday afternoon—the Bach who composed for a little court, who, when the impulse came, wrote his virtuoso-pieces, between two quick movements setting a slow song charged with changeless beauty . . . or the frequenters of the whole festival it was as though they had gone on from the Brandenburg Concerto and the Piano-Concerto of Thursday evening to the orchestral Suite in D major and the Double Concerto of Friday afternoon. The Suite was familiar stuff, but the stuff that repetition warms anew. In a sense the air that has tempted so many arrangers still surprises when it is heard in place and in integrity between the overture and the dance-movements. Yes: Bach must wrote it and the freshness of these young and happy years exhales from it. Though Dr. Koussevitzky diminished the string choir, it pleased him to take the Suite in the grand style, with sonorities that might have shaken the little "residenz" at Cöthen; with stately or lively rhythms; with firm emphasis, with those sharp, sudden contrasts of pace that with Bach seem his recurring temptation. Hearing the strings, Bach and his Prince might have blessed the day. Their tone was beauty not to be challenged. Their bows, their fingers, their ears, were as sensitive as unanimous.

Next Mr. Burgin and Mr. Theodorowicz rose in their places at the first desk of the violins; played the Double Concerto in D minor, while the other strings, diminished to a chamber orchestra, accompanied them. The applause of familiar acquaintance and regard welcomed them. The applause of warm pleasure received and high merit re-discovered dismissed them. The quick movements for beginning and end are music of the virtuoso-Bach. The meetings and partings of the solo violins with the surrounding strings, the blendings and the contrastings of the violins with each other, interested his music-spinning mind, invited his manipulative craft. He writes as one who plays a game, expert, engrossed, in spirits. The two violinists took him at his word.

Between these exercises Bach sets the slow movement. Together and in alternation, the two violins discourse; while the other strings set in murmurous background. The double speech begins low; broadens, deepens, melts the form into itself; rises to the beauty that knows neither time nor place, change nor fashion, shapen yet bodyless, serene and exciting both; the beauty of musical sound that it is a poetry and an emotion in itself. It transfigured the two violinists; it glorified their instruments. For the while all the singing voices and all the church cantatas, the world over, might go hang.

H. T. P.

BACH CANTATAS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Concerto for Two Violins and D Major Suite Heard

GLOBE—MAR 28

The program of yesterday afternoon's concert in the Friday subscription series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was part of the current Bach Festival, though, except for the now sadly diminished number of rush seats, only season subscribers could hear the chosen numbers. These were the Suite in D major which includes the air arranged and often played "For the G string;" the concerto for two violins, and two of the church cantatas, Nos. 85 and 20.

The solo violinists were Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. The chorus was drawn from the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth conductor, a group of recent graduates of Harvard and Radcliffe, brought up in the Davisonian tradition of choral singing. The solo singers were as at the rest of the festival concerts Mmes Evans and Matzenauer, Messrs Crooks and Gange.

The Suite in D major, with which the concert began, was eloquently and brilliantly performed. Dr Koussevitzky's reading, as usual, proved an emotional and dramatic one. The great volume of tone from the strings, the rather thickened melodic line, the emphatic rhythmic stresses were characteristic of his method of interpreting not merely the music of Bach but that of other 17th and 18th century composers, Mozart alone excepted. Some might prefer a lighter, more delicate way of playing this old music. Its texture is perhaps thinner, its elegance of manner perhaps greater than Dr Koussevitzky believes. But there is no denying the effectiveness of such a performance as yesterday's, even though inner voices were sometimes blurred or obscured by the tonal mass.

Admirable Playing

Mr Burgin and Mr Theodorowicz distinguished themselves by their wholly admirable playing of the solo parts in the concerto for two violins. The largo, known to all musicians as one of the most melodious and emotional things Bach wrote, greatly pleased the audience. Here again, however, one wondered whether a more restrained, a chaster style than Dr Koussevitzky's might not be preferable. The two allegro movements, performed with great gusto and fluency, seemed hardly less delightful than the famous largo, if less obviously appealing.

The two church cantatas, "Ich bin ein Guter Hirt," No. 85; and "O Ewigkeit," No. 20, are proofs of the inexhaustible fertility of Bach's imagination. His position at Leipzig demanded the composition and the performance of hundreds of such works. Yet they never drop to the level of perfunctory routine work, and occasionally approach the sublimities of the "Matthew Passion" and the B minor Mass.

Yesterday, however, these cantatas made much less impression than the purely instrumental portion of the program. Only the chorales at the end, sung with admirable simplicity and sincerity by the Bach Cantata Club, redeemed them from a hint of perfunctoriness, even of dullness.

Perhaps the splendors of the Magnificat and the B minor mass, performed at earlier concerts in the Bach Festival, obscured the less potent appeal of these humbler choral pieces. But what one felt in listening was that the solo singers to whom most of the numbers in these cantatas are allotted, were not nearly as able as the instrumentalists in the orchestra.

Fine Tenor Voice

Mme Matzenauer was not yesterday in good voice. She had outdone herself in the B minor Mass and the Magnificat, and neither her tones nor her interpretations yesterday proved to have the memorable fervor she showed on those two recent occasions.

Miss Evans, whose voice is not of great volume, and whose style lacks distinction, sang many of her measures agreeably enough. Mr Gange suggested, as before, the baritone of the usual male quartet, or mixed quartet.

Only Mr Crooks of the four soloists did really well yesterday. He used his fine tenor voice with an admirable restraint, and, better than at the earlier concerts, conveyed the imaginative significance of his numbers.

It is a pity that a quartet of singers of an even and high level of excellence could not have been assembled for this festival. But where could such a group be found in America today?

The program for tonight's Symphony concert, also part of the Bach Festival, differs, by exception from that given yesterday. It includes the Fifth Brandenburg concerto; a group of piano solos to be played by Mr Borovsky, and two cantatas, "Christus lag in Todesbanden," and "Ein Feste Burg." The Festival ends with tomorrow's repetition of the B minor Mass.

P. R.

THIRD PROGRAM OF BACH FESTIVAL

Magnificat and Two Concertos Performed

GLOBE—MAR 27

The third program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach Festival, given last evening to an enthusiastic audience which filled Symphony Hall, included the Brandenburg Concerto in F, the piano concerto in D minor, and the Magnificat. Alexander Borovsky was the pianist. The chorus in the Magnificat was the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

The solo singers were Amy Evans, soprano; Adelle Alberts, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; and Fraser Gange, bass. In the Branlenburg Concerto, solo parts were played by the following members of the Boston Symphony: Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; and Georges Mager, trumpet. Dr Koussevitzky conducted.

The Brandenburg Concerto, familiar to the Boston Symphony audience, again severely tested the skill of the solo players, especially Mr Mager, who managed to play the notes of the almost impossible trumpet part successfully, though he failed to make the high notes agreeable in quality. The two allegro movements are ingratiating. The andante sounded rather thin with the harpsichord part omitted. As a harpsichord was used in the Magnificat, it seemed ill judged not to employ it here also.

Mr Borovsky's deft and graceful playing in the allegro movements of the piano concerto had the requisite fluency and delicacy. In the adagio a mistaken striving for expressiveness caused pianist and conductor to break the rhythm for overworking rubato effects. There were many recalls for the soloist.

The Magnificat, unheard here for many seasons, afforded the singers from Harvard and Radcliffe further opportunity to prove their skill in choral song. Again, as in the B minor Mass, the precision of attack, the purity and volume of tone, the sense of reserve power at the great climaxes were notable. The long florid phrases, fluently and accurately sung, the rhythmic vitality and imaginative energy back of the performance were amazingly impressive. This is great music, and last night the choruses in it were nobly performed.

Mme Matzenauer surprised the audience by singing one of the soprano solos, the air "Et exultavit," as well as those allotted by Bach to contralto. In the charming "Esurientes implevit," for contralto, the apparent spontaneity and the artistic sincerity of her singing, even more than its many technical virtues, delighted her hearers. She, and she alone among the soloists, seemed thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the music, and thoroughly familiar with its letter. The others often sang well, as Mr Crooks did, for instance in the air "Deposuit potentes." But they seemed self conscious and a bit complacent about it.

The great contralto's absorption in the music was obvious. She forgot herself completely, and let the music carry her onward and upward. Yet her singing was technically admirable, even when the music soared into the upper regions of her long range, where the years have begun to take their toll from her magnificent voice.

Dr Koussevitzky's readings of Bach have the personal quality, the dramatic force that distinguish his conducting of everything. In the absence of exact indications of tempi and of expression marks in the original scores of most of Bach, he is justified in using his own judgment rather than trying to follow a tradition never firmly established. Nobody can now say with assurance how Bach wanted his music to go. It is therefore enough when it is made expressive and impregnated with all the varying shades of feeling known to such a temperament as Dr Koussevitzky's. His Bach is exciting to hear. But it is also ennobling. The performances at this festival have been memorable triumphs for conductor, chorus, and orchestra.

The Symphony concerts this afternoon and tomorrow evening continue the Bach festival. It will end Sunday afternoon and evening with a repetition of the B minor mass.

P R.

SUN. HER. MAR. 29

MUSIC

BACH FESTIVAL

At Symphony hall, last night, occurred the 20th Saturday evening concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its program, differing from the occasion from that of the preceding afternoon's concert, was the fifth program of the current Bach festival. The co-operation of the Bach Cantata Club had once more been enlisted; and the following soloists were heard: Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Frazer Gange, bass. The program comprised the Easter Cantata No. 4, "Christ lag im Todesbanden," Brandenburg Concerto No. 5, in D (solo piano, Alexander Borovsky; violin, Richard Burgin; flute, Georges Laurent), four preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered Clavichord," book I (No. 16 in G minor, No. 5 in D major, No. 22 in B flat minor, No. 3 in C sharp major), and Cantata No. 80 "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott."

The most truly and deeply expressive measures of "Christ lag im Todesbanden" are perhaps those of the short orchestral introduction, the "Sinfonia," with its rich and mournful harmonies, the elegiac nobility and human grief of its melodic contours. It was played with noble beauty of string tone and a fine breadth of phrase. The cantata itself adheres too closely to the chorale tune for any close emotional correspondence to the text. Whether it is sung by the sopranos over a richly contrapuntal choral and instrumental accompaniment, as in the opening chorus, or made the subject of a fugue, or varied rhythmically or slightly embellished with ornaments, the tune preserves its integrity and imposes its mood even upon the Hallelujahs—which are surely among the saddest shouts of jubilation ever heard. But it is a solemn and splendid tune and the unity that it imparts to the cantata is impressive. Its tenderest variant is that of the exquisite duet for soprano and alto, "O'er Death no man could prevail." In general it is the magnificent and complex choruses that are the glory of this cantata. They were sung with admirable precision that had nothing in it of that almost military peremptoriness that so often accompanies choral precision. There was rather a gentle mood and timbre that reminded the hearer that this was after all devotional music and which reconciled him to a lack of brilliance where brilliance became occasionally desirable.

While "Christ lag" was never, so far as is known, intended to employ soloists and can be sung without, "Ein Feste Burg" has elaborate and florid solo parts and expressive recitatives, and occasionally wanders far from its justly famous chorale. It has appropriately virile choruses, some airs a little too elaborate or too vigorously illustrative to be thoroughly musical, but others that are of great beauty and range of expression. The beautiful bass recitative "Consider then" was excellently sung by Mr. Gange—who can be relied upon to sing intelligently always, and expressively, whenever his part is not too low or too fast. The first chorale, sung in unison, was (with the help of an inspired printer's error) translated in the program "If all the world with friends were filled. A host that would devour us . . . .

Miss Evans's voice seemed under better control than hitherto, and Mme. Matzenauer made the most of such opportunities as came her way. Mr. Crooks, a trifle throaty last night, did, however, some vigorous and spirited singing.

In the fifth Brandenburg concerto MM. Burgin and Laurent earned applause by their delightfully clean and sensitive playing of their important parts. Mr. Borovsky, a trifle too heavy at times for the delicate balance of the ensemble, played the extraordinarily elaborate (though musically uninteresting) clavier part with remarkable agility and with notably intelligent and tasteful musicianship. The orchestra as a whole, under Dr. Koussevitzky's alert direction, gave a most pleasing performance of this lively work.

Mr. Borovsky, very enthusiastically applauded for his work in the concerto, again won an extremely cordial demonstration of approval by his playing of a set of preludes and fugues. Always clear in his part playing, he was at his excellent best in the faster and lighter of these pieces—in the G major and C sharp major preludes and fugues—where he had grace and a light touch that was absent from the others, for Mr. Borovsky inclines at times to squareness. In response to the applause he added the C minor prelude and fugue, No. 2 of the First Book.

Today at 4:30 and 8:30 the mass in B minor will be repeated.

S. S.

Concerts

SUN. HER. MAR. 29

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Bliss Perry in his masterly address concerning Henry Lee Higginson as man and founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra reminded the audience last Wednesday that as in years past there were eminently respectable Bostonians who left the concert hall when music by Wagner was performed; later when music by Brahms was on the program.

Now when Stravinsky is represented some stay away, or, coming, squirm and fidget. But the audience of 1931 is more tolerant towards Stravinsky than when the "Sacre du Printemps" struck terror to their souls. There are contemporaneous composers, favored by Dr. Koussevitzky, who sorely vex the ultra-conservatives; some of these composers annoy even the more receptive; and one or two whose music has been played here this season are manifestly unworthy of seats at the table of the gods or of the smile of an embracing goddess.

The question is asked by everybody, What will be the future of the art?

Film "

FIFTH CONCERT OF BACH FESTIVAL

163

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOS. GLOBE MARCH 29

Back to Bach

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's great Bach Festival, the culmination of its 50th anniversary celebration ends today with a repetition of the B minor Mass, for the benefit of the pension fund of the orchestra. Symphony Hall is practically sold out for this concert, as it has been for the earlier ones. The B minor Mass will be repeated with the chorus and soloists heard last Tuesday in what proved a magnificent performance, the event of the musical season. The moment is therefore opportune to consider the present position of Bach's music. Boston audiences have heard little else during the week just ended

Ever since Mendelssohn and other German musicians of the early 19th Century rediscovered the unjustly neglected works of the great Bach there has been a belief spreading among musicians the world over that Johann Sebastian Bach is the greatest of all composers. It has now become a commonplace of musical criticism to speak of his works as sublime and unequalled. But until very lately the general public has not shared this enthusiasm for Bach's music.

The average 19th Century listener, brought up on Mendelssohn, Grieg, and lesser musical sentimentalists; and on Tchaikovsky, Liszt, and lesser writers of melodramatic music, found Bach's music "dry" "pedantic," "lacking in melody," save for a few arrangements of simple pieces such as the too celebrated "air for the G string," which is really not for the string at all but a movement from the suite in D for string orchestra.

It is perhaps fanciful to imagine a connection between modern American popular music and the increasing public appeal of the music of Bach, to which the attitude of audiences has in recent seasons borne witness.

Bach and Jazz

Yet almost everyone these days, whether he likes it or not, hears a good deal of "jazz," where a large part of the appeal is in the combination of several rhythms, in counterpoint, or at any rate, in polyphony of a sort. Gone are the bad old days when every popular piece was a sugary tune set above a squashy background of chords on the piano.

Bach's best work is polyphonic. It depends on the combination of melodies and rhythms, on the reiteration of rhythmic figures, just as jazz does. Sometimes Bach's rhythms have the syncopations so inevitable in jazz. Always his music sweeps along with the relentless continuity, the rhythmic urge one finds in jazz.

It is not, of course, to be asserted that Bach wrote jazz, or that any jazz is as good music as Bach at even his second best. All one claims is that jazz is less unlike Bach than were the popular song and dance tunes of 30 to 100 years ago.

Whatever the explanation may be, the fact is plain that the world over, audiences are following the younger generation of composers and performers back to Bach. Stravinsky's attempts to recreate in modern terms a style like Bach's have been often discussed in recent years, apropos of such works as his piano concerto and piano sonata. Nor is his an isolated instance.

After sounding alien to untutored ears for generations, Bach's music is coming to seem no stranger to ears brought up on jazz than would that of Schubert. Its undeniable power and majesty are now making themselves more easily felt by large audiences of amateurs than ever before since Bach's own day.

He came at the end of a period in musical history, so that even his own sons grew up to feel their father's works hopelessly old fashoned and out of date. Four of his many children became celebrated composers. No one of these sons wrote, or tried to write, in the manner their father had used. They were precursors of Mozart and Beethoven, not successors of Johann Sebastian Bach.

Dr Koussevitzky's glowingly eloquent interpretations of Bach at the festival now ending must have disabused hundreds of listeners of any notion that Bach's music is either dry or dull. It conveys every mood, grave and gay, with astonishing fidelity and imaginative power. But, a truce to verbal rhapsodies Go, listen to the music for yourself, and be convinced.

Music Notes and Comment

The novelty on the program of this week's Boston Symphony concerts is by the German composer, Paul Hindemith, a piece entitled "Konzertmusik," written for the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary, to be performed for the first time. It is good to find modern German music, as well as other modern schools, represented among the commissioned works.

There was much applause for the soloists.

The festival will end today with a repetition of the B-minor mass, given in aid of the pension fund of the orchestra.

Bach B-Minor Mass, Choral Perfection, Is Repeated Today

By Morris Hastings

Globe Mar 29

THE EVENT of the Bach Festival at Symphony Hall most to be admired and cherished is the performance of the B-minor Mass, a repetition of which will conclude the festival today.

With this majestic music the orchestra, chorus and soloists work rare wonders. The chorus of 300 voices, trained by Dr. Davison and Wallace Woodworth, attack the music with precision and enthusiasm, fairly "storming the high heavens."

In the "Crucifixus" this group feels deeply the sublime tragedy, the poetic pity of the music. The performance of it may well be taken as a lofty standard of choral singing by anyone.

Of the soloists' work one remembers best the fervent interpretations of Margarete Matzenauer, a magnificent mezzo-soprano who gives one more proof of her extraordinary musicianship by singing without a score.

Epitome of Devotion

Richard Crooks, an eminently reliable tenor, sings his solos with beautiful tone and reverence. Amy Evans, soprano, and Fraser Gange, bass, do what they can with the most ungrateful pages of the Mass.

Always one is aware of Doctor Koussevitzky's kindling touch, intensifying and poetizing the music until it soars upward in a very rhapsody of devotion.

Oddly enough, Bach did not originally write this score with the intention of making it a Mass. He composed it bit by bit to be sung and played during service in a church of which he was the cantor. Gradually his conception grew, he pieced together the musical fragments, added other necessary portions and moulded them into this gigantic and marvellously beautiful work.

As cantor of various churches, Bach was called upon to do an enormous amount of work. His first duties were, of course, to play the organ and conduct the choir during service. This meant, too, that he must put in many hours training the chorus—which was always small and not particularly musical—and orchestra, which was seldom superior to the choir.

Frequently music proper for the occasion was lacking; then, it was necessary for Bach to compose whatever was required. He did this with a few flips of his pen in an incredibly short time and with a genius so amazing that scholars poring over the scores with microscopes cannot find a single harmonic or structural fault.

Continued on Page 4, Col. 2

BACH MASS WILL BE REPEATED

Continued from Page 2

It is recorded that Bach composed the exultant and technically formidable "Hosanna" of this Mass in three days!

His salary for all this labor was incongruously small. For especial occasions, such as a funeral or wedding, he was given an extra fee. His emotion is quite understandable when he laments to a friend that the citizens of Weimar are far too healthy.

Out of this festival which Dr. Kossevitzky has prepared and performed for us, there emerges the magnificently full-rounded figure of Bach. We have heard the gravely tender poetry of his cantatas, the rich imagination of his concerti and organ music, the delightful fancies of his orchestral suites and his harpsichord pieces, and the staunch majesty and faith of his Mass.

We can only ask, was there ever a greater composer?

BACH CANTATAS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Concerto for Two Violins and D Major Suite Heard

GLOBE—MAR 28

The program of yesterday afternoon's concert in the Friday subscription series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was part of the current Bach Festival, though, except for the now sadly diminished number of rush seats, only season subscribers could hear the chosen numbers. These were the Suite in D major which includes the air arranged and often played "For the G string;" the concerto for two violins, and two of the church cantatas, Nos. 85 and 20.

The solo violinists were Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. The chorus was drawn from the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth conductor, a group of recent graduates of Harvard and Radcliffe, brought up in the Davisonian tradition of choral singing. The solo singers were as at the rest of the festival concerts Mmes Evans and Matzenauer, Messrs Crooks and Gange.

The Suite in D major, with which the concert began, was eloquently and brilliantly performed. Dr Koussevitzky's reading, as usual, proved an emotional and dramatic one. The great volume of tone from the strings, the rather thickened melodic line, the emphatic rhythmic stresses were characteristic of his method of interpreting not merely the music of Bach but that of other 17th and 18th century composers, Mozart alone excepted. Some might prefer a lighter, more delicate way of playing this old music. Its texture is perhaps thinner, its elegance of manner perhaps greater than Dr Koussevitzky believes. But there is no denying the effectiveness of such a performance as yesterday's, even though inner voices were sometimes blurred or obscured by the tonal mass.

Admirable Playing

Mr Burgin and Mr Theodorowicz distinguished themselves by their wholly admirable playing of the solo parts in the concerto for two violins. The largo, known to all musicians as one of the most melodious and emotional things Bach wrote, greatly pleased the audience. Here again, however, one wondered whether a more restrained, a chaster style than Dr Koussevitzky's might not be preferable. The two allegro movements, performed with great gusto and fluency, seemed hardly less delightful than the famous largo, if less obviously appealing.

The two church cantatas, "Ich bin ein Guter Hirt," No. 85; and "O Ewigkeit," No. 20, are proofs of the inexhaustible fertility of Bach's imagination. His position at Leipzig demanded the composition and the performance of hundreds of such works. Yet they never drop to the level of perfunctory routine work, and occasionally approach the sublimities of the "Matthew Passion" and the B minor Mass.

Yesterday, however, these cantatas made much less impression than the purely instrumental portion of the program. Only the chorales at the end, sung with admirable simplicity and sincerity by the Bach Cantata Club, redeemed them from a hint of perfunctoriness, even of dullness.

Perhaps the splendors of the Magnificat and the B minor mass, performed at earlier concerts in the Bach Festival, obscured the less potent appeal of these humbler choral pieces. But what one felt in listening was that the solo singers to whom most of the numbers in these cantatas are allotted, were not nearly as able as the instrumentalists in the orchestra.

Fine Tenor Voice

Mme Matzenauer was not yesterday in good voice. She had outdone herself in the B minor Mass and the Magnificat, and neither her tones nor her interpretations yesterday proved to have the memorable fervor she showed on those two recent occasions.

Miss Evans, whose voice is not of great volume, and whose style lacks distinction, sang many of her measures agreeably enough. Mr Gange suggested, as before, the baritone of the usual male quartet, or mixed quartet.

Only Mr Crooks of the four soloists did really well yesterday. He used his fine tenor voice with an admirable restraint, and, better than at the earlier concerts, conveyed the imaginative significance of his numbers.

It is a pity that a quartet of singers of an even and high level of excellence could not have been assembled for this festival. But where could such a group be found in America today?

The program for tonight's Symphony concert, also part of the Bach Festival, differs, by exception from that given yesterday. It includes the Fifth Brandenburg concerto; a group of piano solos to be played by Mr Borovsky, and two cantatas, "Christus lag in Todesbanden," and "Ein Feste Burg." The Festival ends with tomorrow's repetition of the B minor Mass.

P. R.

THIRD PROGRAM OF BACH FESTIVAL

Magnificat and Two Concertos Performed

GLOBE—MAR 27

The third program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach Festival, given last evening to an enthusiastic audience which filled Symphony Hall, included the Brandenburg Concerto in F, the piano concerto in D minor, and the Magnificat. Alexander Borovsky was the pianist. The chorus in the Magnificat was the Harvard Glee Club, Dr A. T. Davison, conductor; and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

The solo singers were Amy Evans, soprano; Adelle Alberts, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; and Fraser Gange, bass. In the Branlenburg Concerto, solo parts were played by the following members of the Boston Symphony: Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; and Georges Mager, trumpet. Dr Koussevitzky conducted.

The Brandenburg Concerto, familiar to the Boston Symphony audience, again severely tested the skill of the solo players, especially Mr Mager, who managed to play the notes of the almost impossible trumpet part successfully, though he failed to make the high notes agreeable in quality. The two allegro movements are ingratiating. The andante sounded rather thin with the harpsichord part omitted. As a harpsichord was used in the Magnificat, it seemed ill judged not to employ it here also.

Mr Borovsky's deft and graceful playing in the allegro movements of the piano concerto had the requisite fluency and delicacy. In the adagio a mistaken striving for expressiveness caused pianist and conductor to break the rhythm for overworking rubato effects. There were many recalls for the soloist.

The Magnificat, unheard here for many seasons, afforded the singers from Harvard and Radcliffe further opportunity to prove their skill in choral song. Again, as in the B minor Mass, the precision of attack, the purity and volume of tone, the sense of reserve power at the great climaxes were notable. The long florid phrases, fluently and accurately sung, the rhythmic vitality and imaginative energy back of the performance were amazingly impressive. This is great music, and last night the choruses in it were nobly performed.

Mme Matzenauer surprised the audience by singing one of the soprano solos, the air "Et exultavit," as well as those allotted by Bach to contralto. In the charming "Esurientes implevit," for contralto, the apparent spontaneity and the artistic sincerity of her singing, even more than its many technical virtues, delighted her hearers. She, and she alone among the soloists, seemed thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the music, and thoroughly familiar with its letter. The others often sang well, as Mr Crooks did, for instance in the air "Deposuit potentes." But they seemed self conscious and a bit complacent about it.

The great contralto's absorption in the music was obvious. She forgot herself completely, and let the music carry her onward and upward. Yet her singing was technically admirable, even when the music soared into the upper regions of her long range, where the years have begun to take their toll from her magnificent voice.

Dr Koussevitzky's readings of Bach have the personal quality, the dramatic force that distinguish his conducting of everything. In the absence of exact indications of tempi and of expression marks in the original scores of most of Bach, he is justified in using his own judgment rather than trying to follow a tradition never firmly established. Nobody can now say with assurance how Bach wanted his music to go. It is therefore enough when it is made expressive and impregnated with all the varying shades of feeling known to such a temperament as Dr Koussevitzky's. His Bach is exciting to hear. But it is also ennobling. The performances at this festival have been memorable triumphs for conductor, chorus, and orchestra.

The Symphony concerts this afternoon and tomorrow evening continue the Bach festival. It will end Sunday afternoon and evening with a repetition of the B minor mass.

P R.

SUN. HER. MAR. 29

MUSIC

BACH FESTIVAL

At Symphony hall, last night, occurred the 20th Saturday evening concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its program, differing from the occasion from that of the preceding afternoon's concert, was the fifth program of the current Bach festival. The co-operation of the Bach Cantata Club had once more been enlisted; and the following soloists were heard: Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Frazer Gange, bass. The program comprised the Easter Cantata No. 4, "Christ lag im Todesbanden," Brandenburg Concerto No. 5, in D (solo piano, Alexander Borovsky; violin, Richard Burgin; flute, Georges Laurent), four preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered Clavichord," book I (No. 16 in G minor, No. 5 in D major, No. 22 in B flat minor, No. 3 in C sharp major), and Cantata No. 80 "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott."

The most truly and deeply expressive measures of "Christ lag im Todesbanden" are perhaps those of the short orchestral introduction, the "Sinfonia," with its rich and mournful harmonies, the elegiac nobility and human grief of its melodic contours. It was played with noble beauty of string tone and a fine breadth of phrase. The cantata itself adheres too closely to the chorale tune for any close emotional correspondence to the text. Whether it is sung by the sopranos over a richly contrapuntal choral and instrumental accompaniment, as in the opening chorus, or made the subject of a fugue, or varied rhythmically or slightly embellished with ornaments, the tune preserves its integrity and imposes its mood even upon the Hallelujahs—which are surely among the saddest shouts of jubilation ever heard. But it is a solemn and splendid tune and the unity that it imparts to the cantata is impressive. Its tenderest variant is that of the exquisite duet for soprano and alto, "O'er Death no man could prevail." In general it is the magnificent and complex choruses that are the glory of this cantata. They were sung with admirable precision that had nothing in it of that almost military peremptoriness that so often accompanies choral precision. There was rather a gentle mood and timbre that reminded the hearer that this was after all devotional music and which reconciled him to a lack of brilliance where brilliance became occasionally desirable.

While "Christ lag" was never, so far as is known, intended to employ soloists and can be sung without, "Ein Feste Burg" has elaborate and florid solo parts and expressive recitatives, and occasionally wanders far from its justly famous chorale. It has appropriately virile choruses, some airs a little too elaborate or too vigorously illustrative to be thoroughly musical, but others that are of great beauty and range of expression. The beautiful bass recitative "Consider then" was excellently sung by Mr. Gange—who can be relied upon to sing intelligently always, and expressively, whenever his part is not too low or too fast. The first chorale, sung in unison, was (with the help of an inspired printer's error) translated in the program "If all the world with friends were filled, A host that would devour us . . .

Miss Evans's voice seemed under better control than hitherto, and Mme. Matzenauer made the most of such opportunities as came her way. Mr. Crooks, a trifle throaty last night, did, however, some vigorous and spirited singing.

In the fifth Brandenburg concerto MM. Burgin and Laurent earned applause by their delightfully clean and sensitive playing of their important parts. Mr. Borovsky, a trifle too heavy at times for the delicate balance of the ensemble, played the extraordinarily elaborate (though musically uninteresting) clavier part with remarkable agility and with notably intelligent and tasteful musicianship. The orchestra as a whole, under Dr. Koussevitzky's alert direction, gave a most pleasing performance of this lively work.

Mr. Borovsky, very enthusiastically applauded for his work in the concerto, again won an extremely cordial demonstration of approval by his playing of a set of preludes and fugues. Always clear in his part playing, he was at his excellent best in the faster and lighter of these pieces—in the G major and C sharp major preludes and fugues—where he had grace and a light touch that was absent from the others, for Mr. Borovsky inclines at times to squareness. In response to the applause he added the C minor prelude and fugue. No. 2 of the First Book.

Today at 4:30 and 8:30 the mass in B minor will be repeated.

S. S.

Concerts

SUN. HER. MAR. 29

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Bliss Perry in his masterly address concerning Henry Lee Higginson as man and founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra reminded the audience last Wednesday that as in years past there were eminently respectable Bostonians who left the concert hall when music by Wagner was performed; later when music by Brahms was on the program.

Now when Stravinsky is represented some stay away, or, coming, squirm and fidget. But the audience of 1931 is more tolerant towards Stravinsky than when the "Sacre du Printemps" struck terror to their souls. There are contemporaneous composers, favored by Dr. Koussevitzky, who sorely vex the ultra-conservatives; some of these composers annoy even the more receptive; and one or two whose music has been played here this season are manifestly unworthy of seats at the table of the gods or of the smile of an embracing goddess.

The question is asked by everybody, What will be the future of the art?

Film

FIFTH CONCERT OF BACH FESTIVAL

Alexander Borovsky Plays Preludes and Fugues

Mar 29 Globe

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach Festival in honor of Maj Henry Lee Higginson and of the orchestra's 50th anniversary continued at the regular subscription concert last evening. Because of the occasion, however, the program differed from that of the Friday afternoon concert.

There were two cantatas, the Easter "Christ lag in Todesbanden," and the one based on Luther's celebrated and justly loved hymn "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott." Alexander Borovsky, pianist, played four preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord"; No. 16, in G minor; No. 5, in D major; No. 22, in B flat minor, and No. 3, in C-sharp major. The fifth Brandenburg concerto completed the program.

In the concerto the solo parts were taken as follows: Mr Borovsky, piano; Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute. Mmes Matzenauer and Evans, and Messrs Crooks and Gange, were the soloists in the cantatas, which were sung in English. The choruses were sung by the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Wordworth, conductor.

Possibly in choral music more than in any other form does Bach amaze and arouse wonder at the never-ending variety of his harmonic effects, at the uncanny appropriateness of the musical mood for the text, and at the sweeping emotional intensity of his polyphony.

The "Easter" and the "Ein Feste Burg" cantatas are generally more fluent melodically, more conducive to dramatic emphasis, and emotionally moving than those—the "Good Shepherd," and "Eternity, thou Terrifying Word"—sung Friday afternoon.

The choruses were excellently sung by the splendidly trained young singers. Their work is about as fine as choral singing is apt to be, short of that of professional singers. Mme Matzenauer and Mr Crooks did the best work in the solos. Mr Gange's rather dry and labored style failed to make his part convincing. Miss Evans was not in good voice.

Mr Borovsky, at the conclusion of his group of piano pieces, was received with hand-clapping and stamping of feet that is rare indeed when it is awarded for playing of Bach.

His Bach never is dull; in rapid portions it is roundly and deeply toned, with all the parts deeply voiced. His superb sense of rhythm vitalizes the music, his feelings for variety and contrast supply nuance.

But in parts andante or slower he dwells upon sensuous tone until it becomes cloying; he invests Bach with romantic inflections that are too sugary. When one thinks of the bold melodic sweep and the classic smoothness of the more virile Bach, such sentimentalizing seems quite incongruous.

The Brandenburg concerto, splendid in its first movement, nevertheless impresses one listener as having dull spots in the latter two parts. Last evening it was performed impeccably. There was much applause for the soloists.

The festival will end today with a repetition of the B-minor mass, given in aid of the pension fund of the orchestra.

Bach B-Minor Mass, Choral Perfection, Is Repeated Today

By Morris Hastings

Globe Mar 29

THE EVENT of the Bach Festival at Symphony Hall most to be admired and cherished is the performance of the B-minor Mass, a repetition of which will conclude the festival today.

With this majestic music the orchestra, chorus and soloists work rare wonders. The chorus of 300 voices, trained by Dr. Davison and Wallace Woodworth, attack the music with precision and enthusiasm, fairly "storming the high heavens."

In the "Crucifixus" this group feels deeply the sublime tragedy, the poetic pity of the music. The performance of it may well be taken as a lofty standard of choral singing by anyone.

Of the soloists' work one remembers best the fervent interpretations of Margarete Matzenauer, a magnificent mezzo-soprano who gives one more proof of her extraordinary musicianship by singing without a score.

Epitome of Devotion

Richard Crooks, an eminently reliable tenor, sings his solos with beautiful tone and reverence. Amy Evans, soprano, and Fraser Gange, bass, do what they can with the most ungrateful pages of the Mass.

Always one is aware of Doctor Koussevitzky's kindling touch, intensifying and poetizing the music until it soars upward in a very rhapsody of devotion.

Oddly enough, Bach did not originally write this score with the intention of making it a Mass. He composed it bit by bit to be sung and played during service in a church of which he was the cantor. Gradually his conception grew, he pieced together the musical fragments, added other necessary portions and moulded them into this gigantic and marvellously beautiful work.

As cantor of various churches, Bach was called upon to do an enormous amount of work. His first duties were, of course, to play the organ and conduct the choir during service. This meant, too, that he must put in many hours training the chorus—which was always small and not particularly musical—and orchestra, which was seldom superior to the choir.

Frequently music proper for the occasion was lacking; then, it was necessary for Bach to compose whatever was required. He did this with a few flips of his pen in an incredibly short time and with a genius so amazing that scholars poring over the scores with microscopes cannot find a single harmonic or structural fault.

Continued on Page 4, Col. 3

BACH MASS WILL BE REPEATED

Continued from Page 3

It is recorded that Bach composed the exultant and technically formidable "Hosanna" of this Mass in three days!

His salary for all this labor was incongruously small. For especial occasions, such as a funeral or wedding, he was given an extra fee. His emotion is quite understandable when he laments to a friend that the citizens of Weimar are far too healthy.

Out of this festival which Dr. Kossevitzky has prepared and performed for us, there emerges the magnificently full-rounded figure of Bach. We have heard the gravely tender poetry of his cantatas, the rich imagination of his concerti and organ music, the delightful fancies of his orchestral suites and his harpsichord pieces, and the staunch majesty and faith of his Mass.

We can only ask, was there ever a greater composer?

DOWNWARD TREND IN BOSTON MARKET

Telephone and Lighting Shares Yield

Industrials and Railroads Are Lower —Elevated Holds Strong

The heavy situation in the general market found early reflection in the price trend on the Boston Stock Exchange in the week-end trading. Prices were off all the way to 3 points, but trading was not active. In the investments Shawmut ruled firm, while General Capital lost a point and Kreuger & Toll more than a point. Utility Hydro and Rails and United Founders lost fractions.

Georgian preferred and Jenkins had half-point gains in the specialties, while Hathaway "B" and National Service lost fractions. Woolen preferred lost more than a point in the textiles, with the common, Pacific Mills and Amoskeag dropping fractions. Swift was a fraction firmer in the packing shares. Stone & Webster lost a couple of points in the holding shares.

General Electric, Gillette and Warren Brothers were off a point or more in the industrials. Shoe Machinery and Union Twist Drill had fractional losses. There was little doing among the coppers, in which Quincy eased a fraction. North Butte was fairly active, holding well.

American Telephone was off three points and New England Telephone more than a point. Edison and Eastern Gas lost a point each. Pennsylvania dropped a fraction and New Haven more than a point in the rails. Boston Elevated continued strong, gaining half a point. Eastern Steamship lost half a point in the shippings and United Fruit two points.

WHAT STOCK MARKET DID

	Saturday	Friday
Number of advances	52	88
Number of declines	510	490
Stocks unchanged	117	137
Total issues traded	679	715

REPORT COPPER OFFERED AT 9¾ CENTS

NEW YORK, March 28 (A. P.)—Several hundred tons of copper were reported today in trade circles to have been offered by speculators for 9¾ cents a pound, delivered, in the domestic market.

The price is one-quarter of a cent under that at which custom smelters are quoting the metal and also a quarter of a cent under the level of 10.30

Bach Festival To Climax at Final Concerts

Two Cantatas and the Mass, Repeated at Heights, Crown the Whole

THE mistrustful elders who resent the addition of festivals to the program of the Symphony Orchestra—for no discoverable reason save that it alters the routine of their concert going—are at odds with two publics. On Saturday evening, as on Friday afternoon, the twentieth Symphony Concert was a part of the Bach Festival. Being such, it continued from a quarter past eight to a quarter of eleven —a record, the oldest frequenters said, for these occasions. Yet departures were few and applause, first, last and at every interval, of the heartiest. It persisted so long and generally after Mr. Borovsky had played four Preludes and Fugues from the first book of "The Well-Tempered Clavichord" that he was permitted to add another—a privilege that, within the longest memory, none but Mr. Paderewski and Mme. Sembrich had enjoyed before him. It was, indeed, an evening of enthusiasms—even for Church Cantatas.

What befell on Saturday was no more than prelude to what ensued on Sunday. At the Symphony Concert the subscribers approved with a loud voice the diversion into the festival scheme of one in the series. On Sunday, at two "sessions," a miscellaneous audience that stretched into the standing-room, clapped, stamped and shouted its excitement over a festival ended and brought to climax by a repetition of Bach's Mass in B minor. Four years ago, a performance of the Ninth Symphony closed the Beethoven Festival, to tumults of applause. A year ago, Brahms's Symphony in C minor concluded his festival, and the tumult was not less.

Last evening, for finis to the third festival, there was uproar. The audience rose in its place, or crowded along the aisles toward the stage, in a crescendo of approving noises. By two delegates, the assisting choirs from Harvard and Radcliffe handed a wreath to Dr. Koussevitzky; then busied themselves again with hands, feet and throats. The conductor led forward the solo-singers; joined to them Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth as conductors of the Cambridge choirs; called Mr. Burgin, for the orchestra, from his place. When these effusions had been prolonged and repeated, Dr. Koussevitsky appeared by himself. The shouts might have shaken the chandeliers. The severest cynic could not have mistrusted them. Above any of his predecessors he has widened and vitalized the Symphony Concerts.

The Bach of court-music, the Bach of house-music, the Bach of church-music divided the program on Saturday. The court-music was the fifth Brandenburg Concerto—for flute, violin, piano (nowadays), and accompanying strings. The purists deplored the substitution of a piano—with the lid raised—for the harpsichord, since the timbre of the old instrument is far more sympathetic to strings and to the music in itself. But they approved warmly Dr. Koussevitzky's reduction of the accompaniment to chamber dimensions. With no larger orchestra Bach—at the harpsichord—may have led a performance of this very Concerto before his Prince at Cöthen. It was pleasure also, in both the Brandenburg Concertos of the festival, to hear notable members of the orchestra in the solo-parts. In degree, Bach's little court-orchestra must have contained virtuosi. Ours at Symphony Hall deserved place in an anniversary occasion.

In this Fifth Concerto, Mr. Laurent played the flute-part with the technical flexibility and felicity, the bright, warm, free tone, the quick musical instinct, that familiarly distinguish him. Mr. Burgin, when he could be heard unclouded, was as fortunate with the violin-part. Through the middle movement, which is trio for the three solo-instruments, Mr. Borovsky—and the opened piano—tended to overbear the other two; while little by little his insistence imposed an over-slow pace. Nor, in the first movement, did he succeed too well with the long solo-interlude for the piano. What with scale-passages and other ornament, it is virtuoso rather than musical stuff; for that reason asks a lighter hand than the pianist laid upon it.

In itself, the Concerto easily withstood these mal-adjustments. The young Bach, giving rein to fancy, wrote the measures in which flute and violin playfully echo each other. The Bach of the graces, not the depths, of slow-unfolding song, shaped, polished and distributed the middle movement. The finale is a hearty tune, or rather two tunes, as brisk of rhythm and exuberant in contrasting flow as a court-composer might safely be. The greater Bach, the churchly Bach, has left too little room in our imaginations for the Bach who was virtuoso-composer, who wrote trifles with skill, fancy and gusto.

Five Preludes and Fugues—the "extra" counted along with the appointed numbers—represented the Bach of house-music. The amateurs and the pianists in the audience rose to them. Most, after their fashions, could play these pieces. In a festival on the grand scale their Bach had also come to hearing. Mr. Borovsky, after his manner, played them as one who takes thought; whereas another Bachian high-priest, occasionally heard in Boston, prefers them in the manner of improvisations. Mr. Borovsky also played them with a single-hearted devotion to purely musical effects—the entrance and the interplay of "subjects," meeting, parting and interweaving lines, rhythmic evenness or energy, sustained or graduated tone. Yet one and another of the chosen Preludes —and in degree the attached Fugues—are tone-poems in little as well as musical and technical patterns. On that score only Chopin's "Studies"—at their romantic distance—companion them. But on that score also, especially when Mr. Borovsky was light-fingered, Bach is quite able to speak for himself.

The Church Cantatas of Saturday vindicated, within the limits of the festival, Bach's reputation in the genre—perhaps with Luther aiding, since from his hymns came the text for both. The hymn-tune, indeed, haunts the whole of the Easter Cantata. "Christ Lay in Death's Dark Prison." It informs the preliminary "Sinfonia," brief, grave, sombre, mournful. It is infused into the succeeding airs and duets; it colors the middle chorus. So bound together, the whole Cantata advances from darkness into light, unified, cumulating, quasi-dramatic. Along the way, the orchestra does more than see-saw through accompanying figures. Often it is richer in matter and more significant of mood than the voices themselves. Yet these received such numbers as the duet for the women and the air for the tenor. In both Bach, the tone-poet, wrote music in which matter and feeling moved as one to a beauty that melted the barriers of ancient formula. No less the Bach of power shaped and filled the choruses; in sonorous amplitudes or poignant phrases was enlarging and illuminating the hymn-tune text. Conductor and orchestra sounded these grave intensities. As chorus the Bach Cantata Club finely measured and finely shaded them. The solo-singers were in the vein. The audience answered to Bach enkindled.

The second Cantata—"Ein' feste Burg"—or "A Stronghold Sure"—was of the ceremonial composer, marshalling his pomps of tone, deploying his florid airs, for the autumn festival with which Luther's church still commemorates his Reformation. The choruses march in the stark force of unison or the superbities of counterpoint. The recitatives are largely molded and richly intensified. The elaboration of the airs and duets is winged with rhapsody. The forward and upward sweep, the magniloquence and the magnificence of the whole carry all before them. The full Bach again, from resonant orchestra and striding chorus to the puissant declamation or the ecstatic periods of the solo-singers. Withal, the discovery that in the Bach Cantata Club the Symphony Orchestra has another fine-mettled chorus that in future may do it more service. This festal Bach for one place at least in his festival at a great orchestra's jubilee.

In the first performance of the Mass in B minor, the Harvard-Radcliffe Choirs were testing a year of work upon it—the schooling at the thorough hands of Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth; the familiarity that should bring confidence and certainty; the imparting, vitalizing impulse of Dr. Koussevitzky in the final rehearsals; their own reactions, singly and then collectively, to a music that at fullest almost transcends mortal ability. The experiences of last Tuesday reassured them. They could sing the choruses of the Mass with the mastery that is freedom. Consciously or subconsciously, they answered to the powers and glows within it, to every stimulating circumstance of a rare occasion. They not only sang Bach's music with free voice and concentrated minds. They were also possessed by it. Baptismal fires had descended upon them to heat the repetition.

Again the number and the energy of the young voices gave the choral singing body. They sang out and sang full. Again the youthful timbre of the tones generated a lustre and a clarity that were illumination. Again nothing daunted the mated choirs—neither Bach's phrases and periods; nor his contrapuntal and fugal devices; nor his rhythms and progressions; not even his ornament. However sustained, however varied, they heard with him, sang for him. They not only set out the choruses as composer wrote and conductor willed. They filled them also with Bach's vision. "And a voice came out of the throne saying Praise our God, all ye His servants, and ye that fear Him, both small and great. And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings. . . ."

What the poet of the Apocalypse heard, Bach sounded anew in his Mass. For the one visionary in his poetry; for the other in music, these young choirs now sang. Whether it swelled in the close of the Gloria, leaped up at "Resurrexit," outflung the Sanctus as from the hosts of earth and heaven; was hushed and mystified and awed at Incarnation and Crucifixion, it was choral singing unsurpassed at Symphony Hall in this generation, unmatched in these days in America in any performance of the B-minor Mass. . . . So also with the solo-singers, the single voices from the orchestra, the orchestra as a whole—all above themselves. Leader and animator, Dr. Koussevitzky had crowned the jubilee year, the festival to mark it, his own adventuring and accomplishing self.

H. T. P.

From Oldest to Newest

Margaret Matzenauer

Oftener than Any Other Singer, in Recent Years, She Has Appeared with the Boston Orchestra. Her Share in the Bach Festival, Ended Yesterday, and in the American Production, in 1928, of Stravinsky's "Œdipus Rex" Are the High Points in this Association

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, MARCH 30, 1931

MUSIC

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Bach's masterpiece, the B minor Mass, with which on Wednesday last the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Bach Festival, was repeated yesterday at its close in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. The performance was again divided into two portions of convenient length, the Kyrie and Gloria being sung in the afternoon, and the Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei in the evening. The intermission of some two hours and a half avoided overtaxing the voices of those who sing and the attention of those who listen; it insured a performance of more sustained excellence and an audience capable of enjoying it.

The chorus was, of course, again composed of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society (trained respectively by Dr. Davison and Mr. Wallace Woodworth); the soloists were Amy Evans, soprano, Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. Instrumental solos incidental to the score were played by Burgin, concertmaster; Boetcher, horn; M. M. Speyer and Devergie, oboe d'amore; Albert Snow was organist.

Under Dr. Koussevitzky's vivid and inspired direction the performance, by orchestra and singers alike, was one of overwhelming brilliance. From the sombre magnificence of the opening Kyrie Eleison to the exhilarating jubilance of the "Et Resurrexit," the soaring exaltation of the "Sanctus," and the impressive power of the final "Osanna" and "Dona Nobis Pacem," the singing of the Harvard and Radcliffe chorus was of the most stirring quality—fresh, ardent, alive, agile and full of movement. They could achieve a deep expressiveness, too, in the "Qui Tollis," in "Et Incarnatus," in the "Crucifixus," in the adagio section of the "Confiteor."

The soloists also sang excellently though theirs is a relatively small share in the mass. Mme. Matzenauer's expressive and technically admirable singing of her airs, especially the "Agnus Dei," again commanded admiration. Miss Evans's voice, though used with unequal skill, had at its best a very pleasing brightness. Mr. Crooks again used his fine voice with notable intelligence and beauty of tone, particularly in the "Benedictus," while Mr. Gange once more did excellent work in his two airs.

The sensitive work of those members of the orchestra who played the obbligati for violin, flute, horn and oboe d'amore added notably to the beauty of the airs in which they were employed.

The the close of the concert the audience that packed the hall expressed its delight in this great music and in the outstanding brilliance of its performance with an enthusiasm more tempestuous than any other demonstration of the kind within recent memory. Dr. Koussevitzky and the soloists, together with Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, who had so excellently prepared the choruses, were recalled again and again to receive thunderous applause. Dr. Koussevitzky, to whose devotion and enthusiasm the success of the festival just ended was so largely due, was presented with a large wreath by representatives of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, amid a storm of congratulatory noises to which the great throng of singers and players upon the platform added their quota. S. S.

A DESERVED TRIBUTE

It is a popular belief in this country that we can teach Europe almost everything about business but that we must take lessons from the Old World in all the arts. This is regarded as particularly true of anything connected with music.

The wild enthusiasm that came as a climax to the Bach Festival at Symphony Hall on Sunday night should do something to shatter this illusion. It was so spontaneous, so unrestrained, that it was difficult to believe that Boston was showing approval so whole heartedly. But it was deserved, for seldom can choral singing anywhere have come so near to perfection as in the two Sunday concerts of Bach's church music. It is easy to say that we cannot do this sort of thing in this country, but with the right leadership, like that of Dr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Davison, almost anything is possible. That was proved on Sunday.

Bach Festival Concluded

The Bach Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to a multisonous conclusion last night in Symphony Hall. The B minor Mass constituted the program. As at its performance last Tuesday, it was presented in two sections, afternoon and evening, with an interval for dinner. There was an ovation at the close, with floral compliments to Dr. Koussevitzky from the Harvard and Radcliffe choristers.

The fifth concert of the Festival, Saturday evening, coincided with the twentieth Saturday program of the regular subscription series. The items were the Easter Cantata No. 4, "Christ lag in Todesbanden"; the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto for solo piano, violin and flute; four Preludes and Fugues from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord," and the Cantata No. 80, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott."

The cantatas were sung by the Bach Cantata Club, and the vocal soloists were those of previous concert: Mmes. Evans and Matzenauer, Messrs. Crooks and Gange. The piano pieces were played by Alexander Borovsky, who also officiated, with Messrs. Burgin and Laurent, in the Brandenburg Concerto.

The chorus did well, and the vocal soloists gave a good account of themselves, but the instrumental pieces perhaps held the major interest of the evening. The Concerto was played with virtuosity by the soloists, and the orchestral contribution was up to the orchestra's standard. In the slow movement the soloists appeared to be attempting to lower Dr. Koussevitzky's record for slow tempi in adagios. This effect was due apparently to Mr. Borovsky, who seemed to be setting the pace for his associates. The result was not an unqualified success, for the listener never felt quite sure the next note would actually be realized in sound. The pianist was not similarly tempted in his solo pieces, which were played propulsively. There are pianists who produce a more ambrosial tone, but few who can set forth with such clarity the line and form of Bach's music.

L. A. S.

KOUSSEVITZKY GETS OVATION AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

WITH A REPETITION of the B minor Mass, for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Bach Festival at Symphony Hall came to a close.

Instead of describing this performance let us refer to the scope of this Festival, the extraordinary pains with which it was planned and the excellence of its accomplishment. For the first time in Boston we were able to hear within a week a fine variety and selection of the works of the great Johann Sebastian. Many of the compositions were masterpieces on a level never surpassed by mortal pen. None of them was without musical interest. The grandeur and the humanity of Bach were made evident to twentieth century ears.

No more fitting monument than this Festival, it seems to us, could have been erected in this Golden Jubilee year of the orchestra in honor of its founder and principal sustainer—Henry Lee Higginson. Many workers were responsible for this achievement. But it is natural to single out for especial praise the principal moving force behind the Festival, as the huge audience last night singled him out in the greatest demonstration we have ever heard or seen in Symphony Hall—the orchestra's conductor, Serge Koussevitzy.

Esta Cantor, soprano, was making her debut meanwhile before a friendly audience at Jordan Hall. To write about her on the basis of the few numbers of the excellent program which we were able to hear would do her an injustice, for she was palpably nervous. Later, according to reliable report, she disclosed a lyric voice of good quality, sound musicianship and interpretative skill.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

To Honor Henry Lee Higginson

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach Festival this week, the culmination of its celebration of its 50th season, is announced as in honor of Henry Lee Higginson. At the concert Wednesday evening Bliss Perry, formerly professor of English literature at Harvard and editor of the Atlantic Monthly, is to speak about Maj Higginson, whose biography he has so admirably written.

It would perhaps seem unnecessary to say much to Boston readers about a man whose memory is still cherished by thousands who never had any personal contact with him. But not long ago a young man in the Huntington av lobby of Symphony Hall was heard inquiring casually why a bust of Henry Lee Higginson should be there. Who, he asked, was this man Higginson?

The answer, given with a vehemence which surprised the inquirer, was, of course, that without Maj Higginson there could have been no Boston Symphony Orchestra and no Symphony Hall. Without Maj Higginson and the Boston Symphony it is very unlikely that the valiant efforts of such other pioneers of orchestral music in America as Theodore Thomas would have resulted in the founding and sustaining, in more than a dozen American cities of great orchestras, several of which now by common consent surpass any Europe has to show. No one man has achieved as much for the arts in America as Henry Lee Higginson.

The story of his achievement is, in outline, this. The details may be found in Bliss Perry's biography and in Mark Antony de Wolfe Howe's History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As a boy Henry Lee Higginson dreamed of becoming a musician. He hoped to be a composer, he meant to be a concert pianist. His family were about as sympathetic as the ordinary prosperous American family would still be, alas, with the boy's aspirations. Had he been a girl to study music seriously would have been permissable. But there was a family business which in the natural course of events Henry Lee Higginson should prepare to enter.

Dreams Come True

The young man persevered, however, and went, with the consent of his family, to Vienna to study piano and composition. An accident to one of his fingers ruined his prospects as a concert pianist. He soon discovered that he had no genius as a composer. But while in Vienna he was enthralled by the great orchestra there. Nothing at all like it then existed in America, of course. Until the founding of the Boston Symphony all American orchestras were of the general type of the People's Symphony in Boston today, or the Manhattan Orchestra in New York, admirable enough after their fashion, but not in the class with the Vienna Philharmonic.

Young Higginson gave up his dream of becoming a musician, came home, served arduously and with distinction in the Civil War, tried unsuccessfully to become a planter in the South, and in the end went into the family banking house. His dream now took a new shape. If he could make enough money, he would found in Boston an orchestra comparable in its standards of program and performance to the best in Europe.

Chance made the attempt possible sooner than he had hoped. His brother-in-law, Alexander Agassiz, came back from a prospecting trip in Northern Michigan wildly enthusiastic about a copper mine, formed a company to develop it, and Henry Lee Higginson, with no faith in the mine, took a number of shares at an almost nominal price, out of family feeling. The name of this mine was the Calumet & Hecla. Its success is one of the fabulous order.

In 1881 the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its career. Maj Higginson, its founder, was for 36 seasons its sole sustainer. In payment of its annual deficits he spent during that time nearly a million dollars. When he died he left an estate reported in the newspapers to have been about $2,000,000 only. These figures prove that to him the orchestra was more than just a charity that he contributed to. It was his life work, the fulfillment of his boyish dreams. He lived to hear it under Dr Karl Muck, acknowledged by all as the best orchestra the world has yet heard.

Then, as an incident of the most tragic of all wars, there came what to Maj Higginson seemed the ruin of all his work. The real story of the arrest of Dr Muck has never yet been published, nor is this the time or the place to print it.

Farewell Address

At the final Boston Symphony concert in the Saturday evening series, for the year 1917-18 the program books contained a slip stating that at the end of the concert Maj Higginson would speak. Dr Muck, of course, was at Fort Oglethorpe, interned, rightly or wrongly, as an enemy alien. The German subjects in the orchestra had all been dropped. Their contracts had not been renewed. The assistant conductor, Mr Schmidt, had conducted.

After the last notes of the last piece had been played, Maj Higginson walked from his usual place on the floor to the stage. The entire audience and the orchestra stood up, and remained standing through his brief speech of farewell. Helped up the steps to the stage by two ushers, he paused a moment, with sagging shoulders, an old and broken man. But when he spoke his voice carried clearly to the rear of the second balcony, as the present writer well remembers. His words were aptly chosen, and no hint of vehemence or of self pity marred them.

He had, he said, intended to give up the orchestra, since he believed it impossible under existing circumstances to carry it on worthily. But he had been persuaded, against his own judgment, to allow others to carry it on. Henceforth he had no connection with it. To his successors he extended his best wishes. The players and the audience he thanked for their friendliness through many seasons.

Under his successors, the present board of trustees, the Boston Symphony has now, after prolonged vicissitudes regained something like its former proud position. It is again unsurpassed in the world, thanks largely to Mr Monteux and to Dr Koussevitzky. But this success like the earlier one has been achieved on the lines laid down by Maj Higginson, and now imitated by the other principal American orchestras.

A Free Hand

His way was to engage the best musician he could obtain as conductor, tell him to engage the best players to be had for the orchestra, putting in their contracts a clause binding them to give the orchestra first claim to their services, so that no outside engagement can ever interfere with their attendance at a rehearsal or a concert. The conductor was given a free hand about the programs, told only to perform the best music of all schools and periods as well as he could get it performed.

Maj Higginson never interfered in the details of choice of players, soloists, or programs. He provided the financial backing, paying the deficits, and assuming sole responsibility for them. There was never any expectation that the Boston Symphony concerts should show a profit. Their standards, unlike those of American opera companies, are in no way dictated by the box office.

By way of footnote let us recall a little incident from the early history of the Symphony concerts, to show what manner of man Maj Higginson was.

The first time that a piano appeared on a Symphony concert program Maj Higginson, arriving at the hall early, discovered that the piano on the stage bore a big sign on the side of it, making the name of the manufacturer visible to all. This had long been a custom in Boston concert halls. It is still sometimes done in other cities.

Maj Higginson gave orders that this sign be removed, as beneath the artistic dignity of the Symphony concerts. The representative of the piano company said that he would remove the piano if the sign were disturbed. Whereupon the Major remarked "Very well, we will change the program and omit the piano concerto." Needless to add, the sign and not the piano was removed, and it never again appeared at a Symphony concert. It is thanks to Maj Higginson that this petty abuse long since vanished from all Boston concert halls.

Programs of the Week

BACH FESTIVAL, in memory of Henry Lee Higginson.

SYMPHONY HALL, Tuesday, at 4:30 and 8:30. B minor Mass, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Wednesday, March 25, at 8:30—Organ: Fantasia in C minor; Adagio (from the Toccata in C major); Fugue in C major (Wallace Goodrich). Address: "Henry L. Higginson" (Bliss Perry). Harpsichord: Prelude and Fugue, Fantasia, Italian Concerto (Mme Patorni-Casadesus). Organ: Chorale-prelude, "Schmucke dich, O liebe Seele," Fugue in G minor (Wallace Goodrich).

Thursday, March 26, at 8:30—Brandenburg Concerto No. 2, (Solo violin—Richard Burgin; Flute—Georges Laurent; Oboe—Ferdinand Gillett; Trumpet—Georges Mager) Piano Concerto in D miner (Alexander Borovsky). Magnificat (chorus, orchestra and soloists).

Friday, March 27, at 2:30—Suite for Orchestra, No. 3; Concerto for Two Violins (Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz); Cantata, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt"; Cantata, "O. Ewigkeit."

Saturday, March 28, at 8:15—Cantata, "Christ Lag in a Tobesbanden"; Brandenburg Concerto, No. 5 (Solo piano, Alexander Borovsky; Violin, Richard Burgin; Flute, Georges Laurent); Preludes and Fugues from "The Well-tempered Clavichord" (Alexander Borovsky); Cantata, "Ein feste Burg."

Sunday, March 29, at 4:30 and at 8:30—Mass in B minor (repeated).

Music Notes and Comment

The Bach Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the culminating event of its present 50th anniversary year, and the outstanding feature of the Boston musical season comes this week. But, despite the obvious limitations of newspaper space for musical reviews, and of the public for concerts in this city, two young pianists are to make their local debuts on two of the evenings of the festival. No doubt they and their respective managements wish chiefly to please personal friends of the performers, who are the only dependable public for most debuts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give on six successive days beginning next Tuesday, a Bach Festival in Symphony Hall to honor the memory of Henry L. Higginson, its founder, on this, the orchestra's 50th anniversary. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will appear in the Mass in B minor which is to open the Festival, and also to close it, as a Pension Fund concert, on Sunday, March 29th, and likewise in the Magnificat on Thursday. The Bach Cantata Club will give four cantatas at the Friday and Saturday concerts which are part of the regular series. In all five of these concerts, the vocal quartet consisting of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone, will be heard. Adelle Alberts will take the second soprano part in the Mass. Since the Mass takes three hours to perform, it will be given on each day in two parts, from 4:30 to 6, and from 8:30 until 10.

Alexander Borovsky, famous in Europe as a Bach interpreter, has arrived in Boston to appear in two performances, and Mme Patorni-Casadesus has likewise come from Europe especially to play the Harpsichord on Wednesday evening, which is dedicated to the memory of Henry L. Higginson. Prof Bliss Perry of Harvard, Mr Higginson's biographer and one of his close friends, will give an address on Wednesday evening, when Wallace Goodrich will play organ music of Bach.

Bach Festival To Climax at Final Concerts

Two Cantatas and the Mass, Repeated at Heights, Crown the Whole

THE mistrustful elders who resent the addition of festivals to the program of the Symphony Orchestra—for no discoverable reason save that it alters the routine of their concert going—are at odds with two publics. On Saturday evening, as on Friday afternoon, the twentieth Symphony Concert was a part of the Bach Festival. Being such, it continued from a quarter past eight to a quarter of eleven —a record, the oldest frequenters said, for these occasions. Yet departures were few and applause, first, last and at every interval, of the heartiest. It persisted so long and generally after Mr. Borovsky had played four Preludes and Fugues from the first book of "The Well-Tempered Clavichord" that he was permitted to add another—a privilege that, within the longest memory, none but Mr. Paderewski and Mme. Sembrich had enjoyed before him. It was, indeed, an evening of enthusiasms—even for Church Cantatas.

What befell on Saturday was no more than prelude to what ensued on Sunday. At the Symphony Concert the subscribers approved with a loud voice the diversion into the festival scheme of one in the series. On Sunday, at two "sessions," a miscellaneous audience that stretched into the standing-room, clapped, stamped and shouted its excitement over a festival ended and brought to climax by a repetition of Bach's Mass in B minor. Four years ago, a performance of the Ninth Symphony closed the Beethoven Festival, to tumults of applause. A year ago, Brahms's Symphony in C minor concluded his festival, and the tumult was not less.

Last evening, for finis to the third festival, there was uproar. The audience rose in its place, or crowded along the aisles toward the stage, in a crescendo of approving noises. By two delegates, the assisting choirs from Harvard and Radcliffe handed a wreath to Dr. Koussevitzky; then busied themselves again with hands, feet and throats. The conductor led forward the solo-singers; joined to them Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth as conductors of the Cambridge choirs; called Mr. Burgin, for the orchestra, from his place. When these effusions had been prolonged and repeated, Dr. Koussevitsky appeared by himself. The shouts might have shaken the chandeliers. The severest cynic could not have mistrusted them. Above any of his predecessors he has widened and vitalized the Symphony Concerts.

The Bach of court-music, the Bach of house-music, the Bach of church-music divided the program on Saturday. The court-music was the fifth Brandenburg Concerto—for flute, violin, piano (nowadays), and accompanying strings. The purists deplored the substitution of a piano—with the lid raised—for the harpsichord, since the timbre of the old instrument is far more sympathetic to strings and to the music in itself. But they approved warmly Dr. Koussevitzky's reduction of the accompaniment to chamber dimensions. With no larger orchestra Bach—at the harpsichord—may have led a performance of this very Concerto before his Prince at Cöthen. It was pleasure also, in both the Brandenburg Concertos of the festival, to hear notable members of the orchestra in the solo-parts. In degree, Bach's little court-orchestra must have contained virtuosi. Ours at Symphony Hall deserved place in an anniversary occasion.

In this Fifth Concerto, Mr. Laurent played the flute-part with the technical flexibility and felicity, the bright, warm, free tone, the quick musical instinct, that familiarly distinguish him. Mr. Burgin, when he could be heard unclouded, was as fortunate with the violin-part. Through the middle movement, which is trio for the three solo-instruments, Mr. Borovsky—and the opened piano—tended to overbear the other two; while little by little his insistence imposed an over-slow pace. Nor, in the first movement, did he succeed too well with the long solo-interlude for the piano. What with scale-passages and other ornament, it is virtuoso rather than musical stuff; for that reason asks a lighter hand than the pianist laid upon it.

In itself, the Concerto easily withstood these mal-adjustments. The young Bach, giving rein to fancy, wrote the measures in which flute and violin playfully echo each other. The Bach of the graces, not the depths, of slow-unfolding song, shaped, polished and distributed the middle movement. The finale is a hearty tune, or rather two tunes, as brisk of rhythm and exuberant in contrasting flow as a court-composer might safely be. The greater Bach, the churchly Bach, has left too little room in our imaginations for the Bach who was virtuoso-composer, who wrote trifles with skill, fancy and gusto.

Five Preludes and Fugues—the "extra" counted along with the appointed numbers—represented the Bach of house-music. The amateurs and the pianists in the audience rose to them. Most, after their fashions, could play these pieces. In a festival on the grand scale their Bach had also come to hearing. Mr. Borovsky, after his manner, played them as one who takes thought; whereas another Bachian high-priest, occasionally heard in Boston, prefers them in the manner of improvisations. Mr. Borovsky also played them with a single-hearted devotion to purely musical effects—the entrance and the interplay of "subjects," meeting, parting and interweaving lines, rhythmic evenness or energy, sustained or graduated tone. Yet one and another of the chosen Preludes —and in degree the attached Fugues—are tone-poems in little as well as musical and technical patterns. On that score only Chopin's "Studies"—at their romantic distance—companion them. But on that score also, especially when Mr. Borovsky was light-fingered, Bach is quite able to speak for himself.

The Church Cantatas of Saturday vindicated, within the limits of the festival, Bach's reputation in the genre—perhaps with Luther aiding, since from his hymns came the text for both. The hymn-tune, indeed, haunts the whole of the Easter Cantata, "Christ Lay in Death's Dark Prison." It informs the preliminary "Sinfonia," brief, grave, sombre, mournful. It is infused into the succeeding airs and duets; it colors the middle chorus. So bound together, the whole Cantata advances from darkness into light, unified, cumulating, quasi-dramatic. Along the way, the orchestra does more than see-saw through accompanying figures. Often it is richer in matter and more significant of mood than the voices themselves. Yet these received such numbers as the duet for the women and the air for the tenor. In both Bach, the tone-poet, wrote music in which matter and feeling moved as one to a beauty that melted the barriers of ancient formula. No less the Bach of power shaped and filled the choruses; in sonorous amplitudes or poignant phrases was enlarging and illuminating the hymn-tune text. Conductor and orchestra sounded these grave intensities. As chorus the Bach Cantata Club finely measured and finely shaded them. The solo-singers were in the vein. The audience answered to Bach enkindled.

The second Cantata—"Ein' feste Burg"—or "A Stronghold Sure"—was of the ceremonial composer, marshalling his pomps of tone, deploying his florid airs, for the autumn festival with which Luther's church still commemorates his Reformation. The choruses march in the stark force of unison or the superbities of counterpoint. The recitatives are largely molded and richly intensified. The elaboration of the airs and duets is winged with rhapsody. The forward and upward sweep, the magniloquence and the magnificence of the whole carry all before them. The full Bach again, from resonant orchestra and striding chorus to the puissant declamation or the ecstatic periods of the solo-singers. Withal, the discovery that in the Bach Cantata Club the Symphony Orchestra has another fine-mettled chorus that in future may do it more service. This festal Bach for one place at least in his festival at a great orchestra's jubilee.

In the first performance of the Mass in B minor, the Harvard-Radcliffe Choirs were testing a year of work upon it—the schooling at the thorough hands of Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth; the familiarity that should bring confidence and certainty; the imparting, vitalizing impulse of Dr. Koussevitzky in the final rehearsals; their own reactions, singly and then collectively, to a music that at fullest almost transcends mortal ability. The experiences of last Tuesday reassured them. They could sing the choruses of the Mass with the mastery that is freedom. Consciously or subconsciously, they answered to the powers and glows within it, to every stimulating circumstance of a rare occasion. They not only sang Bach's music with free voice and concentrated minds. They were also possessed by it. Baptismal fires had descended upon them to heat the repetition

Again the number and the energy of the young voices gave the choral singing body. They sang out and sang full. Again the youthful timbre of the tones generated a lustre and a clarity that were illumination. Again nothing daunted the mated choirs—neither Bach's phrases and periods; nor his contrapuntal and fugal devices; nor his rhythms and progressions; not even his ornament. However sustained, however varied, they heard with him, sang for him. They not only set out the choruses as composer wrote and conductor willed. They filled them also with Bach's vision. "And a voice came out of the throne saying Praise our God, all ye His servants, and ye that fear Him, both small and great. And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings. . . ."

What the poet of the Apocalypse heard, Bach sounded anew in his Mass. For the one visionary in his poetry; for the other in music, these young choirs now sang. Whether it swelled in the close of the Gloria, leaped up at "Resurrexit," outflung the Sanctus as from the hosts of earth and heaven; was hushed and mystified and awed at Incarnation and Crucifixion, it was choral singing unsurpassed at Symphony Hall in this generation, unmatched in these days in America in any performance of the B-minor Mass. . . . So also with the solo-singers, the single voices from the orchestra, the orchestra as a whole—all above themselves. Leader and animator, Dr. Koussevitzky had crowned the jubilee year, the festival to mark it, his own adventuring and accomplishing self. H. T. P.

From Oldest to Newest

Margaret Matzenauer

Oftener than Any Other Singer, in Recent Years, She Has Appeared with the Boston Orchestra. Her Share in the Bach Festival, Ended Yesterday, and in the American Production, in 1928, of Stravinsky's "Œdipus Rex" Are the High Points in this Association

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, MARCH 30, 1931

30 Eve. Mar 30

MUSIC

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Bach's masterpiece, the B minor Mass, with which on Wednesday last the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Bach Festival, was repeated yesterday at its close in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. The performance was again divided into two portions of convenient length, the Kyrie and Gloria being sung in the afternoon, and the Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei in the evening. The intermission of some two hours and a half avoided overtaxing the voices of those who sing and the attention of those who listen; it insured a performance of more sustained excellence and an audience capable of enjoying it.

The chorus was, of course, again composed of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society (trained respectively by Dr. Davison and Mr. Wallace Woodworth); the soloists were Amy Evans, soprano, Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. Instrumental solos incidental to the score were played by Burgin, concertmaster; Boetcher, horn; M. M. Speyer and Devergie, oboe d'amore; Albert Snow was organist.

Under Dr. Koussevitzky's vivid and inspired direction the performance, by orchestra and singers alike, was one of overwhelming brilliance. From the sombre magnificence of the opening Kyrie Eleison to the exhilarating jubilance of the "Et Resurrexit," the soaring exaltation of the "Sanctus," and the impressive power of the final "Osanna" and "Dona Nobis Pacem," the singing of the Harvard and Radcliffe chorus was of the most stirring quality—fresh, ardent, alive, agile and full of movement. They could achieve a deep expressiveness, too, in the "Qui Tollis," in "Et Incarnatus," in the "Crucifixus," in the adagio section of the "Confiteor."

The soloists also sang excellently though theirs is a relatively small share in the mass. Mme. Matzenauer's expressive and technically admirable singing of her airs, especially the "Agnus Dei," again commanded admiration. Miss Evans's voice, though used with unequal skill, had at its best a very pleasing brightness. Mr. Crooks again used his fine voice with notable intelligence and beauty of tone, particularly in the "Benedictus," while Mr. Gange once more did excellent work in his two airs.

The sensitive work of those members of the orchestra who played the obbligati for violin, flute, horn and oboe d'amore added notably to the beauty of the airs in which they were employed.

The the close of the concert the audience that packed the hall expressed its delight in this great music and in the outstanding brilliance of its performance with an enthusiasm more tempestuous than any other demonstration of the kind within recent memory. Dr. Koussevitzky and the soloists, together with Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, who had so excellently prepared the choruses, were recalled again and again to receive thunderous applause. Dr. Koussevitzky, to whose devotion and enthusiasm the success of the festival just ended was so largely due, was presented with a large wreath by representatives of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, amid a storm of congratulatory noises to which the great throng of singers and players upon the platform added their quota. S. S.

Post Mar 31

A DESERVED TRIBUTE

It is a popular belief in this country that we can teach Europe almost everything about business but that we must take lessons from the Old World in all the arts. This is regarded as particularly true of anything connected with music.

The wild enthusiasm that came as a climax to the Bach Festival at Symphony Hall on Sunday night should do something to shatter this illusion. It was so spontaneous, so unrestrained, that it was difficult to believe that Boston was showing approval so whole heartedly. But it was deserved, for seldom can choral singing anywhere have come so near to perfection as in the two Sunday concerts of Bach's church music. It is easy to say that we cannot do this sort of thing in this country, but with the right leadership, like that of Dr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Davison, almost anything is possible. That was proved on Sunday.

Music
Monitor Mar 30

Bach Festival Concluded

The Bach Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to a multisonous conclusion last night in Symphony Hall. The B minor Mass constituted the program. As at its performance last Tuesday, it was presented in two sections, afternoon and evening, with an interval for dinner. There was an ovation at the close, with floral compliments to Dr. Koussevitzky from the Harvard and Radcliffe choristers.

The fifth concert of the Festival, Saturday evening, coincided with the twentieth Saturday program of the regular subscription series. The items were the Easter Cantata No. 4, "Christ lag in Todesbanden"; the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto for solo piano, violin and flute; four Preludes and Fugues from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord," and the Cantata No. 80, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott."

The cantatas were sung by the Bach Cantata Club, and the vocal soloists were those of previous concert: Mmes. Evans and Matzenauer, Messrs. Crooks and Gange. The piano pieces were played by Alexander Borovsky, who also officiated, with Messrs. Burgin and Laurent, in the Brandenburg Concerto.

The chorus did well, and the vocal soloists gave a good account of themselves, but the instrumental pieces perhaps held the major interest of the evening. The Concerto was played with virtuosity by the soloists, and the orchestral contribution was up to the orchestra's standard. In the slow movement the soloists appeared to be attempting to lower Dr. Koussevitzky's record for slow tempi in adagios. This effect was due apparently to Mr. Borovsky, who seemed to be setting the pace for his associates. The result was not an unqualified success, for the listener never felt quite sure the next note would actually be realized in sound. The pianist was not similarly tempted in his solo pieces, which were played propulsively. There are pianists who produce a more ambrosial tone, but few who can set forth with such clarity the line and form of Bach's music. L. A. S.

Herald Mar 30

KOUSSEVITZKY GETS OVATION AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

WITH A REPETITION of the B minor Mass, for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Bach Festival at Symphony Hall came to a close.

Instead of describing this performance let us refer to the scope of this Festival, the extraordinary pains with which it was planned and the excellence of its accomplishment. For the first time in Boston we were able to hear within a week a fine variety and selection of the works of the great Johann Sebastian. Many of the compositions were masterpieces on a level never surpassed by mortal pen. None of them was without musical interest. The grandeur and the humanity of Bach were made evident to twentieth century ears.

No more fitting monument than this Festival, it seems to us, could have been erected in this Golden Jubilee year of the orchestra in honor of its founder and principal sustainer—Henry Lee Higginson. Many workers were responsible for this achievement. But it is natural to single out for especial praise the principal moving force behind the Festival, as the huge audience last night singled him out in the greatest demonstration we have ever heard or seen in Symphony Hall—the orchestra's conductor, Serge Koussevitzy.

Esta Cantor, soprano, was making her debut meanwhile before a friendly audience at Jordan Hall. To write about her on the basis of the few numbers of the excellent program which we were able to hear would do her an injustice, for she was palpably nervous. Later, according to reliable report, she disclosed a lyric voice of good quality, sound musicianship and interpretative skill.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Globe Mar 27

To Honor Henry Lee Higginson

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach Festival this week, the culmination of its celebration of its 50th season, is announced as in honor of Henry Lee Higginson. At the concert Wednesday evening Bliss Perry, formerly professor of English literature at Harvard and editor of the Atlantic Monthly, is to speak about Maj Higginson, whose biography he has so admirably written.

It would perhaps seem unnecessary to say much to Boston readers about a man whose memory is still cherished by thousands who never had any personal contact with him. But not long ago a young man in the Huntington av lobby of Symphony Hall was heard inquiring casually why a bust of Henry Lee Higginson should be there. Who, he asked, was this man Higginson?

The answer, given with a vehemence which surprised the inquirer, was, of course, that without Maj Higginson there could have been no Boston Symphony Orchestra and no Symphony Hall. Without Maj Higginson and the Boston Symphony it is very unlikely that the valiant efforts of such other pioneers of orchestral music in America as Theodore Thomas would have resulted in the founding and sustaining, in more than a dozen American cities of great orchestras, several of which now by common consent surpass any Europe has to show. No one man has achieved as much for the arts in America as Henry Lee Higginson.

The story of his achievement is, in outline, this. The details may be found in Bliss Perry's biography and in Mark Antony de Wolfe Howe's History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As a boy Henry Lee Higginson dreamed of becoming a musician. He hoped to be a composer, he meant to be a concert pianist. His family were about as sympathetic as the ordinary prosperous American family would still be, alas, with the boy's aspirations. Had he been a girl to study music seriously would have been permissable. But there was a family business which in the natural course of events Henry Lee Higginson should prepare to enter.

Dreams Come True

The young man persevered, however, and went, with the consent of his family, to Vienna to study piano and composition. An accident to one of his fingers ruined his prospects as a concert pianist. He soon discovered that he had no genius as a composer. But while in Vienna he was enthralled by the great orchestra there. Nothing at all like it then existed in America, of course. Until the founding of the Boston Symphony all American orchestras were of the general type of the People's Symphony in Boston today, or the Manhattan Orchestra in New York, admirable enough after their fashion, but not in the class with the Vienna Philharmonic.

Young Higginson gave up his dream of becoming a musician, came home, served arduously and with distinction in the Civil War, tried unsuccessfully to become a planter in the South, and in the end went into the family banking house. His dream now took a new shape. If he could make enough money, he would found in Boston an orchestra comparable in its standards of program and performance to the best in Europe.

Chance made the attempt possible sooner than he had hoped. His brother-in-law, Alexander Agassiz, came back from a prospecting trip in Northern Michigan wildly enthusiastic about a copper mine, formed a company to develop it, and Henry Lee Higginson, with no faith in the mine, took a number of shares at an almost nominal price, out of family feeling. The name of this mine was the Calumet & Hecla. Its success is one of the fabulous order.

In 1881 the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its career. Maj Higginson, its founder, was for 36 seasons its sole sustainer. In payment of its annual deficits he spent during that time nearly a million dollars. When he died he left an estate reported in the newspapers to have been about $2,000,000 only. These figures prove that to him the orchestra was more than just a charity that he contributed to. It was his life work, the fulfillment of his boyish dreams. He lived to hear it under Dr Karl Muck, acknowledged by all as the best orchestra the world has yet heard.

Then, as an incident of the most tragic of all wars, there came what to Maj Higginson seemed the ruin of all his work. The real story of the arrest of Dr Muck has never yet been published, nor is this the time or the place to print it.

Farewell Address

At the final Boston Symphony concert in the Saturday evening series, for the year 1917-18 the program books contained a slip stating that at the end of the concert Maj Higginson would speak. Dr Muck, of course, was at Fort Oglethorpe, interned, rightly or wrongly, as an enemy alien. The German subjects in the orchestra had all been dropped. Their contracts had not been renewed. The assistant conductor, Mr Schmidt, had conducted.

After the last notes of the last piece had been played, Maj Higginson walked from his usual place on the floor to the stage. The entire audience and the orchestra stood up, and remained standing through his brief speech of farewell. Helped up the steps to the stage by two ushers, he paused a moment, with sagging shoulders, an old and broken man. But when he spoke his voice carried clearly to the rear of the second balcony, as the present writer well remembers. His words were aptly chosen, and no hint of vehemence or of self pity marred them.

He had, he said, intended to give up the orchestra, since he believed it impossible under existing circumstances to carry it on worthily. But he had been persuaded, against his own judgment, to allow others to carry it on. Henceforth he had no connection with it. To his successors he extended his best wishes. The players and the audience he thanked for their friendliness through many seasons.

Under his successors, the present board of trustees, the Boston Symphony has now, after prolonged vicissitudes regained something like its former proud position. It is again unsurpassed in the world, thanks largely to Mr Monteux and to Dr Koussevitzky. But this success like the earlier one has been achieved on the lines laid down by Maj Higginson, and now imitated by the other principal American orchestras.

A Free Hand

His way was to engage the best musician he could obtain as conductor, tell him to engage the best players to be had for the orchestra, putting in their contracts a clause binding them to give the orchestra first claim to their services, so that no outside engagement can ever interfere with their attendance at a rehearsal or a concert. The conductor was given a free hand about the programs, told only to perform the best music of all schools and periods as well as he could get it performed.

Maj Higginson never interfered in the details of choice of players, soloists, or programs. He provided the financial backing, paying the deficits, and assuming sole responsibility for them. There was never any expectation that the Boston Symphony concerts should show a profit. Their standards, unlike those of American opera companies, are in no way dictated by the box office.

By way of footnote let us recall a little incident from the early history of the Symphony concerts, to show what manner of man Maj Higginson was.

The first time that a piano appeared on a Symphony concert program Maj Higginson, arriving at the hall early, discovered that the piano on the stage bore a big sign on the side of it, making the name of the manufacturer visible to all. This had long been a custom in Boston concert halls. It is still sometimes done in other cities.

Maj Higginson gave orders that this sign be removed, as beneath the artistic dignity of the Symphony concerts. The representative of the piano company said that he would remove the piano if the sign were disturbed. Whereupon the Major remarked "Very well, we will change the program and omit the piano concerto." Needless to add, the sign and not the piano was removed, and it never again appeared at a Symphony concert. It is thanks to Maj Higginson that this petty abuse long since vanished from all Boston concert halls.

Programs of the Week

BACH FESTIVAL, in memory of Henry Lee Higginson.

SYMPHONY HALL, Tuesday, at 4:30 and 8:30. B minor Mass, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Wednesday, March 25, at 8:30—Organ: Fantasia in C minor; Adagio (from the Toccata in C major); Fugue in C major (Wallace Goodrich). Address: "Henry L. Higginson" (Bliss Perry). Harpsichord: Prelude and Fugue, Fantasia, Italian Concerto (Mme Patorni-Casadesus). Organ: Chorale-prelude, "Schmucke dich, O liebe Seele," Fugue in G minor (Wallace Goodrich).

Thursday, March 26, at 8:30—Brandenburg Concerto No. 2. (Solo violin—Richard Burgin; Flute—Georges Laurent; Oboe—Ferdinand Gillett; Trumpet—Georges Mager) Piano Concerto in D miner (Alexander Borovsky). Magnificat (chorus, orchestra and soloists).

Friday, March 27, at 2:30—Suite for Orchestra, No. 3; Concerto for Two Violins (Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz); Cantata, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt"; Cantata, "O, Ewigkeit."

Saturday, March 28, at 8:15—Cantata, "Christ Lag in a Tobesbanden"; Brandenburg Concerto, No. 5 (Solo piano, Alexander Borovsky; Violin, Richard Burgin; Flute, Georges Laurent); Preludes and Fugues from "The Well-tempered Clavichord" (Alexander Borovsky); Cantata, "Ein feste Burg."

Sunday, March 29, at 4:30 and at 8:30—Mass in B minor (repeated).

Music Notes and Comment

The Bach Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the culminating event of its present 50th anniversary year, and the outstanding feature of the Boston musical season comes this week. But, despite the obvious limitations of newspaper space for musical reviews, and of the public for concerts in this city, two young pianists are to make their local debuts on two of the evenings of the festival. No doubt they and their respective managements wish chiefly to please personal friends of the performers, who are the only dependable public for most debuts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give on six successive days beginning next Tuesday, a Bach Festival in Symphony Hall to honor the memory of Henry L. Higginson, its founder, on this, the orchestra's 50th anniversary. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will appear in the Mass in B minor which is to open the Festival, and also to close it, as a Pension Fund concert, on Sunday, March 29th, and likewise in the Magnificat on Thursday. The Bach Cantata Club will give four cantatas at the Friday and Saturday concerts which are part of the regular series. In all five of these concerts, the vocal quartet consisting of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone, will be heard. Adelle Alberts will take the second soprano part in the Mass. Since the Mass takes three hours to perform, it will be given on each day in two parts, from 4:30 to 6, and from 8:30 until 10.

Alexander Borovsky, famous in Europe as a Bach interpreter, has arrived in Boston to appear in two performances, and Mme Patorni-Casadesus has likewise come from Europe especially to play the Harpsichord on Wednesday evening, which is dedicated to the memory of Henry L. Higginson. Prof Bliss Perry of Harvard, Mr Higginson's biographer and one of his close friends, will give an address on Wednesday evening, when Wallace Goodrich will play organ music of Bach.

REDUCTION

RATIO

18x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A4

A5

A3

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

2.5

2.2

2.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

166

MUSIC 20

By PHILIP HALE

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last night in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture and Scherzo from the incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Honegger, Symphony. Tchaikovsky, Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor (Vladimir Horowitz, pianist). Strauss, Dance of The Seven Veils from the opera "Salome."

The fame of Mendelssohn has had its ups and downs and again its ups. It was natural that after the slobbering adoration of the English, there should be a reaction, but he did not deserve the contempt with which his amiable music was treated in certain quarters. Most surprising of all the shifting opinions is the favoring attitude of the wild-eyed members of the younger French school, who speak approvingly of him—in a somewhat patronising manner—at the expense of Cesar Franck and his disciples, who, it is true, are more or less irritating in their sermonizing. The man that wrote the music for Shakespeare's comedy, the overture to "Fingal's Cave" and the "Walpurgis Night" is not to be ignored even in 1931. Some might think that the overture was performed last night in a too heroic vein—as if there were profound "meaning" in the comedy and the music, but all would agree that the Scherzo was played delightfully; so delightfully that the audience insisted twice on the players standing with several recalls for the conductor.

Honegger's symphony was brought out for the second time this season. The first movement seemed again to be ineffectively ugly and impotently bombastic. The fine ideas in the slow movements are at times curiously perverted, and in a labored manner. In the Finale one finds Honegger at his best, and not only by reason of the lovely, peaceful final measures, the calm after the "sturm and drang," the roaring of the billows and the howling of the winds.

With every performance of Tchaikovsky's concerto the wonder grows that after the launching of his imposing, inspiring theme, he threw it aside carelessly as a little thing of his own, but not worthy of reappearance or development. The announcement, whether it is made by the orchestra or by the pianist, is a cruel blow to legitimate expectation of what will be done with this theme. Mr. Horowitz gave a remarkable virtuoso interpretation of the concerto, remarkable for brilliance and dash. An interpretation that excited admiration and tumultuous applause on account of the display of technical proficiency, whenever Tchaikovsky is emotional, wherever he puts on the poet's robe, Mr. Horowitz leaves us cold. He is an illustrious member of the school that regards the piano first of all as a huge percussion instrument. But one can sing emotionally as well as melodiously on a piano, and Mr. Horowitz, with all his technical proficiency, his strength, his fire, has not a singing tone. It is said that he more or less recently went to Berlin, where his impetuosity was somewhat chastened; but the pedagogues in that city are not the ones to turn a virtuoso—in the common meaning of the word—into an emotional or even a mildly poetic pianist. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an accompaniment that was marvelous, and when the composer called on them for song, they sang.

An engrossing performance of Salome's dance brought the end to an interesting concert that will be repeated this afternoon.

The programs of Friday afternoon, March 27, and Saturday evening, March 28, belong to the Bach festival in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra.

Friday afternoon Suite No. 3, D major; Concerto for two violins (Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz), and two cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and half of "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort," sung by the Bach Cantata Club. On Saturday night the program will comprise the Easter cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden;" the Brandenburg concerto No. 5, preludes and fugues to be played by Mr. Borovsky, and the cantata "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott." The solo singers will be Mmes. Evans and Matzenauer; Messrs. Crooks and Gange.

SYMPHONY AT HEIGHT OF POWERS

Concert Last Night Most Brilliant in Many Years

POST MAR. 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Whether or not there is some special virtue in performing a task at an unaccustomed time, it is a fact that the Symphony Concert, which, because of rehearsals for the impending Bach Festival, took place last evening instead of tomorrow evening as in regular course, was one of the most brilliant not merely of this season but of many seasons.

EXUBERANT VIRTUOSITY

From the very outset it was a stirring evening. First upon the programme stood the Overture and Scherzo out of Mendelssohn's music for Shakspere's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," repertory pieces, both part of the routine of this orchestra as of every orchestra worthy the name. Yet, last evening, this music was played with a tonal finish, a mingling of lightness, speed and clarity, to which was added a certain exuberant virtuosity that was irresistible.

At the conclusion of the Scherzo the applauding audience was not satisfied until Dr. Koussevitzky had twice summoned the players to their feet, and twice made Mr. Laurent bow his acknowledgements of the plaudits that at least to some extent were prompted by his extraordinary fleet delivery of the measures for solo flute.

Honegger Again

On top of Mendelssohn, and on the score of having something to say and saying it without a superfluous syllable the juxtaposition was not flattering to the contemporary composer, there came a repetition of the Symphony of Honegger, one of the pieces commissioned for this 50 anniversary year of the Symphony Orchestra. Almost did Dr. Koussevitzky and his men persuade the sceptical listener last evening that after all this Symphony was more than the work of an able and resourceful craftsman who had a task to perform and in the performance of it relied more upon formulae than upon what is commonly called inspiration. But there are formulae in modern music, some of them the creation of Mr. Honegger himself, and in this Symphony they are duly paraded, occasionally to a sort of nervous excitement if not to anything more abiding.

The concert was to end with a performance of the Dance of Salome, from Strauss' opera of that name, that far and away eclipsed any performance of this music hitherto heard in Symphony Hall. But this, which might have been climax indeed for most concerts, could hardly be more than anti-climax to that which had immediately preceded it: Vladimir Horowitz, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra carrying all before them in a performance of Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor Pianoforte Concerto that also for overpowering and intoxicating brilliance had no Bostonian precedent.

Horowitz the Master

It was with this Concerto that Mr. Horowitz swept from off its feet his first American audience, which heard him in a concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Carnegie Hall a few seasons ago. Then, as was the case last evening, the immediate excitant of the frenzied applause which could not wait for the last note to sound was the amazing, the almost incredible speed with which Mr. Horowitz delivered the celebrated passage in double octaves that occurs just before the end.

Yet, although this sort of super-virtuosity distinguished his playing of the Concerto from first to last, his performance was quite as notable for grace and delicacy, for musicianly phrasing, indeed for all the qualities that a well-rounded interpretation and performance of such a piece requires. Six times Mr. Horowitz was recalled to the stage by a stamping, clapping audience, that finally let him go only because the hour was late. And when Dr. Koussevitzky returned to the stage to lead the music of Strauss the applause deservedly broke out afresh.

Least Known Master-Work Made by Bach

TRANS—MAR. 21

His Magnificat on Thursday, For First Time in Boston Through Sixty Years

BACH'S great Mass rises above all the exigencies of the service which gave it inspiration, concerns itself only with the fullness of that inspiration, its expression in terms of Italian forms and formulae, but permeated by Teutonic depth and spirituality. The bulk of Bach's choral music, on the other hand, though also superbly and profoundly expressive, is all "service" music, written with an eye to immediate and practical performance. To this class belong both the Magnificat and the four cantatas which are to be sung during the Bach festival now in progress.

Since Bach wrote all this music for actual use in Leipzig churches, it may be well to inquire into Bach's relations to those churches. It is some times assumed that Bach was organist and choirmaster at St. Thomas's Church in Leipzig. This is not the case. Bach was neither organist nor choirmaster at St. Thomas's. His official position was that of cantor at St. Thomas's School, a school which was endowed to give training to fifty-five boys in the singing of music at the four churches of Leipzig. In Bach's days its affairs were administered by the town council. It was Bach's duty, to prepare the choir-boys for the performance of church music, to take charge of the performance at one of the two principal churches, to provide—which in large part meant to compose—suitable music. The two principal churches were that of St. Thomas and that of St. Nicholas. At the two other churches, St. Peter's and the "Neue Kirche" the demands were less exacting. There was also some loose connection with the church at Leipzig University—St. Paul's. Since the ecclesiastical official known as "superintendent" was pastor of St. Nicholas Church, that church had a certain preference over the others during the entire term of Bach's tenure of office at Leipzig. It was thus that Bach made his first official appearance at a Leipzig service at St. Nicholas Church on May 30, 1723.

The liturgy of the early Lutheran Church follows closely that of the Roman Church. Examination of the rubrics outlining the services of the early Lutheran Church shows that Latin as well as "Deutsch" (the spelling of the day) was used for certain portions of the services. Thus it is that certain works which Bach wrote to Latin texts were actually written for the services of the German Protestant Church. The Magnificat is the principal of these. The Magnificat found an appointed place in the evening service on Christmas day and certain other feast days. On Christmas day certain Christmas hymns were interpolated between the several numbers of the Magnificat. On other feast days the numbers of the Magnificat were given in unbroken succession. Bach wrote the Magnificat in D for the evening service of the first Christmas he was in Leipzig, 1723. As was the case with the B minor Mass, the Latin text brought with it certain suggestions of Italian influence.

The Magnificat includes two superb five-part choruses, the "Magnificat" of the beginning and the "Gloria" at the end. Intervening are six airs, a duet, a trio-chorus for women's voices, and two smaller choruses. The text of the Magnificat is of course the great hymn of the Virgin Mary (Luke I. 46-55) with which she responds to the salutation of the angel who announces to her that she is to be the Mother of the Lord. Church liturgies add the "Gloria" to the end of this and many other canticles. By way of general introduction an exceedingly illuminating paragraph from Parry's "Bach" may be quoted:

"One thing must be admitted at the outset—there is no femininity about the work. There is hardly a bar which could be taken to suggest that Bach intended to emphasize any personal aspect of the hymn of the Virgin. His purpose seems rather to be to suggest the feeling that Christian worshippers in a body adopt the hymn as an expression of praise, gratitude and joy for themselves. This had, in the course of time, become the effect of the usage of the hymn for ecclesiastical purposes in the Roman Church. The multitudes of composers who had set it had all treated the original source and personal intention of the hymn as a negligible quantity. Such a subtle idea as the musical presentation of the humility, the proud joy, the exultation, the womaniness and the wonder of the unique position which the Gospel narrative gives as the occasion for the hymn, would probably be too modern for any composer before the twentieth century to concern himself with. As a matter of fact, the Magnificat had become a very special expression of congregational adoration—an act of worship, illustrating in a high degree the manner in which the religious attitude discards external anomalies or inaptness of mere verbal details and accepts the spiritual meaning, the devotional mood, the general mental tone of symbolic utterances as its own."

To the writer in the Oxford History of Music, "the structure of the opening five-part chorus is preferable to the concerto rather than to any other form, the choir taking the part of the solo instrument, or the 'concertino' of the concerto grosso, while the orchestra supplies the accompaniment in a manner not at all unlike the accepted type of accompaniments in the concertos of the day." A note of unspeakable joy dominates this first chorus. Bach does not hesitate to make bold use of three trumpets in the expression of it.

The mood of rejoicing continues through the second number, the air, "Et exultavit spiritus meus" ("And my spirit hath regarded") for alto and strings. The third number, an air for soprano, with oboe obbligato, "Quia respexit" ("For he hath regarded the lowliness") gives expression to a feeling of deep humility. Schweitzer calls attention to the fact that the "lowliness' of the chosen maiden is expressed by figures descending and bowing, as it were, that give rise to an accompaniment of indescribable charm—a veritable musical picture of the Madonna." The air leads directly into the chorus "Omnes generationes," which affords an excellent example of Bach's objective way of working even while he is gaining his wondrously penetrating subjective and spiritual effects. The interpenetration of the two has surely never been equalled nor hardly approached by any other composer. The word upon which Bach's objective realism concentrates is the word "omnes"—"all." There are many entries of the several voices on this word. The conventional dominant and tonic entries are soon swept aside, and "all" the five voices enter successively on repetitions of one note—C-sharp. Soon there is a sequence of entries which does not cease until there have been entries upon "all" the notes of the scale from F-sharp to F-sharp. The marvel is that such tricks never result in a mechanical style. Spirituality remains the order of the day. For after all, it is an act of worship that Bach is depicting: "all" human kind, throughout "all" the ages, he suggests, unites in calling the Virgin blessed.

"Quai fecit mihi magna" ("For he that is mighty") is a powerful air for bass. "Et misericordia" ("And His Mercy") for alto and tenor duet is accompanied by muted strings and flutes that "give out ritornelli that seem to Schweitzer) to come from a superterrestrial world." But beneath is a mood of melancholy.

In the chorus "Fecit Potentiam" ("The Lord Hath Showed Strength") the very intervals of the fugal theme indicate power. The theme is a long one and smashing chords seem to strive against it at every entry but it continues triumphant in its strong courses.

"Deposuit potentas" ("He Hath Put Down the Mighty") is another occasion for musical realism. It is a tenor air with unison violins in accompaniment. The word "deposuit" is almost always accompanied by a long descending scale passage. The bass reiterates an exceedingly powerful motive with the word "potentas." A long ascending figure accompanies the words, "and exalted them of low degree."

An alto with two flutes sings "Esurientes implevit bonis" ("And He Hath Filled the Hungry"). The mood is one of joy. "Suscepit Israel" ("He Hath Holpen His Servant Israel") is a trio-chorus for women's voices accompanied by oboe obbligato. It leads directly into the unaccompanied chorus "Sicut Locutus" ("As He Promised"). The Gloria at the end is as brilliant as the opening chorus. The last portion of it brings theme and treatment apparently derived or borrowed from the "Magnificat" with which the whole begins.

A. H. M.

BACH CANTATAS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Concerto for Two Violins and D Major Suite Heard

Mar 28 Trans

The program of yesterday afternoon's concert in the Friday subscription series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was part of the current Bach Festival, though, except for the now sadly diminished number of rush seats, only season subscribers could hear the chosen numbers. These were the Suite in D major which includes the air arranged and often played "For the G string;" the concerto for two violins, and two of the church cantatas, Nos. 85 and 20.

The solo violinists were Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. The chorus was drawn from the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth conductor, a group of recent graduates of Harvard and Radcliffe, brought up in the Davisonian tradition of choral singing. The solo singers were as at the rest of the festival concerts Mmes Evans and Matzenauer, Messrs Crooks and Gange.

The Suite in D major, with which the concert began, was eloquently and brilliantly performed. Dr Koussevitzky's reading, as usual, proved an emotional and dramatic one. The great volume of tone from the strings, the rather thickened melodic line, the emphatic rhythmic stresses were characteristic of his method of interpreting not merely the music of Bach but that of other 17th and 18th century composers, Mozart alone excepted. Some might prefer a lighter, more delicate way of playing this old music. Its texture is perhaps thinner, its elegance of manner perhaps greater than Dr Koussevitzky believes. But there is no denying the effectiveness of such a performance as yesterday's, even though inner voices were sometimes blurred or obscured by the tonal mass.

Admirable Playing

Mr Burgin and Mr Theodorowicz distinguished themselves by their wholly admirable playing of the solo parts in the concerto for two violins. The largo, known to all musicians as one of the most melodious and emotional things Bach wrote, greatly pleased the audience. Here again, however, one wondered whether a more restrained, a chaster style than Dr Koussevitzky's might not be preferable. The two allegro movements, performed with great gusto and fluency, seemed hardly less delightful than the famous largo, if less obviously appealing.

The two church cantatas, "Ich bin ein Guter Hirt," No. 85; and "O Ewigkeit," No. 20, are proofs of the inexhaustible fertility of Bach's imagination. His position at Leipzig demanded the composition and the performance of hundreds of such works. Yet they never drop to the level of perfunctory routine work, and occasionally approach the sublimities of the "Matthew Passion" and the B minor Mass.

Yesterday, however, these cantatas made much less impression than the purely instrumental portion of the program. Only the chorales at the end, sung with admirable simplicity and sincerity by the Bach Cantata Club, redeemed them from a hint of perfunctoriness, even of dullness.

Perhaps the splendors of the Magnificat and the B minor mass, performed at earlier concerts in the Bach Festival, obscured the less potent appeal of these humbler choral pieces. But what one felt in listening was that the solo singers to whom most of the numbers in these cantatas are allotted were not nearly as able as the instrumentalists in the orchestra.

Fine Tenor Voice

Mme Matzenauer was not yesterday in good voice. She had outdone herself in the B minor Mass and the Magnificat, and neither her tones nor her interpretations yesterday proved to have the memorable fervor she showed on those two recent occasions.

Miss Evans, whose voice is not of great volume, and whose style lacks distinction, sang many of her measures agreeably enough. Mr Gange suggested, as before, the baritone of the usual male quartet, or mixed quartet.

Only Mr Crooks of the four soloists did really well yesterday. He used his fine tenor voice with an admirable restraint, and, better than at the earlier concerts, conveyed the imaginative significance of his numbers.

It is a pity that a quartet of singers of an even and high level of excellence could not have been assembled for this festival. But where could such a group be found in America today?

The program for tonight's Symphony concert, also part of the Bach Festival, differs, by exception from that given yesterday. It includes the Fifth Brandenburg concerto; a group of piano solos to be played by Mr Borovsky, and two cantatas, "Christus lag in Todesbanden," and "Ein Feste Burg." The Festival ends with tomorrow's repetition of the B minor Mass.

P. R.

Concert-Chronicle

Saturday or Thursday?

THE trustees of the Chicago Orchestra have with a problem that has some product must sooner or later engage the authorities at Symphony Hall—the placing of the evening concert in the calendar for the week. Long-established custom assigns it to Saturday. Boston, however, is not Chicago. One or another of the newer orchestras in the Middle West prefers Thursday, with the matinée Friday or Saturday. In New York the Philharmonic Society concerts, while the subscription concerts fall on Thursday evenings, with a matinée on the following day. No one seems to know what men or what circumstances ordained Saturday for the evening concerts here, but until the Middle West (outside Chicago) began to cultivate orchestras, only New York deviated from the rule. It was tradition and precedent of twenty, thirty, fifty years' standing.

Meanwhile social habits have changed. We seem to be approaching the time when in large cities the weekly holiday now begins at Saturday noon—if not on Friday evening—and continues, at earliest, until Monday morning. Many go out of town; others prefer, for Saturday evening, less serious diversion than a symphony concert; Saturday afternoon, find themselves good for nothing except to loaf. They say in Chicago—and Boston now and then yields confirming signs—that week-ending is established custom with the public of Saturday evening concerts, as with traditional conductor like Dr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Stokowski, can hold it in the concert-hall on Saturday evenings. In Chicago, it demurs and asks for change to Thursday, following general Middle-Western custom, a prudent management would be slow to make it. Boston would discover the inclination of the majority; may ultimately act upon it. Here, from the Evening Post, are Mr. Hackett's paragraphs about it all:

"And now what do you suppose they are saying in Chicago about the question of sanctuary, though of course not officially? Nothing less than transferring the Saturday evening concerts to Thursday evening! The week-end is becoming, or has become, an essential factor in our social economy. A number of dogs are now being walked on Saturday afternoons instead of Sundays, and the Singakademie of Hamburg has actually established a Saturday afternoon, not least of which is the fact that each supports a splendid orchestra. It could be wished that Boston, at this time of musical retrospect, reference of its former conductor, who is held in such esteem in Hamburg and regarded throughout Germany as the last of a great generation of conductors.

"The performance of the Ninth Symphony by the Philharmonische Gesellschaft and the Singakademie of Hamburg under Dr. Muck was an event to remember. The orchestra, under its veteran leader, played with a rare combination of live and restrained virtuosity. The choir, although unable to produce the loveliness of tone which Davison draws from his young singers, revealed extraordinary training and accuracy. Together with the splendid reading of a work like Beethoven's Ninth is unlike anything which one hears nowadays in Boston, or anywhere else, for that matter. It is classic in the best sense of that term. From the very sense of inevitability, produced chiefly, so it seems to me, by an unfailing regard for the relation of the parts to a carefully thought-out whole and by steadfast adherence to laws of rhythmic power and symmetry. On the contrary, the effects are stupendous, partly because of the feeling of fatality, rather than caprice, with which the music seems to move forward.

"Muck is much older looking than he was in 1929, except for the sharpness of his eyes. His face is white and his hair gray. He stands the conductor's stand with apparent difficulty. The enthusiasm for his performance of the Ninth expressed itself long after the chorus and orchestra had filed off the stage. Again and again he had to come back alone to the empty stage, and the sombre lines of his face relaxed only once when, finally, a huge wreath was given him. Then he was lifted up to the conductor's stand."

Mar 31 Trans

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

166

MUSIC

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last night in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture and Scherzo from the incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Honegger, Symphony. Tchaikovsky, Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor (Vladimir Horowitz, pianist). Strauss, Dance of The Seven Veils from the opera "Salome."

The fame of Mendelssohn has had its ups and downs and again its ups. It was natural that after the slobbering adoration of the English, there should be a reaction, but he did not deserve the contempt with which his amiable music was treated in certain quarters. Most surprising of all the shifting opinions is the favoring attitude of the wild-eyed members of the younger French school, who speak approvingly of him—in a somewhat patronizing manner—at the expense of Cesar Franck and his disciples, who, it is true, are more or less irritating in their sermonizing. The man that wrote the music for Shakespeare's comedy, the overture to "Fingal's Cave" and the "Walpurgis Night" is not to be ignored even in 1931. Some might think that the overture was performed last night in a too heroic vein—as if there were profound "meaning" in the comedy and the music, but all would agree that the Scherzo was played delightfully; so delightfully that the audience insisted twice on the players standing with several recalls for the conductor.

Honegger's symphony was brought out for the second time this season. The first movement seemed again to be ineffectively ugly and impotently bombastic. The fine ideas in the slow movement are at times curiously perverted, and in a labored manner. In the Finale one finds Honegger at his best, and not only by reason of the lovely, peaceful final measures, the calm after the "sturm and drang," the roaring of the billows and the howling of the winds.

With every performance of Tchaikovsky's concerto the wonder grows that after the launching of his imposing, inspiring theme, he threw it aside carelessly as a little thing of his own, but not worthy of reappearance or development. The announcement, whether it is made by the orchestra or by the pianist, is a cruel blow to legitimate expectation of what will be done with this theme. Mr. Horowitz gave a remarkable virtuoso interpretation of the concerto, remarkable for brilliance and dash. An interpretation that excited admiration and tumultuous applause on account of the display of technical proficiency, whenever Tchaikowsky is emotional, whenever he puts on the poet's robe, Mr. Horowitz leaves us cold. He is an illustrious member of the school that regards the piano first of all as a huge percussion instrument. But one can sing emotionally as well as melodiously on a piano, and Mr. Horowitz, with all his technical proficiency, his strength, his fire, has not a singing tone. It is said that he more or less recently went to Berlin, where his impetuosity was somewhat chastened; but the pedagogues in that city are not the ones to turn a virtuoso—in the common meaning of that word—into an emotional or even a mildly poetic pianist, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an accompaniment that was marvelous, and when the composer called on them for song, they sang.

An engrossing performance of Salome's dance brought the end to an interesting concert that will be repeated this afternoon.

The programs of Friday afternoon, March 27, and Saturday evening, March 28, belong to the Bach festival in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra.

Friday afternoon Suite No. 3, D major; Concerto for two violins (Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz), and two cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and half of "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort" sung by the Bach Cantata Club. On Saturday night the program will comprise the Easter cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden;" the Brandenburg concerto No. 5, preludes and fugues to be played by Mr. Borovsky, and the cantata "Ein feste Burg ist unser-Gott." The solo singers will be Mmes. Evans and Matzenauer; Messrs. Crooks and Gange.

SYMPHONY AT HEIGHT OF POWERS

Concert Last Night Most Brilliant in Many Years

POST MAR. 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Whether or not there is some special virtue in performing a task at an unaccustomed time, it is a fact that the Symphony Concert, which, because of rehearsals for the impending Bach Festival, took place last evening instead of tomorrow evening as in regular course, was one of the most brilliant not merely of this season but of many seasons.

EXUBERANT VIRTUOSITY

From the very outset it was a stirring evening. First upon the programme stood the Overture and Scherzo out of Mendelssohn's music for Shakspere's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," repertory pieces, both part of the routine of this orchestra as of every orchestra worthy the name. Yet, last evening, this music was played with a tonal finish, a mingling of lightness, speed and clarity, to which was added a certain exuberant virtuosity that was irresistible.

At the conclusion of the Scherzo the applauding audience was not satisfied until Dr. Koussevitzky had twice summoned the players to their feet, and twice made Mr. Laurent bow his acknowledgements of the plaudits that at least to some extent were prompted by his extraordinary fleet delivery of the measures for solo flute.

Honegger Again

On top of Mendelssohn, and on the score of having something to say and saying it without a superfluous syllable the juxtaposition was not flattering to the contemporary composer, there came a repetition of the Symphony of Honegger, one of the pieces commissioned for this 50 anniversary year of the Symphony Orchestra. Almost did Dr. Koussevitzky and his men persuade the sceptical listener last evening that after all this Symphony was more than the work of an able and resourceful craftsman who had a task to perform and in the performance of it relied more upon formulae than upon what is commonly called inspiration. But there are formulae in modern music, some of them the creation of Mr. Honegger himself, and in this Symphony they are duly paraded, occasionally to a sort of nervous excitement if not to anything more abiding.

The concert was to end with a performance of the Dance of Salome, from Strauss' opera of that name, that far and away eclipsed any performance of this music hitherto heard in Symphony Hall. But this, which might have been climax indeed for most concerts, could hardly be more than anti-climax to that which had immediately preceded it; Vladimir Horowitz, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra carrying all before them in a performance of Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor Pianoforte Concerto that also for overpowering and intoxicating brilliance had no Bostonian precedent.

Horowitz the Master

It was with this Concerto that Mr. Horowitz swept from off its feet his first American audience, which heard him in a concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Carnegie Hall a few seasons ago. Then, as was the case last evening, the immediate excitant of the frenzied applause which could not wait for the last note to sound was the amazing, the almost incredible speed with which Mr. Horowitz delivered the celebrated passage in double octaves that occurs just before the end.

Yet, although this sort of super-virtuosity distinguished his playing of the Concerto from first to last, his performance was quite as notable for grace and delicacy, for musicianly phrasing, indeed for all the qualities that a well-rounded interpretation and performance of such a piece requires. Six times Mr. Horowitz was recalled to the stage by a stamping, clapping audience, that finally let him go only because the hour was late. And when Dr. Koussevitzky returned to the stage to lead the music of Strauss the applause deservedly broke out afresh.

Least Known Master-Work Made by Bach

TRANS—MAR. 21

His Magnificat on Thursday, For First Time in Boston Through Sixty Years

BACH'S great Mass rises above all the exigencies of the service which gave it inspiration, concerns itself only with the fullness of that inspiration, its expression in terms of Italian forms and formulae, but permeated by Teutonic depth and spirituality. The bulk of Bach's choral music, on the other hand, though also superbly and profoundly expressive, is all "service" music, written with an eye to immediate and practical performance. To this class belong both the Magnificat and the four cantatas which are to be sung during the Bach festival now in progress.

Since Bach wrote all this music for actual use in Leipzig churches, it may be well to inquire into Bach's relations to those churches. It is some times assumed that Bach was organist and choirmaster at St. Thomas's Church in Leipzig. This is not the case. Bach was neither organist nor choirmaster at St. Thomas's. His official position was that of cantor at St. Thomas's School, a school which was endowed to give training to fifty-five boys in the singing of music at the four churches of Leipzig. In Bach's days its affairs were administered by the town council. It was Bach's duty, to prepare the choir-boys for the performance of church music, to take charge of the performance at one of the two principal churches, to provide—which in large part meant to compose—suitable music. The two principal churches were that of St. Thomas and that of St. Nicholas. At the two other churches, St. Peter's and the "Neue Kirche" the demands were less exacting. There was also some loose connection with the church at Leipzig University—St. Paul's. Since the ecclesiastical official known as "superintendent" was pastor of St. Nicholas Church, that church had a certain preference over the others during the entire term of Bach's tenure of office at Leipzig. It was thus that Bach made his first official appearance at a Leipzig service at St. Nicholas Church on May 30, 1723.

The liturgy of the early Lutheran Church follows closely that of the Roman Church. Examination of the rubrics outlining the services of the early Lutheran Church shows that Latin as well as "Deudsch" (the spelling of the day) was used for certain portions of the services. Thus it is that certain works which Bach wrote to Latin texts were actually written for the services of the German Protestant Church. The Magnificat is the principal of these. The Magnificat found an appointed place in the evening service on Christmas day and certain other feast days. On Christmas day certain Christmas hymns were interpolated between the several numbers of the Magnificat. On other feast days the numbers of the Magnificat were given in unbroken succession. Bach wrote the Magnificat in D for the evening service of the first Christmas he was in Leipzig, 1723. As was the case with the B minor Mass, the Latin text brought with it certain suggestions of Italian influence.

The Magnificat includes two superb five-part choruses, the "Magnificat" of the beginning and the "Gloria" at the end. Intervening are six airs, a duet, a trio-chorus for women's voices, and two smaller choruses. The text of the Magnificat is of course the great hymn of the Virgin Mary (Luke I, 46-55) with which she responds to the salutation of the angel who announces to her that she is to be the Mother of the Lord. Church liturgies add the "Gloria" to the end of this and many other canticles. By way of general introduction an exceedingly illuminating paragraph from Parry's "Bach" may be quoted:

"One thing must be admitted at the outset—there is no femininity about the work. There is hardly a bar which could be taken to suggest that Bach intended to emphasize any personal aspect of the hymn of the Virgin. His purpose seems rather to be to suggest the feeling that Christian worshippers in a body adopt the hymn as an expression of praise, gratitude and joy for themselves. This had, in the course of time, become the effect of the usage of the hymn for ecclesiastical purposes in the Roman Church. The multitudes of composers who had set it had all treated the original source and personal intention of the hymn as a negligible quantity. Such a subtle idea as the musical presentation of the humility, the proud joy, the exultation, the womanliness and the wonder of the unique position which the Gospel narrative gives as the occasion for the hymn, would probably be too modern for any comnoser before the twentieth century to concern himself with. As a matter of fact, the Magnificat had become a very special expression of congregational adoration—an act of worship, illustrating in a high degree the manner in which the religious attitude discards external anomalies or inaptness of mere verbal details and accepts the spiritual meaning, the devotional mood, the general mental tone of symbolic utterances as its own."

To the writer in the Oxford History of Music, "the structure of the opening five-part chorus is preferable to the concerto rather than to any other form, the choir taking the part of the solo instrument, or the 'concertino' of the concerto grosso, while the orchestra supplies the accompaniment in a manner not at all unlike the accepted type of accompaniments in the concertos of the day." A note of unspeakable joy dominates this first chorus. Bach does not hesitate to make bold use of three trumpets in the expression of it.

The mood of rejoicing continues through the second number, the air, "Et exultavit spiritus meus" ("And my spirit hath regarded") for alto and strings. The third number, an air for soprano, with oboe obbligato, "Quia respexit" ("For he hath regarded the lowliness") gives expression to a feeling of deep humility. Schweitzer calls attention to the fact that the "'lowliness' of the chosen maiden is expressed by figures descending and bowing, as it were, that give rise to an accompaniment of indescribable charm—a veritable musical picture of the Madonna." The air leads directly into the chorus "Omnes generationes," which affords an excellent example of Bach's objective way of working even while he is gaining his wondrously penetrating subjective and spiritual effects. The interpenetration of the two has surely never been equalled nor hardly approached by any other composer. The word upon which Bach's objective realism concentrates is the word "omnes"—"all." There are many entries of the several voices on this word. The conventional dominant and tonic entries are soon swept aside, and "all" the five voices enter successively on repetitions of one note—C-sharp. Soon there is a sequence of entries which does not cease until there have been entries upon "all" the notes of the scale from F-sharp to F-sharp. The marvel is that such tricks never result in a mechanical style. Spirituality remains the order of the day. For after all, it is an act of worship that Bach is depicting: "all" human kind, throughout "all" the ages, he suggests, unites in calling the Virgin blessed.'

"Quai fecit mihi magna" ("For he that is mighty") is a powerful air for bass. "Et misericordia" ("And His Mercy") for alto and tenor duet is accompanied by muted strings and flutes that "give out ritornelli that seem (to Schweitzer) to come from a superterrestrial world." But beneath is a mood of melancholy.

In the chorus "Fecit Potentiam" ("The Lord Hath Showed Strength") the very intervals of the fugal theme indicate power. The theme is a long one and smashing chords seem to strive against it at every entry, but it continues triumphant in its strong course.

"Deposuit potentas" ("He Hath Put Down the Mighty") is another occasion for musical realism. It is a tenor air with unison violins in accompaniment. The word "deposuit" is almost always accompanied by a long descending scale passage. The bass reiterates an exceedingly powerful motive with the word "potentas." A long ascending figure accompanies the words, "and exalted them of low degree."

An alto with two flutes sings "Esurientes implevit bonis" ("And He Hath Filled the Hungry"). The mood is one of joy. "Suscepit Israel" ("He Hath Holpen His Servant Israel") is a trio-chorus for women's voices accompanied by oboe obbligato. It leads directly into the unaccompanied chorus "Sicut Locutus" ("As He Promised"). The Gloria at the end is as brilliant as the opening chorus. The last portion of it brings theme and treatment apparently derived or borrowed from the "Magnificat" with which the whole begins.

A. H. M.

BACH CANTATAS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Concerto for Two Violins and D Major Suite Heard

Mar 28 Trans

The program of yesterday afternoon's concert in the Friday subscription series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was part of the current Bach Festival, though, except for the now sadly diminished number of rush seats, only season subscribers could hear the chosen numbers. These were the Suite in D major which includes the air arranged and often played "For the G string;" the concerto for two violins, and two of the church cantatas, Nos. 85 and 20.

The solo violinists were Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. The chorus was drawn from the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth conductor, a group of recent graduates of Harvard and Radcliffe, brought up in the Davisonian tradition of choral singing. The solo singers were as at the rest of the festival concerts Mmes Evans and Matzenauer, Messrs Crooks and Gange.

The Suite in D major, with which the concert began, was eloquently and brilliantly performed. Dr Koussevitzky's reading, as usual, proved an emotional and dramatic one. The great volume of tone from the strings, the rather thickened melodic line, the emphatic rhythmic stresses were characteristic of his method of interpreting not merely the music of Bach but that of other 17th and 18th century composers. Mozart alone excepted. Some might prefer a lighter, more delicate way of playing this old music. Its texture is perhaps thinner, its elegance of manner perhaps greater than Dr Koussevitzky believes. But there is no denying the effectiveness of such a performance as yesterday's, even though inner voices were sometimes blurred or obscured by the tonal mass.

Admirable Playing

Mr Burgin and Mr Theodorowicz distinguished themselves by their wholly admirable playing of the solo parts in the concerto for two violins. The largo, known to all musicians as one of the most melodious and emotional things Bach wrote, greatly pleased the audience. Here again, however, one wondered whether a more restrained, a chaster style than Dr Koussevitzky's might not be preferable. The two allegro movements, performed with great gusto and fluency, seemed hardly less delightful than the famous largo, if less obviously appealing.

The two church cantatas, "Ich bin ein Guter Hirt," No. 85; and "O Ewigkeit," No. 20, are proofs of the inexhaustible fertility of Bach's imagination. His position at Leipzig demanded the composition and the performance of hundreds of such works. Yet they never drop to the level of perfunctory routine work, and occasionally approach the sublimities of the "Matthew Passion" and the B minor Mass.

Yesterday, however, these cantatas made much less impression than the purely instrumental portion of the program. Only the chorales at the end, sung with admirable simplicity and sincerity by the Bach Cantata Club, redeemed them from a hint of perfunctoriness, even of dullness.

Perhaps the splendors of the Magnificat and the B minor mass, performed at earlier concerts in the Bach Festival, obscured the less potent appeal of these humbler choral pieces. But what one felt in listening was that the solo singers to whom most of the numbers in these cantatas are allotted were not nearly as able as the instrumentalists in the orchestra.

Fine Tenor Voice

Mme Matzenauer was not yesterday in good voice. She had outdone herself in the B minor Mass and the Magnificat, and neither her tones nor her interpretations yesterday proved to have the memorable fervor she showed on those two recent occasions.

Miss Evans, whose voice is not of great volume, and whose style lacks distinction, sang many of her measures agreeably enough. Mr Gange suggested, as before, the baritone of the usual male quartet, or mixed quartet. Only Mr Crooks of the four soloists did really well yesterday. He used his fine tenor voice with an admirable restraint, and, better than at the earlier concerts, conveyed the imaginative significance of his numbers.

It is a pity that a quartet of singers of an even and high level of excellence could not have been assembled for this festival. But where could such a group be found in America today?

The program for tonight's Symphony concert, also part of the Bach Festival, differs, by exception from that given yesterday. It includes the Fifth Brandenburg concerto; a group of piano solos to be played by Mr Borovsky, and two cantatas, "Christus lag in Todesbanden," and "Ein Feste Burg." The Festival ends with tomorrow's repetition of the B minor Mass.

P. R.

Auck, Beethoven, And a Bostonian

ON March 16 last, in the Music Hall at Hamburg, Dr. Karl Muck was conductor at the final concert, for the season, of the Philharmonic Society. A single symphony filled the program—Beethoven's Ninth, with chorus and quartet. A Bostonian, who sat in the audience and who knew the conductor in his years at Symphony Hall, sends this department an interesting note about him in these final years. He writes from Berlin:

"Absence from Boston at the height of the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has its compensations, if one is lucky enough to be not too far from Hamburg Boston and Hamburg have many points in common, not least of which is the fact that each supports a splendid orchestra. It could be wished that Boston, at this time of musical retrospect, would not completely ignore the existence of its former conductor, who is held in such esteem in Hamburg and regarded throughout Germany as the last of a great generation of conductors.

"The performance of the Ninth Symphony by the Philharmonische Gesellschaft and the Singakademie of Hamburg under Dr. Muck was an event to remember. The orchestra, under its veteran leader, played with a rare combination of fire and restraint and with complete absence of ostentatious virtuosity. The choir, although unable to produce the lovelliness of tone which Davison draws from his young singers, revealed extraordinary training and accuracy together with wonderful abandon and enthusiasm. Muck's reading of a work like Beethoven's Ninth is unlike anything which one hears nowadays in Boston, or anywhere else, for that matter. It is classic in the best sense of that term. From the very first note of a movement one gets the sense of inevitability, produced chiefly, so it seems to me, by an unfailing regard for the relation of the parts to a carefully thought-out whole and by steadfast adherence to solid rhythms. And yet there is no loss of emotional power. On the contrary, the effects are stupendous, partly because of the feeling of fatality, rather than caprice, with which the music seems to move forward.

"Muck is much older looking than he was five years ago, except for the sharpness of his eyes. His face is white and his hair gray. He ascends the conductor's stand with apparent difficulty. The enthusiasm for his performance of the Ninth expressed itself in applause and shouting continued long after the chorus and orchestra had filed off the stage. Again and again he had to come back alone to the empty stage, and the sombre lines of his face relaxed only once when, finally, a huge wreath some seven feet tall was lifted up to the conductor's stand."

Concert-Chronicle

Saturday or Thursday?

THE trustees of the Chicago Orchestra are wrestling with a problem that (as some predict) must sooner or later engage the authorities at Symphony Hall—the placing of the evening concert in the calendar for the week. Long-established custom in Chicago, in Boston, in Philadelphia, assigns it to Saturday. One or another of the newer orchestras in the Middle West prefers Thursday, with the matinée Friday or Saturday. In New York, the Philharmonic Society allots Saturday evenings to Students' Concerts; while the subscription concerts fall on Thursday evenings, with a matinée on the following day. No one seems to know what men or what circumstances ordained Saturday for the evening concerts of symphony concerts in America; but until the Middle West (outside Chicago) began to cultivate orchestras only New York operated from the rule. It was tradition and precedent of twenty, thirty, fifty years' standing.

Meanwhile social habits have changed. Week-ending has come into vogue. In large cities the weekly holiday now begins at Saturday noon—if not on Friday evening—and continues, at earliest, until Monday morning. Many go out of town; others prefer, for Saturday evening, less serious diversion than a symphony concert; or, after the games of Saturday afternoon, find themselves good for nothing except to loaf. They say in Chicago—and Boston now and then yields confirming signs—that week-ending is established custom with the public of symphony orchestras. Only an exceptional conductor, like Dr. Koussevitzky

Mar 31 Trans

wn
Work
by Bach
MAR. 24
n Thursday, in Boston ty Years

s rises above all the service which ion, concerns it-
e fullness of that sion in terms of rmulae, but perpth and spirituals choral music, on also superbly and is all "service"
eye to immediate
nce. To this class
ieat and the four e sung during the ogress.
l this music for urches, it may be ach's relations to some times as-rganist and choir-
Church in Leip-case. Bach was oirmaster at St.
position was that
's School, a school give training to aging of music at Leipzig. In Bach's
ministered by the Bach's duty, to pre-the performance
ake charge of the
the two principal hich in large part table music. The were that of St.
. Nicholas. At the
. Peter's and the ands were less ex-
some loose con-
h at Leipzig Uni-ion the ecclesiasti-
"superintendent"
olas Church, that reference over the e term of Bach's
zig. It was thus se official appear-
e at St. Nicholas
3.

Lutheran
ber of the Roman
e, besides outre
Lutheran
ar as well as g of the day) was s of the services,
works which Bach
ally writ-of the German
the Magnificat is
The Magnificat
e in the evening
day and certain
Christmas day ser-
were interpolated
nbers of the Mag-
st days the num-
were given in un-ch were the Mag-ening service of
was in Leipzig,
with the B minor ought with it cer-
an influence.
udes two superb
"Magnificat" of
"Gloria" at the six arias, a duet, a s voices, and two ext of the Magni-
cal hymn of the Mary with which salutation of the
to her that she is the Lord. Church
ia" to the end of
Amen. By way
n an exceedingly g from Parry's
ed:
e admitted at the minority about the
a bar which could hat Bach intended
onal aspect of the
His purpose seems st the feeling that in a body adopt
pression of praise. themselves. This time, become the
he hymn for eccles-
e Roman Church-posers who had set

it had all treated the original source and personal intention of the hymn as a negligible quantity. Such a subtle idea as the musical presentation of the humility, the proud joy, the exultation, the womanliness and the wonder of the unique position which the Gospel narrative gives as the occasion for the hymn, would probably be too modern for any composer before the twentieth century to concern himself with. As a matter of fact, the Magnificat had become a very special expression of congregational adoration—an act of worship, illustrating in a high degree the manner in which the religious attitude discards external anomalies or inaptness of mere verbal details and accepts the spiritual meaning, the devotional mood, the general mental tone of symbolic utterances as its own."

To the writer in the Oxford History of Music, "the structure of the opening five-part chorus is preferable to the concerto rather than to any other form, the choir taking the part of the solo instrument, or the 'concertino' of the concerto grosso, while the orchestra supplies the accompaniment in a manner not at all unlike the accepted type of accompaniments in the concertos of the day." A note of unspeakable joy dominates this first chorus. Bach does not hesitate to make bold use of three trumpets in the expression of it.

The mood of rejoicing continues through the second number, the air, "Et exultavit spiritus meus" ("And my spirit hath regarded") for alto and strings. The third number, an air for soprano, with oboe obbligato, "Quia respexit" ("For he hath regarded the lowliness") gives expression to a feeling of deep humility. Schweitzer calls attention to the fact that the "'lowliness' of the chosen maiden is expressed by figures descending and bowing, as it were, that give rise to an accompaniment of indescribable charm—a veritable musical picture of the Madonna." The air leads directly into the chorus "Omnes generationes," which affords an excellent example of Bach's objective way of working even while he is gaining his wondrously penetrating subjective and spiritual effects. The interpenetration of the two has surely never been equalled nor hardly approached by any other composer. The word upon which Bach's objective realism concentrates is the word "omnes"—"all." There are many entries of the several voices on this word. The conventional dominant and tonic entries are soon swept aside, and "all" the five voices enter successively on repetitions of one note—C-sharp. Soon there is a sequence of entries which does not cease until there have been entries upon "all" the notes of the scale from F-sharp to F-sharp. The marvel is that such tricks never result in a mechanical style. Spirituality remains the order of the day. For after all, it is an act of worship that Bach is depicting: "all" human kind, throughout "all" the ages, he suggests, unites in calling the Virgin blessed.

"Quai fecit mihi magna" ("For he that is mighty") is a powerful air for bass. "Et misericordia" ("And His Mercy") for alto and tenor duet is accompanied by muted strings and flutes that "give out ritornelli that seem (to Schweitzer) to come from a superterrestrial world." But beneath is a mood of melancholy.

In the chorus "Fecit Potentiam" ("The Lord Hath Showed Strength") the very intervals of the fugal theme indicate power. The theme is a long one and smashing chords seem to strive against it at every entry, but it continues triumphant in its strong course.

"Deposuit potentas" ("He Hath Put Down the Mighty") is another occasion for musical realism. It is a tenor air with unison violins in accompaniment. The word "deposuit" is almost always accompanied by a long descending scale passage. The bass reiterates an exceedingly powerful motive with the word "potentas." A long ascending figure accompanies the words, "and exalted them of low degree."

An alto with two flutes sings "Esurientes implevit bonis" ("And He Hath Filled the Hungry"). The mood is one of joy. "Suscepit Israel" ("He Hath Holpen His Servant Israel") is a trio-chorus for women's voices accompanied by oboe obbligato. It leads directly into the unaccompanied chorus "Sicut Locutus" ("As He Promised"). The Gloria at the end is as brilliant as the opening chorus. The last portion of it brings theme and treatment apparently derived or borrowed from the "Magnificat" with which the whole begins.

A. H. M.

BACH CANTATAS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Concerto for Two Violins and D Major Suite Heard

Mar 28 Trans

The program of yesterday afternoon's concert in the Friday subscription series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was part of the current Bach Festival, though, except for the now sadly diminished number of rush seats, only season subscribers could hear the chosen numbers. These were the Suite in D major which includes the air arranged and often played "For the G string;" the concerto for two violins, and two of the church cantatas, Nos. 85 and 20.

The solo violinists were Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. The chorus was drawn from the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth conductor, a group of recent graduates of Harvard and Radcliffe, brought up in the Davisonian tradition of choral singing. The solo singers were as at the rest of the festival concerts Mmes Evans and Matzenauer, Messrs Crooks and Gange.

The Suite in D major, with which the concert began, was eloquently and brilliantly performed. Dr Koussevitzky's reading, as usual, proved an emotional and dramatic one. The great volume of tone from the strings, the rather thickened melodic line, the emphatic rhythmic stresses were characteristic of his method of interpreting not merely the music of Bach but that of other 17th and 18th century composers, Mozart alone excepted. Some might prefer a lighter, more delicate way of playing this old music. Its texture is perhaps thinner, its elegance of manner perhaps greater than Dr Koussevitzky believes. But there is no denying the effectiveness of such a performance as yesterday's, even though inner voices were sometimes blurred or obscured by the tonal mass.

Admirable Playing

Mr Burgin and Mr Theodorowicz distinguished themselves by their wholly admirable playing of the solo parts in the concerto for two violins. The largo, known to all musicians as one of the most melodious and emotional things Bach wrote, greatly pleased the audience. Here again, however, one wondered whether a more restrained, a chaster style than Dr Koussevitzky's might not be preferable. The two allegro movements, performed with great gusto and fluency, seemed hardly less delightful than the famous largo, if less obviously appealing.

The two church cantatas, "Ich bin ein Guter Hirt," No. 85; and "O Ewigkeit," No. 20, are proofs of the inexhaustible fertility of Bach's imagination. His position at Leipzig demanded the composition and the performance of hundreds of such works. Yet they never drop to the level of perfunctory routine work, and occasionally approach the sublimities of the "Matthew Passion" and the B minor Mass.

Yesterday, however, these cantatas made much less impression than the purely instrumental portion of the program. Only the chorales at the end, sung with admirable simplicity and sincerity by the Bach Cantata Club, redeemed them from a hint of perfunctoriness, even of dullness.

Perhaps the splendors of the Magnificat and the B minor mass, performed at earlier concerts in the Bach Festival, obscured the less potent appeal of these humbler choral pieces. But what one felt in listening was that the solo singers to whom most of the numbers in these cantatas are allotted, were not nearly as able as the instrumentalists in the orchestra.

Fine Tenor Voice

Mme Matzenauer was not yesterday in good voice. She had outdone herself in the B minor Mass and the Magnificat, and neither her tones nor her interpretations yesterday proved to have the memorable fervor she showed on those two recent occasions.

Miss Evans, whose voice is not of great volume, and whose style lacks distinction, sang many of her measures agreeably enough. Mr Gange suggested, as before, the baritone of the usual male quartet, or mixed quartet.

Only Mr Crooks of the four soloists did really well yesterday. He used his fine tenor voice with an admirable restraint, and, better than at the earlier concerts, conveyed the imaginative significance of his numbers.

It is a pity that a quartet of singers of an even and high level of excellence could not have been assembled for this festival. But where could such a group be found in America today?

The program for tonight's Symphony concert, also part of the Bach Festival, differs, by exception from that given yesterday. It includes the Fifth Brandenburg concerto; a group of piano solos to be played by Mr Borovsky, and two cantatas, "Christus lag in Todesbanden," and "Ein Feste Burg." The Festival ends with tomorrow's repetition of the B minor Mass.

P. R.

Concert-Chronicle

Saturday or Thursday?

THE trustees of the Chicago Orchestra are wrestling with a problem that (as some predict) must sooner or later engage the authorities at Symphony Hall—the placing of the evening concert in the calendar for the week. Long-established custom in Chicago, in Boston, in Philadelphia, assigns it to Saturday. One or another of the newer orchestras in the Middle West prefers Thursday, with the matinée Friday or Saturday. In New York, the Philharmonic Society allots Saturday evenings to Students' Concerts; while the subscription concerts fall on Thursday evenings, with a matinée on the following day. No one seems to know what men or what circumstances ordained Saturday for the evening concerts of symphony concerts in America; but until the Middle West (outside Chicago) began to cultivate orchestras, only New York deviated from the rule. It was tradition and precedent of twenty, thirty, fifty years' standing.

Meanwhile social habits have changed. Week-ending has come into vogue. In large cities the weekly holiday now begins at Saturday noon—if not on Friday evening—and continues, at earliest, until Monday morning. Many go out of town: others prefer, for Saturday evening, less serious diversion than a symphony concert; or after the games of Saturday afternoon, find themselves good for nothing except to loaf. They say in Chicago—and Boston now and then yields confirming signs—that week-ending is established custom with the public of symphony orchestras. Only an exceptional conductor, like Dr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Stokowski, can hold it in the concert-hall on Saturday evenings. In Chicago, it demurs and asks for change to Thursday, following general Middle-Western custom. A prudent management is watching the signs of the times; would discover the inclination of the majority; may ultimately act upon it. Here, from the Evening Post, are Mr. Hackett's paragraphs about it all:

"And now what do you suppose they are talking about, and even in the inner sanctuary, though, of course, not officially? Nothing less than transferring the Saturday evening concerts to Thursday evening. The week-end is becoming, or has become, an essential factor in our scheme of life. And the week-end does not contemplate coming downtown or back into town for a symphony concert on Saturday evening. Too many other interests have come up and of too engrossing a nature to make it any longer feasible.

"What do you think of it? Would more people, and especially more men, find it convenient and agreeable to set apart Thursday evening for the symphony concerts? Or is Saturday the night determined with the finality of the laws of the Medes and the Persians? If you are a 'Saturday nighter' and have definite opinions on the matter, now is the time to make them known. Write letters to the authorities, pro or con, and let them count the show of hands."

Incidents and Prospects

Dr. Koussevitzky is reserving Mr. Copland's "Symphonic Ode" for performance at the final pair of Symphony Concerts. It is music of large dimensions; sounds festally; would suit the end of the Jubilee year. . . . When the orchestra goes to New York next week, Mr. Borovsky will go with it to play the pianopart in the Concerto of Bach heard at the recent festival.

Mr. John Charles Thomas, venturing his first recital at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 12, will sing these pieces:

An die Leier	Schubert
Heimweh	Wolf
Meine Liebliche Wangen	Strauss
Sapphische Ode	Brahms
Fleur Jetée	Fauré
Prière du soir—Song of the Flea	Mussorgsky
I Heard a Soldier	Bax
Theodore, the Pirate King	Berners
Gwinne to Hobb'n	Wolfe
Home on the Range	Guion
When I Think upon the Maidens	Head

The management of The Pops has arranged a competition for posters to advertise the forty-sixth series next May and June. The competition is open to students in the art schools of the city. Full particulars may be had from Symphony Hall.

Mar 31 Trans

Dr. Koussevitzky has withdrawn the Suite out of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloë" from the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge tomorrow evening. Instead the Prelude to Musorgsky's "Khovántchina" and Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "Russian Easter," will be played.

The Chronicle Of Bostonian Concert Halls

TRANS — APR 2

Hindemith's Contribution to The Anniversary Year, Triple Schumann

THE Symphony Concerts of the coming week-end are seasonal; at the same time they introduce one of the few remaining anniversary works. The program recognizes Easter by the inclusion of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter"; brings novelty with Paul Hindemith's Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser, geschrieben für das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester ("Concert music for Strings and Brass, written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra"). The title-page also bears the date 1930, and notations in the score indicate that it was written in December of that year. The composer also directs that the "orchestra consist of the strongest possible string quartet, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones and a bass tuba." The scoring, it may be noted, treats the strings as a quartet rather than as the more usual quintet; that is to say, violins are treated as a single voice rather than by division into firsts and seconds. There are two movements, which Hindemith designates merely as "First Part" and "Second Part." The former is to move "Moderately fast, with power," expands near the end to "Very broadly, but always flowingly"; for the latter the tempo indication is simply "Lively." There is no key signature, but both parts gravitate around the key of C-sharp minor.

The first part resembles a sonata-form without development or free fantasia, but with a very expansive coda. The "first-theme section" of the exposition is made up of a counterpoint of three masses of tonal material, introduced successively. The whole string choir begins with the ascending scale of C-sharp minor, followed after a measure and a half with chords in a sharp, detached rhythm. Trumpets soon intrude with a flowing but virile melody which is the chief theme of the movement. Meanwhile high strings have begun a persistent flow of bright eighth-notes, while low strings continue with the matter of the beginning. Of these three the first portion of this new work is compounded. The "second-theme section" begins with an actively rhythmed, almost martial music for brass choir. Trombones soon emerge with a theme somewhat less definitely rhythmical than the rest of this section. This in turn is developed.

After a few moments of relaxation the music returns to the matter of the beginning. It is more expansively treated, as is this entire recapitulatory division. In place of the principal theme, half of the violas and half of the violoncellos sing ardently a melody which in some parts suggest an inversion of the principal theme, but which is also modified with suggestions of jazz-like rhythm. For the rest this division is a reworking of the first portion, except that a statement of the principal theme in its original forms comes at the end and leads to the coda which consists largely of a broader treatment, both more lyrical and more majestic, of this theme.

Part II. of the "Konzertmusik" is a three-voiced fugue interrupted by a central division of more songful matter. The theme begins with two sharp eighth-notes, soon settles into a long line of sixteenth-notes, with many felicitous repeated notes and melodic figures. Bright, sparkling, taken at a very rapid tempo, it gives impression of being one of the most gratefully pleasing as well as one of the most original themes that has come to notice for some time. Massed violins first give it out. After the contrasting central portion violoncellos rebegin the fugue. As in the first movement, this final development is carried out along larger lines than at the beginning. A. H. M.

For Every Taste

There was something for every taste at Jordan Hall last evening: choruses for women's voices, piano solos, tenor solos, a baritone solo, a soprano solo, a trio for soprano, mezzo and alto, a duet for soprano and alto. Organ and harp, two pianos and three pianists, complete the catalogue. The occasion was a program by the chorus of the MacDowell Club, William Ellis Weston, conductor.

The work of the chorus merits chief attention. From the Latin of the Church it chose numbers for beginning and end, a Tantum Ergo of Fauré, a Cantate Domino of Bossi; between, alighted upon a madrigal of the Old English Morley, "Though Philomela Lost Her Love"; found place for folk-songs variously selected from the Old Scotch, from Negro sprituals, from the German, from the Old Finnish, from sixteenth century English balladry; joined to these a near relative, in a Zulu Slumber Song of Wendt, based on a native South African tune; included also a semi-popular "Flower of Dreams" of one Clokey. In this year of grace, 1931, one finds the singing of the sopranos of this chorus fine-textured, often colored by a silvery sheen of no little beauty; one takes pleasure occasionally in full, round-toned melodies from the altos; finds inner parts not always their equal; discovers in Mr. Weston a persuasiveness of interpretation not remembered from earlier hearings. In Bossi's canticle this chorus struck fire, achieved breadths, sang in a large style that went beyond earlier portions of the program. Credit for this is due to some extent to the solo-like organ interludes and well-considered accompaniments of Mr. William Self. . . . For the rest, the choral numbers of this program, with their various auxiliary solos and duets and trios concerned themselves wiht the graces and elegances of concerted song, brought variety and considerable range of effect. Morley's old madrigal was hardly blessed with the lightness which one has learned to expect in this style of music.

Mr. Rulon Robison was soloist in a group of songs from Mozart, Storey Smith, Harty, Brahms. Mr. Smith's new "Roads (from the Russian)" summons persuasively a mood that to most of us suggests the land of the Czars and the Volga; Mr. Robison seized upon the spirit with telling effect. He reached fine lyric heights, showed deep understanding, in Brahms's "Wir Wandelten."

Elsie Winsor Bird, with harp, piano and organ, sang a version of the twenty-third psalm as set by Liszt, said to be the "first time in Boston." It is difficult to see how Liszt's grandiloquent measures penetrated at all into the spiritual significance of this psalm. Mrs. Bird's singing, though pleasant in tonal quality, and though matching ably Liszt's far-flung vocal line, was marred by too frequent singing below the pitch.

A further soloist was Dai Buell with a Toccata of Saint-Saëns, an Arabesque of Schumann, Ravel's "Jeux d'eau," Liapunov's "Lesghinka." A bustling, unclear performance was this, with much waving of arms, a great deal of "hitting the high spots," and Messrs. Saint-Saëns, Schumann, Ravel, Liapunov as alike as peas in a pod. A. H. M.

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky, re-making the program for the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday:

Concert Overture, "Russian Easter". . . . . Rimsky-Korsakov
Prelude to the Opera, "Parsifal" . . . . . Wagner
Concert-music, in Two Movements, for String and Brass Choirs . . . . . Hindemith (New: First Times)
Symphony, No. 1, in C minor . . . . . Brahms

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of April 17 and 18—a "Schumann Program":

Overture to Byron's Play, "Manfred"
Concerto in A minor for Violoncello with Orchestra
Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat major

Mr. Gregor Piatigorsky, playing for the first time in Boston, will be the violoncellist.

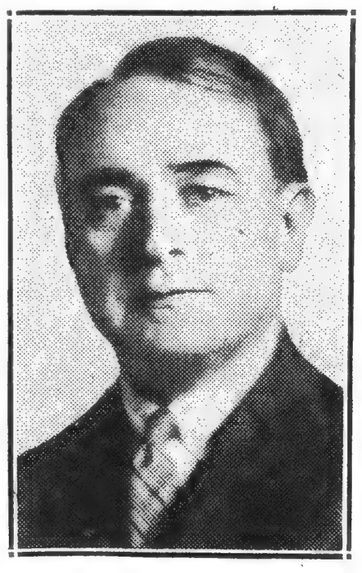
As Virtuoso of the Viola

Paul Hindemith (Hess)

Composer of One More Anniversary Piece—To be Played Tomorrow and Saturday—for the Symphony Concerts

HIGH HONOR TO KOUSSEVITZKY

Decoration Awarded by Republic of Finland



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Who has been decorated by Finnish government.

Post — Apr 3

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been awarded by the President of the republic of Finland the Cross of the Commander of the Order of the White Cross. Dr. Koussevitzky learned of this honor yesterday in a communication from W. Astrom, minister of Finland. This decoration is the highest honor which Finland can bestow.

It is largely the result of the conductor's enthusiasm for the music of Finland, and in particular the genius of Jans Sibelius, six of whose seven symphonies he has performed in America.

After Many Years And at Cambridge

TRANS — APR 3

Pianist and Conductor Revive Weber's "Concert-Piece" And It Sounds

Trans — APR 3

THOSE obliging elders, who never forget anything, were saying, as the rest of us filed out of Sanders Theater last evening, that years ago Reisenauer had played the piece at a pair of Symphony Concerts. Reisenauer—they added—was a German pianist, in his day noted equally for his conversation and his music-making. We others listened with polite ears; then agreed among ourselves that we had never heard it before in public performance, if, indeed, we had heard it at all. Of course, the eminent "programist" knew all about it and printed his information. He always does—unless the piece in hand happens to be of only a few months' or a few years' standing. Yes: Weber had "thought out" his Concert-Piece in F minor at Dresden in February, 1821; had written it at Berlin in the following June; had finished it on the morning of June 18; then rushed to his wife with "the sheets hardly dry"; played it to her while he "shouted out a commentary." All this on the very day when his "Der Freischütz," an "epoch-making" opera, was to be performed for the first time anywhere.

Mr. Borovsky, who played the Concert-Piece in Cambridge, did not "shout out" Weber's or any other "commentary." To do so is not the custom nowadays. We live, work and hear music in a materialistic age when—the cynics say—pianists surreptitiously count the house, looking out of the corners of ironic eyes. Weber flourished in a romantic time, when shouting was in order, both in the morning over a finished piano-piece and in the evening over a produced, and triumphant, opera. Print and a diligent "programist" are our mechanistic substitutes. Before Mr. Borovsky sounded a note, all of us knew the vision that had haunted Weber as he wrote and played—the châtelaine sitting solitary and doleful on her tower, while her lord is gone crusading against the infidel; no tidings, only horrific visions of destruction, death, despair; of a sudden the sound and sight of a returning host. 'Tis he—and the knights, the squires and the jubilant folk, all a-glistening in the sunshine. "What a tumult of love! What endless and indescribable happiness!" Weber's very words. For Jules Benedict happened to be sitting by to put them to paper, like a faithful—and timely—scribe. Weber loved these visions of the Age of Chivalry; out of them made three operas that have somehow lasted into this Age of Steel. With much more than a hint of the original inspiration, the three Overtures still sound across our concert-halls.

A modicum of listening imagination sufficed to mate program and music. Strauss himself could hardly have made closer jointure. But the visioning Weber sounded cramped with no more than a piano and a subordinate orchestra to give release and strike fire. The piano-part had faded less than five score years and ten might have worn it. In fact, Mr. Borovsky was so adroit and sympathetic with both mind and fingers that it never tinkled thin. His tone gave it body; his virtuosity lent it brilliance. Weber loved rhetoric and Mr. Borovsky tempered it with as little modernistic discretion as was possible to an "intellectual" pianist, playing in April 1931. The Concert-Piece probably asks the "grand style" and that sort of eloquence is hard to come by in present concert-halls. Mr. Borovsky, as his Bach was proving last week in Symphony Hall, takes sensitive thought as he plays. Perhaps for that very reason, the Concert-Piece sounded a little dry; whereas it should glow and shout and run its gamut of emotion and expression, even as did Weber himself.

As it was stretched last evening, the canvas seemed too small for the picture. The châtelaine needed a woodwind choir, unharnessed to a piano, to wail her desolation. The returning Crusaders should have come marching and shimmering down the full orchestra. Piano or no piano, it should have proclaimed the "tumult of love" and the "endless and indescribable happiness" as it does from the final pages of the three overtures. Weber, as we know him nowadays, was no miniaturist. He worked best with ample means, in a spacious frame, with a whole opera-book to transmute first into his visions, then into his tones. So expanding, nobody could call him a "charlatan," which was the reproach he feared for the Concert-Piece. His alarms were groundless. To this day it keeps musical shape, substance, movement. It is alive as piano and virtuoso stuff. If there was no program in print, the listener, with the operas to jog his imagination, would more than half suspect the romantic moods and flourishes. Weber was forerunner to Wagner in the theater. In such things as the Concert-Piece he believably anticipated Liszt in the concert-hall. And nowadays it is not he, but Liszt, whom the sincerity-mongers call the "charlatan."

For the rest Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra repeated the Symphony of Haydn (in D major) that has lately returned to the active repertory at Symphany Hall. In Sanders Theater, every detail, every shading, sounded bright and clear. Haydn was almost as luminous as Mozart. Gainer also was the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovántschina," later in the concert. The wooden-walled amphitheater concentrated an atmosphere and suggestion that runs thin through the long tunnel in which the orchestra habitually plays. Not so fortunate, however, are the larger sonorities. When it gathered up the whole orchestra, Mr. Steinert's "Symphonic Legend" sounded constricted and the churchly pageant of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" pushed for room.

H. T. P.

HIGH FINNISH HONOR FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Order of White Cross Acknowledges His Interest In Music of Nation

Finland's highest honor, the cross of commander of the Order of the White Cross, has been awarded to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. W. Astroem, minister of the Republic of Finland to the United States, announced the award yesterday in a communication to Dr. Koussevitzky. His letter read in part as follows:

"I have the pleasure to inform you that the President of the Republic of Finland has awarded you the cross of the commander of the Order of the White Cross as a token of appreciation for the interest you have shown in Finnish music, especially the compositions of Sibelius, which have been regularly performed during a great number of years under your eminent conductorship in the most important cultural centres of the United States."

Jan

RIDAY, APRIL 3, 1931

FINNISH HONOR FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Finland's highest honor, the cross of commander of the Order of the White Cross, has been awarded to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. W. Astroem, minister of the Republic of Finland to the United States, announced the award yesterday in a communication to Dr. Koussevitzky. His letter read in part as follows:

"I have the pleasure to inform you that the President of the Republic of Finland has awarded you the cross of the commander of the Order of the White Cross as a token of appreciation for the interest you have shown in Finnish music, especially the compositions of Sibelius, which have been regularly performed during a great number of years under your eminent conductorship in the most important cultural centres of the United States."

168

HERALD APR 4

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, "The Russian Easter"; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Hindemith, Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, C minor.

There have of lats been many "explanations" of Hindemith: why he is what he is. Some apologize for him by saying that as he has journeyed much as a viola virtuoso and a member of a string quartet, observing the rhythm of railway trains, he, as a composer, is interested chiefly in rhythmic combinations and invention. The conservative have, justly or unjustly, classed him with contemporaneous composers who, though they have talent, are nevertheless to be avoided; the conservatives have put Hindemith on the list of those who never would be missed; but he has the fertility of a rabbit: one work breathlessly follows another. But he is a composer not to be carelessly put aside.

He often disappoints those who would give him more than respect for his technical acquirements. Take the composition for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra, performed yesterday for the first time. Hindemith likes to experiment with groups of instruments. In this Konzertmusik the brass choir, in the first section punctuates what the strings have to say in a dry manner with growls and snorts. The opening of a long cantilena for strings, at first alone, gives the hope of melodic beauty. But the music of Hindemith is not sensuous. Did the Muses endow him with the melodic gift? We doubt it. Nor can one justly characterize his musical nature as emotional. Writing for a festival occasion, one would have anticipated sonorous pomp, stately declamation, or at least tumultuous rejoicing; but this music was not even laboriously ugly. There can be ugliness that at the same time may be impressive; but the "Konzertmusik" is for the most part worse than ugly—it is dull, nor does the display of technical ingenuity save it.

Perhaps the fairest criticism of the new work was heard in the corridor: "Not so bad as I expected."

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter," aside from the use made of Russian ecclesiastical themes, is noteworthy for its gorgeous instrumentation. It is picturesque music, suggestive of the crowded cathedral, the chanting priests, the devout worshippers of old Russia.

One might have gladly heard the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" instead of the Prelude to that opera, as more appropriate to the season and the more beautiful music. The Prelude is best heard in the theatre where the opera was first produced. There with the hidden orchestra—the brass section not so boisterous—the faithful in the audience—say rather the congregation — this prelude seems at the time a mystical preparation for the unfolding of the mystery to come. (We are speaking of the old Bayreuth with Wagner in the theatre; not of the commercialized show-place that draws to it the curious, and all tourists under the protecting wing of good Thomas Cook and Company.) In the ordinary concert hall the Prelude has little or no significance. It is merely music by Wagner; by Wagner not at his best.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave an unusually eloquent interpretation of the symphony; surpassing even former performances conducted by this admirer of Brahms, r

SYMPHONY IN MUSIC FOR EASTER

Hindemith's "Concert Music" Creates Good Impression

POST APR 4

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As originally planned, the programme for the Symphony Concerts of this week paid no heed to the fact that one concert fell on Good Friday and the other on Easter ave. On second thought, Dr. Koussevitzky discarded those peculiarly pagan items, the suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and Debussy's "Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Fawn'," and put in their places Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "The Russian Easter," and the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal."

OVERTURE WELL PLACED

So far as their external significance was concerned the "Parsifal" Prelude should have preceded, not followed, Rimsky's overture on themes from the Russian Liturgy, but so far as effective programme-making was concerned they were better placed as yesterday's list arranged them. It is in the exotic flavor of the so-called Church modes and in the richly varied and, at the end, dazzlingly brilliant instrumentation that the chief interest in the "Russian Easter" now lies. But in any event the piece was altogether appropriate to the season, and after a week of Bach, in which the orchestra quite decidedly played second fiddle to choruses, it was good to hear once more the full glory of orchestral tone.

If in a different sense, the orchestra shone again in the "Parsifal" Prelude, played by Dr. Koussevitzky at a pace that emphasized its inherent solemnity and with full realization of the poignancy of those measures at the climax that have to do with the anguish of the Saviour.

Hindemith's Tribute

These Easter and Good Friday rites once celebrated, conductor and orchestra yesterday turned their attention to the novelty of the afternoon, Paul Hindemith's "Concert Music" for stringed and brass instruments, composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and publicly played yesterday for the first time anywhere.

To record a purely personal opinion, this latest music of Hindemith is the strongest and the soundest of the many pieces thus far heard that have been written especially for this jubilee year of our orchestra. More than any of those whose music has preceded his does Hindemith seem to have written in obedience to a purely musical impulse, less does he seem to have relied upon mannerisms and formulae, on echoes of his own music or that of others. In certain technical aspects Hindemith's "Concert Music" is of our own day, though it is far from drastically modernistic. Essentially, however, it is as classic in its spirit as a Concerto of Bach, as free from external suggestion, as logically developed out of itself. And Hindemith, for all his protesting against Romanticism, cannot, Teuton that he is, resist the temptation to express himself in long-breathed melody. No doubt this element in his work surprised many in yesterday's audience.

The younger Hindemith who wrote the admirable Concerto already twice heard at these concerts could more completely resist the impulse to lyrical expression than could the maturer author of this "Konzertmusik."

There was applause for Hindemith's ece yesterday, although it was not so rvent as that with which the Prelude "Parsifal" was received nor so enusiastic as that lavished upon the permance of Brahms' First Symphony, th which the concert ended.

HINDEMITH PIECE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

GLOBE APR 4

First Performance of New 'Konzertmusik'

A new piece by the young German composer, Paul Hindemith, entitled simply "Konzertmusik," for string and brass instruments, and written for the anniversary, was performed for the first time anywhere at yesterday's Symphony concert. It proved unusually interesting and impressive. The rest of Dr Koussevitzky's program included Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "A Russian Easter" and the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," chosen, no doubt because of the date of the concert; and Brahms' C minor Symphony.

The program yesterday contained, by exception, no description or explanation of Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" beyond the title and the indication that there are two movements, an allegro moderato; and an allegro with a slow middle section. The second movement is a fugue, in three voices, with a long and expressive episode in the middle of it. The first movement is also essentially polyphonic. In the instrumentation the strings and brass are often used as independent choirs, and not blended constantly as is so frequently done by present-day writers for orchestra.

Jumble of Tone

Other works of Hindemith heard here in the past had given one the impression that he was the typical clever young musical radical, bent above all on shocking conventionally minded listeners. Did he not end one of his compositions in no less than 10 keys at once, according to the analysis in the program? What one heard on that former occasion was, of course, not 10 keys, but a meaningless jumble of tone. Descriptions of his numerous compositions had confirmed one's notion that he was to be grouped with Erik Satie, with Milhaud, or with Lord Berners. Hence it was astonishing to hear yesterday music wholly serious and somber, with no calculated audacities of manner.

This Konzertmusik in spirit might be the work of a 20th century Brahms. It is the first work by a German of the younger generation to be played in Boston which seems to continue the traditions of the 19th century German music without imitating any 19th century master. One thought of Richard Strauss and of Reger and Mahler, as well as of Brahms, in listening. Yet there were no reminiscences of the style or substance of any one composer.

No young composer of genius would write in 1930 as men of genius wrote in the past century, or even as they wrote in 1910. Hindemith in this Konzertmusik expresses the mood of post-war Germany and expresses it in the musical language of his own generation. Of his contemporaries in other countries Honegger (German-Swiss by origin, French only by accident) is the nearest in tone and style to his work.

There is in the best of Honegger the same moral earnestness, the same predilection for contrapuntal style, the same taste for somber tone color. This Konzertmusik should be heard again. It seemed yesterday to be a masterpiece. The performance, though eloquent, might have had greater clarity and greater restraint of mood to advantage.

Effective Reading

Dr Koussevitzky did much to convey the suggestion of Russian liturgical music in Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, with its many churchly themes. The piece is too prolix, and not profoundly enough imagined, but it sounded yesterday more effective than it has at previous hearings.

His reading of the "Parsifal" prelude was also deeply emotional. The orchestra gave out a magnificent sonority of tone. But some of the nobility of style Dr Muck used to impart to this music was missing. One suspects that Muck used to make it finer than it actually is. Yesterday there were suggestions of shallowness, of theatricality.

As usual, the Brahms symphony was impressively performed, its beauties stressed, its occasional aridities disguised. There was very hearty applause for everything on the program except the unfamiliar Hindemith, which deserved far more plaudits than greeted it.

P. R.

Concert-Chronicle

The Young Idea

WHERE were the children? For their own pleasure and for the good of their young souls—though they need not be told that—they should fill Symphony Hall when the Symphony Orchestra proffers them a concert. Sometimes they do. Yesterday afternoon, however, there were rows of empty seats above and below stairs. The realists said that Easter holidays were in the way, emptying private and public seats of youthful learning. The more speculative said nothing, but wondered whether the schools, once so eager, were giving the trustees of the orchestra the encouragement that the occasion warrants. As usual, too, some adult bystanders wished for more boys and maidens in middle teens. They know nothing about "child-culture" or any other pedagogical process; but out of their own experience they remember that around fifteen or sixteen they were beginning to discover what they liked or did not like, and how easy it was to put in a whole spring vacation seeing plays and hearing music—if only allowances held out and "the family" wasn't too bothersome.

As it was, it was an uncommonly quiet, attentive, steadily interested audience. Some of it arrived late enough to be subscribers to the Friday matinées. All of it applauded as evenly and discreetly as the connoisseurs of Saturday nights. We grown-ups craned our necks and pricked up our ears to discover what most absorbed these youngsters. First and foremost, the various instruments in the orchestra. The cadenzas and the fandango from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" were the final item. The cadenzas, from instrument to instrument, caught the childish eye and ear, especially when one was as obvious as Mr. Zighera's on the harp. By way of preface to a number for viola, earlier in the concert, Mr. Meyer, in his usual place as guide, counsellor and friend, asked Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Lefranc to sound alternately the strings of violin and viola. On the instant the youngsters were alert and curious. Rhythm pleases them—when it is light and running as in the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" or full and snapping as in Rimsky's Fandango. It is good for these juveniles to hear movements from eighteenth-century symphonies. (It was an allegro from Haydn yesterday.) Whether such fine-fibred music pleases them is another story.

As luck would have it, the test-piece of the day—Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1"—brought no clarifying results. The composer's name would wake no prejudices in these children. Nor would they hear with ears long accustomed to another musical speech. They are the brood of an age of machines. Airplanes and motor-cars have not altogether superseded locomotives in their young interest and imagination. On the delineative side, Honegger's "symphonic movement" is instant and unmistakable. Mr. Meyer spoke interestingly of "Pacifics" as near as Riverside, as far as France; explained the classifying figures; slipped old an new slides across his screen. Mr. Bu gin, conducting, may have overdriv Honegger's engine, but the whole eff was little impaired. The children liste closely, clapped honestly; but showe little excitement as they did a year when they first heard Ravel's "Bo They should have been infant mode by instinct. And not a hair of young heads stirred as the "Pa chugged into motion swept across night; sang its song of power and s came at last to braked and panting . . . The young neutrals—when fathers have fought for the piece music of their time!

H. T. P.

Memo

On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra give their final concerts, for the season in New York. From the recent Bach Festival, for Thursday, come the second Brandenburg Concerto and the Piano Concerto in D minor, with Mr. Borovsky again as pianist; for Saturday the orchestral Suite in D major and the Concerto for Two Violins played by Mr. Burgin and Mr. Theodorowicz. Brahms's Symphony in C minor rounds out the program of Thursday. Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony"—one of the events of the season—will be heard on Saturday.

At Symphony Hall

As usual, the closing weeks of the season bring various rearrangements at the Symphony Concerts. . . . At Mr. Copland's request, the manuscript of his "Symphonic Ode" has again been returned to him for revision, and production stands over until next season. . . . The revival of Skriabin's "Prometheus," contemplated for the concerts of April 24 and 25, has likewise been deferred to next year. . . . Lambert's "The Rio Grande" and Cherepnin's "Borodin," both for chorus and orchestra, will be heard at the supplementary concert on Monday evening, April 27. . . . The concerts of April 24 and 25, for which these choral pieces were announced, will proceed in regular course. . . . The long-promised revival of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony will be brought to pass next year.

—

Subscribers to the Symphony Concerts are receiving the following circular. It is signed by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Russell S. Codman, Jr., Mrs M. G. Haughton, Mrs. Edward Thaw, Mr. and Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell, Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Steinert.

"This seems an appropriate time for us all to join in an expression of appreciation and gratitude to Dr. Koussevitzky for all that he has accomplished by his untiring devotion to the work of bringing our orchestra to its present perfection.

"It is proposed to present at the end of this season to Dr. Koussevitzky a wreath of gold or other emblem marking his part in the celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fiftieth Anniversary which his splendid efforts have made so memorable.

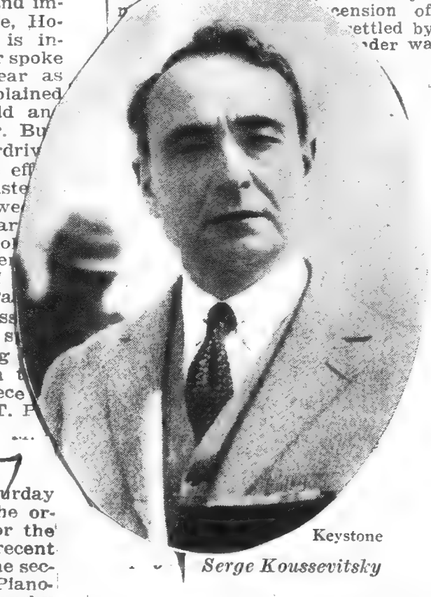
"If you care to participate in the gift kindly send your subscription (not exceeding one dollar) to Francis C. Gray; Lee, Higginson Trust Co., 50 Federal Street, Boston, not later than April 15."

Music Notes and Comment

Globe

Dr Koussevitzky is by exception devoting this week's Symphony program to the work of a single composer, Schumann. His First Symphony, often spoken of as a "Spring" symphony, is appropriate to the season. In the 'cel lo concerto the soloist will be Gregor Piatigorsky, a Russian, who has appeared in the other principal American cities, and as soloist with a number of the leading orchestras. He is now to make a belated Boston debut.

No doubt a piece will be played at this week's Symphony concerts in memory of the late George W. Chadwick, for many years director of the New England Conservatory, and one of the ablest of the elder generation of American composers. One hopes that Chadwick's "Melpomene" overture, his finest composition, may be chosen instead of any conventional Beethoven or Wagner excerpt. But the memory of so distinguished a musician should in no event pass unhonored by the Boston Symphony. Dr Koussevitzky, abs[illegible] has not yet an[illegible]cension of his [illegible]ettled by him [illegible]der way.



Keystone

Serge Koussevitsky

Have you heard of Serge Koussevitsky's invisible orchestra? Koussevitsky, it seems, decided to pursue the career of orchestra conductor. He had no orchestra. But that did not prevent him from grouping chairs before him in the positions the players would occupy in actual performance, so that, baton in hand, he could lead an invisible orchestra. Mentally, you see, he had become a conductor. Is it any wonder that his career has led him to the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

There was no greater cartoonist in America than Clare Briggs. We are told that when he took up his pen he had not placed upon the paper before him so much as an outline in pencil. He transferred his cartoon direct from his mind to the paper in bold, dashing pen lines.

Saint Paul has put it, "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." Faith, then, is giving substance to the things we hope for, our conviction about things yet unseen.

You cannot lift yourself by your bootstraps, but you can by faith, by imagination. You can elevate yourself to any height or lower yourself to any depth your imagination consistently,

r mention PSYCHOLOGY MAGAZINE when yo

APRIL

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave yesterday at 4 p m in Symphony Hall the last of its annual programs for young people, which will be repeated today at the same hour for a second audience, assembled, like the one yesterday, by distribution of tickets at a nominal price through the public and private schools of Boston and vicinity.

Dr Koussevitzy conducted the first two numbers on a program which ranged from Handel to Honegger. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, conducted the rest. As usual there were brief and happily worded explanatory remarks by Alfred H. Meyer, who showed interesting stereopticon slides.

The youthful audience, which practically filled the hall, listened attentively to admirable performances of an agreeably contrasted group of masterpieces.

An allegro from a Haydn symphony, a movement from a Handel sonata, arranged for solo viola and orchestra; Rimsky Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice," and Honegger's much discussed "Pacific 231," an attempt to describe in music, not the sound of a locomotive, but "the sensation of a locomotive in flight," as a French commentator has explained, provided an attractive hour of music, which must have stimulated the enthusiasm of many youthful listeners. Such music as this is neither dull nor overly intricate. Anyone can enjoy it.

who has been singularly fortunate in revealing the poetic and dramatic side of a composer whose music led by other conductors, otherwise worthy men, has often seemed only pedantic, dry, oppressively respectable. Even at the risk of being called a blasphemer, one wishes that Brahms had lived up to the magnificent introduction to the Finale of the symphony. After the exposition of the chief theme of the Allegro, Johannes is seen as one condemned to hard labor.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will give concerts in New York and Brooklyn next week. The program of April 17, 18 will comprise Schumann's overture to "Manfred"; his 'cello concerto (Gregor Piatigorsky), and his symphony in B flat major No. 1. No other composer need apply.

168

HERALD APR 4

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, "The Russian Easter"; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Hindemith, Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, C minor.

There have of late been many "explanations" of Hindemith: why he is what he is. Some apologize for him by saying that as he has journeyed much as a viola virtuoso and a member of a string quartet, observing the rhythm of railway trains, he, as a composer, is interested chiefly in rhythmic combinations and invention. The conservative have, justly or unjustly, classed him with contemporaneous composers who, though they have talent, are nevertheless to be avoided; the conservatives have put Hindemith on the list of those who never would be missed; but he has the fertility of a rabbit: one work breathlessly follows another. But he is a composer not to be carelessly put aside.

He often disappoints those who would give him more than respect for his technical acquirements. Take the composition for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra, performed yesterday for the first time. Hindemith likes to experiment with groups of instruments. In this Konzertmusik the brass choir, in the first section punctuates what the strings have to say in a dry manner with growls and snorts. The opening of a long cantilena for strings, at first alone, gives the hope of melodic beauty. But the music of Hindemith is not sensuous. Did the Muses endow him with the melodic gift? We doubt it. Nor can one justly characterize his musical nature as emotional. Writing for a festival occasion, one would have anticipated sonorous pomp, stately declamation, or at least tumultuous rejoicing; but this music was not even laboriously ugly. There can be ugliness that at the same time may be impressive; but the "Konzertmusik" is for the most part worse than ugly—it is dull, nor does the display of technical ingenuity save it.

Perhaps the fairest criticism of the new work was heard in the corridor: "Not so bad as I expected."

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter," aside from the use made of Russian ecclesiastical themes, is noteworthy for its gorgeous instrumentation. It is picturesque music, suggestive of the crowded cathedral, the chanting priests, the devout worshippers of old Russia.

One might have gladly heard the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" instead of the Prelude to that opera, as more appropriate to the season and the more beautiful music. The Prelude is best heard in the theatre where the opera was first produced. There with the hidden orchestra—the brass section not so boisterous—the faithful in the audience—say rather the congregation — this prelude seems at the time a mystical preparation for the unfolding of the mystery to come. (We are speaking of the old Bayreuth with Wagner in the theatre; not of the commercialized show-place that draws to it the curious, and all tourists under the protecting wing of good Thomas Cook and Company.) In the ordinary concert hall the Prelude has little or no significance. It is merely music by Wagner; by Wagner not at his best.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave an unusually eloquent interpretation of the symphony; surpassing even former performances conducted by this admirer of Brahms, who has been singularly fortunate in revealing the poetic and dramatic side of a composer whose music led by other conductors, otherwise worthy men, has often seemed only pedantic, dry, oppressively respectable. Even at the risk of being called a blasphemer, one wishes that Brahms had lived up to the magnificent introduction to the Finale of the symphony. After the exposition of the chief theme of the Allegro, Johannes is seen as one condemned to hard labor.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will give concerts in New York and Brooklyn next week. The program of April 17, 18 will comprise Schumann's overture to "Manfred"; his 'cello concerto (Gregor Piatigorsky), and his symphony in B flat major No. 1. No other composer need apply.

SYMPHONY IN MUSIC FOR EASTER

Hindemith's "Concert Music" Creates Good Impression

POST APR 4

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As originally planned, the programme for the Symphony Concerts of this week paid no heed to the fact that one concert fell on Good Friday and the other on Easter ave. On second thought, Dr. Koussevitzky discarded those peculiarly pagan items, the suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and Debussy's "Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Fawn'," and put in their places Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "The Russian Easter," and the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal."

OVERTURE WELL PLACED

So far as their external significance was concerned the "Parsifal" Prelude should have preceded, not followed, Rimsky's overture on themes from the Russian Liturgy, but so far as effective programme-making was concerned they were better placed as yesterday's list arranged them. It is in the exotic flavor of the so-called Church modes and in the richly varied and, at the end, dazzlingly brilliant instrumentation that the chief interest in the "Russian Easter" now lies. But in any event the piece was altogether appropriate to the season, and after a week of Bach, in which the orchestra quite decidedly played second fiddle to choruses, it was good to hear once more the full glory of orchestral tone.

If in a different sense, the orchestra shone again in the "Parsifal" Prelude, played by Dr. Koussevitzky at a pace that emphasized its inherent solemnity and with full realization of the poignancy of those measures at the climax that have to do with the anguish of the Saviour.

Hindemith's Tribute

These Easter and Good Friday rites once celebrated, conductor and orchestra yesterday turned their attention to the novelty of the afternoon, Paul Hindemith's "Concert Music" for stringed and brass instruments, composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and publicly played yesterday for the first time anywhere.

To record a purely personal opinion, this latest music of Hindemith is the strongest and the soundest of the many pieces thus far heard that have been written especially for this jubilee year of our orchestra. More than any of those whose music has preceded his does Hindemith seem to have written in obedience to a purely musical impulse, less does he seem to have relied upon mannerisms and formulae, on echoes of his own music or that of others. In certain technical aspects Hindemith's "Concert Music" is of our own day, though it is far from drastically modernistic. Essentially, however, it is as classic in its spirit as a Concerto of Bach, as free from external suggestion, as logically developed out of itself. And Hindemith, for all his protesting against Romanticism, cannot, Teuton that he is, resist the temptation to express himself in long-breathed melody. No doubt this element in his work surprised many in yesterday's audience.

The younger Hindemith who wrote the admirable Concerto already twice heard at these concerts could more completely resist the impulse to lyrical expression than could the maturer author of this "Konzertmusik."

There was applause for Hindemith's piece yesterday, although it was not so fervent as that with which the Prelude to "Parsifal" was received nor so enthusiastic as that lavished upon the performance of Brahms' First Symphony, with which the concert ended.

HINDEMITH PIECE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

GLOBE APR 4

First Performance of New 'Konzertmusik"

A new piece by the young German composer, Paul Hindemith, entitled simply "Konzertmusik," for string and brass instruments, and written for the anniversary, was performed for the first time anywhere at yesterday's Symphony concert. It proved unusually interesting and impressive. The rest of Dr Koussevitzky's program included Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "A Russian Easter" and the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," chosen, no doubt because of the date of the concert; and Brahms' C minor Symphony.

The program yesterday contained, by exception, no description or explanation of Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" beyond the title and the indication that there are two movements, an allegro moderato; and an allegro with a slow middle section. The second movement is a fugue, in three voices, with a long and expressive episode in the middle of it. The first movement is also essentially polyphonic. In the instrumentation the strings and brass are often used as independent choirs, and not blended constantly as is so frequently done by present-day writers for orchestra.

Jumble of Tone

Other works of Hindemith heard here in the past had given one the impression that he was the typical clever young musical radical, bent above all on shocking conventionally minded listeners. Did he not end one of his compositions in no less than 10 keys at once, according to the analysis in the program? What one heard on that former occasion was, of course, not 10 keys, but a meaningless jumble of tone. Descriptions of his numerous compositions had confirmed one's notion that he was to be grouped with Erik Satie, with Milhaud, or with Lord Berners. Hence it was astonishing to hear yesterday music wholly serious and somber, with no calculated audacities of manner.

This Konzertmusik in spirit might be the work of a 20th century Brahms. It is the first work by a German of the younger generation to be played in Boston which seems to continue the traditions of the 19th century German music without imitating any 19th century master. One thought of Richard Strauss and of Reger and Mahler, as well as of Brahms, in listening. Yet there were no reminiscences of the style or substance of any one composer.

No young composer of genius would write in 1930 as men of genius wrote in the past century, or even as they wrote in 1910. Hindemith in this Konzertmusik expresses the mood of post-war Germany and expresses it in the musical language of his own generation. Of his contemporaries in other countries Honegger (German-Swiss by origin, French only by accident) is the nearest in tone and style to his work.

There is in the best of Honegger the same moral earnestness, the same predilection for contrapuntal style, the same taste for somber tone color. This Konzertmusik should be heard again. It seemed yesterday to be a masterpiece. The performance, though eloquent, might have had greater clarity and greater restraint of mood to advantage.

Effective Reading

Dr Koussevitzky did much to convey the suggestion of Russian liturgical music in Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, with its many churchly themes. The piece is too prolix, and not profoundly enough imagined, but it sounded yesterday more effective than it has at previous hearings.

His reading of the "Parsifal" prelude was also deeply emotional. The orchestra gave out a magnificent sonority of tone. But some of the nobility of style Dr Muck used to impart to this music was missing. One suspects that Muck used to make it finer than it actually is. Yesterday there were suggestions of shallowness, of theatricality.

As usual, the Brahms symphony was impressively performed, its beauties stressed, its occasional aridities disguised. There was very hearty applause for everything on the program except the unfamiliar Hindemith, which deserved far more plaudits than greeted it.

P. R.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave yesterday at 4 p m in Symphony Hall the last of its annual programs for young people, which will be repeated today at the same hour for a second audience, assembled, like the one yesterday, by distribution of tickets at a nominal price through the public and private schools of Boston and vicinity.

Dr Koussevitzy conducted the first two numbers on a program which ranged from Handel to Honegger. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, comducted the rest. As usual there were brief and happily worded explanatory remarks by Alfred H. Meyer, who showed interesting stereopticon slides.

The youthful audience, which practically filled the hall, listened attentively to admirable performances of an agreeably contrasted group of masterpieces.

An allegro from a Haydn symphony, a movement from a Handel sonata, arranged for solo viola and orchestra; Rimsky Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice," and Honegger's much discussed "Pacific 231," an attempt to describe in music, not the sound of a locomotive, but "the sensation of a locomotive in flight," as a French commentator has explained, provided an attractive hour of music, which must have stimulated the enthusiasm of many youthful listeners. Such music as this is neither dull nor overly intricate. Anyone can enjoy it.

Concert-Chronicle

The Young Idea

Trans Apr

WHERE were the children? For their own pleasure and for the good of their young souls—though they need not be told that—they should fill Symphony Hall when the Symphony Orchestra proffers them a concert. Sometimes they do. Yesterday afternoon, however, there were rows of empty seats above and below stairs. The realists said that Easter holidays were in the way, emptying private and public seats of youthful learning. The more speculative said nothing, but wondered whether the schools, once so eager, were giving the trustees of the orchestra the encouragement that the occasion warrants. As usual, too, some adult bystanders wished for more boys and maidens in middle teens. They know nothing about "child-culture" or any other pedagogical process; but out of their own experience they remember that around fifteen or sixteen they were beginning to discover what they liked or did not like, and how easy it was to put in a whole spring vacation seeing plays and hearing music—if only allowances held out and "the family" wasn't too bothersome.

As it was, it was an uncommonly quiet, attentive, steadily interested audience. Some of it arrived late enough to be subscribers to the Friday matinées. All of it applauded as evenly and discreetly as the connoisseurs of Saturday nights. We grown-ups craned our necks and pricked up our ears to discover what most absorbed these youngsters. First and foremost, the various instruments in the orchestra. The cadenzas and the fandango from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" were the final item. The cadenzas, from instrument to instrument, caught the childish eye and ear, especially when one was as obvious as Mr. Zighera's on the harp. By way of preface to a number for viola, earlier in the concert, Mr. Meyer, in his usual place as guide, counsellor and friend, asked Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Lefranc to sound alternately the strings of violin and viola. On the instant the youngsters were alert and curious. Rhythm pleases them—when it is light and running as in the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" or full and snapping as in Rimsky's Fandango. It is good for these juveniles to hear movements from eighteenth-century symphonies. (It was an allegro from Haydn yesterday.) Whether such fine-fibred music pleases them is another story.

As luck would have it, the test-piece of the day—Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1"—brought no clarifying results. The composer's name would wake no prejudices in these children. Nor would they hear with ears long accustomed to another musical speech. They are the brood of an age of machines. Airplanes and motor-cars have not altogether superseded locomotives in their young interest and imagination. On the delineative side, Honegger's "symphonic movement" is instant and unmistakable. Mr Meyer spoke interestingly of "Pacifics" as near as Riverside, as far as France; explained the classifying figures; slipped old and new slides across his screen. Mr. Burgin, conducting, may have overdriven Honegger's engine, but the whole effect was little impaired. The children listened closely, clapped honestly; but showed as little excitement as they did a year ago when they first heard Ravel's "Bolero." They should have been infant modernists by instinct. And not a hair of their young heads stirred as the "Pacific" chugged into motion swept across the night; sang its song of power and speed; came at last to braked and panting rest. . . . The young neutrals—when their fathers have fought for the piece as music of their time!

H. T. P.

Memo Trans Apr 7

On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra give their final concerts, for the season in New York. From the recent Bach Festival, for Thursday, come the second Brandenburg Concerto and the Piano-Concerto in D minor, with Mr. Borovsky again as pianist; for Saturday the orchestral Suite in D major and the Concerto for Two Violins played by Mr. Burgin and Mr. Theodorowicz. Brahms's Symphony in C minor rounds out the program of Thursday. Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony"—one of the events of the season—will be heard on Saturday.

At Symphony Hall

Mus

As usual, the closing weeks of the season bring various rearrangements at the Symphony Concerts. . . . At Mr. Copland's request, the manuscript of his "Symphonic Ode" has again been returned to him for revision, and production stands over until next season. . . . The revival of Skriabin's "Prometheus," contemplated for the concerts of April 24 and 25, has likewise been deferred to next year. . . . Lambert's "The Rio Grande" and Cherepnin's "Borodin," both for chorus and orchestra, will be heard at the supplementary concert on Monday evening, April 27. . . . The concerts of April 24 and 25, for which these choral pieces were announced, will proceed in regular course. . . . The long-promised revival of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony will be brought to pass next year.

Trans

Trans Apr 8

Subscribers to the Symphony Concerts are receiving the following circular. It is signed by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Russell S. Codman, Jr., Mrs M. G. Haughton, Mrs. Edward Thaw, Mr. and Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell, Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Steinert.

"This seems an appropriate time for us all to join in an expression of appreciation and gratitude to Dr. Koussevitzky for all that he has accomplished by his untiring devotion to the work of bringing our orchestra to its present perfection.

It is proposed to present at the end of this season to Dr Koussevitzky a wreath of gold or other emblem marking his part in the celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fiftieth Anniversary which his splendid efforts have made so memorable.

"If you care to participate in the gift kindly send your subscription (not exceeding one dollar) to Francis C. Gray; Lee, Higginson Trust Co., 50 Federal Street, Boston, not later than April 15."

Music Notes and Comment

Trans Apr 8

Dr Koussevitzky is by exception devoting this week's Symphony program to the work of a single composer, Schumann. His First Symphony, often spoken of as a "Spring" symphony, is appropriate to the season. In the 'cello concerto the soloist will be Gregor Piatigorsky, a Russian, who has appeared in the other principal American cities, and as soloist with a number of the leading orchestras. He is now to make a belated Boston debut.

No doubt a piece will be played at this week's Symphony concerts in memory of the late George W. Chadwick, for many years director of the New England Conservatory, and one of the ablest of the elder generation of American composers. One hopes that Chadwick's "Melpomene" overture, his finest composition, may be chosen instead of any conventional Beethoven or Wagner excerpt. But the memory of so distinguished a musician should in no event pass unhonored by the Boston Symphony. Dr Koussevitzky, absent in New York, has not yet announced the final recension of his program, a thing never settled by him until the rehearsals are under way.

Hi
sk ca no
hi
th in in orc come that Boston
There
America told that whe had not placed him so much as an
He transferred his carto his mind to the paper in bold, dashing pen lines.

Saint Paul has put it, "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." Faith then, is giving substance to the things we hope for, our conviction about things yet unseen.

You cannot lift yourself by your bootstraps, but you can by faith, by imagination. You can elevate yourself to any height or lower yourself to any depth your imagination consistently

r mention PSYCHOLOGY MAGAZINE

APRIL

layers --- Music and Musicians --

A Little Courage Does No Harm

Modernist Scheme, Modernist Line

Poster by Mark Hayes of the Designers' Art School for the Pop Concerts. It Won the Second Prize in the Students' Competition Arranged at Symphony Hall

Concert-Chronicle

Bach's Trumpet TRANS APR 18.

IN New York, last Thursday, Dr. Koussevitzky, the solo-virtuosi and the string choir of the Symphony Orchestra repeated Bach's Second Brandenburg Concerto from the recent festival in Boston. Again Mr. Mager played upon his small, shrill, high-voiced trumpet. Possibly this return to the "clarin" of Bach's time proved more fortunate there than here. At the least, Mr. Henderson in The Sun had good words for it:

"Bach wrote trumpet-parts in such a high register that most orchestral trumpeters of the nineteenth century could not play them. The problem was not solved by application of the knowledge that 'clarin' players in Bach's day practiced only the highest notes of the trumpet; while the lower tones were produced by other players. Nor were matters made any better by arrangements substituting other instruments for the trumpet. A German trumpeter invented a high Bach trumpet, which was used at the unveiling of Bach's statue in Eisenach in 1884, when Joachim conducted. But for some reason the old order was not changed and Bach concerti continued to be performed without the shrilling of the original clarion tones.

"The Bach trumpet has recently come into use and there are instrument-makers who specialize in the making of it. The trumpet which Georges Mager used at last evening's performance was a short instrument with a small bore and a very high register. The thin, piercing upper tones were probably close to those which were in Bach's mind when he created this Concerto. The trumpet dominated the concertino (as the group of solo instruments was called by the old masters) and gave the work a complexion somewhat different from that to which we were formerly accustomed. The work was excellently played and the audience signified its approval in unmistakable manner."

Continued on Following Page

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

170

Players --- Music and Musicians

Out of Russia Into Widespread Note

Gregor Piatigorsky

Violoncellist of the New Generation, Playing at the Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday

Boston Symphony

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the twenty-second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, in Symphony Hall, Boston, April 17 and 18, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky prepared a program calculated to smooth any musical feathers that might have been ruffled by a fiftieth season made somewhat cacophonous by a long list of anniversary salutations from contemporary composers. What composer could be better suited to the purpose than Schumann, who besides had not been represented on previous programs of the season? Hence a list consisting of the "Manfred" Overture, the Violoncello Concerto and the Symphony in B flat.

It would be a mistake to suppose that this program was soporific. Schumann was perhaps not the greatest of symphonic composers, nor one of those whose compositions best support the test of an entire program. But he is by no means to be forbidden the concert hall because he was not a past master of orchestration; and no modernist can deny his sense of structural order, his rhythmic ingenuity, nor above all his gift of melody. This program, moreover, was cuningly devised to display him at his best.

The "Manfred" Overture, which many consider his greatest symphonic work, had a brilliant performance which was received apathetically by the Friday subscribers. Dramatically conceived and eloquently executed, this interpretation was remarkable for its elucidation of content, form and poetic values.

The Concerto, no doubt the weakest of the three items, was reinforced by the virtuosity and musicality of Gregor Piatigorsky in the solo part. Not only in the lovely slow movement, but throughout the work he stirred admiration for his beautiful tone, his technical mastery, his expressive phrasing and his musical taste. This was his first appearance in Boston, and he was rapturously received.

The "Spring" Symphony, one of Dr. Koussevitzky's favored repertory pieces, again came engagingly alive. It is possible to feel that at the opening a less vehement vernal proclamation might suffice to set the sap running, and that the melody of the Larghetto would be more lyric if it did not drag. But the Scherzo and the Finale were captivatingly set forth. Under a heavier hand this Scherzo may become extremely tedious. Dr. Koussevitzky, by the imagination with which he brings out its varieties, makes it unceasingly fresh. And the last movement becomes actually "animato e grazioso" through his witty reading and the subtle responsiveness of his players.

L. A. S.

Concert-Chronicle

Griffes Remembered

IT IS the creditable habit of Dr. Koussevitzky not to let the end of a season sag. In such things he has keen sense of a conductor's obligation. Accordingly at the Symphony Concerts of next week he will revive Griffes's tone-poem, after Coleridge's verse, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan." Griffes, cut off in young prime, left no more characteristic or enduring work. In his lifetime Mr. Monteux discovered it; played it at Symphony Hall; repeated it—if recollection serves—after his death. It interested audiences and stirred reviewers as a finely sensitized and poetized music. More recently it fell into unwarranted neglect. Now Dr. Koussevitzky is bringing it back and in a new "edition"—that is to say as revised orchestrally by Frederick Stock, the Chicagoan conductor. In a note he explains the occasion and the nature of the changes:

I performed this work in Chicago in January, 1920. In the autumn of that year I had an opportunity of

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzy chose a Schumann program for this week's Symphony concerts, an honor seldom awarded these days to that composer's music. The "Manfred" overture, the concerto for violoncello, and the First Symphony adequately represent Schumann's work for orchestra. Thanks to the admirable playing of Gregor Piatigorsky, who made his first Boston appearance yesterday afternoon, the concerto was the most heartily applauded of the three pieces.

Mr Piatigorsky is a Russian, still in his 20s. He has served as first cellist in the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Fuertwangler, and toured extensively in Europe and America as a virtuoso. Yesterday's performance proved him a cellist of the first rank and a musician of eminence. The fine taste and the unobtrusive but very remarkable technical skill he showed were notable.

Between them he and Dr Kousse-

MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program, composed of works by Schumann, was as follows: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 129 (Gregor Piatigorsky, soloist) and Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, op. 38.

Yesterday afternoon's music served to dispel two platitudes: One, that the violoncello is inclined to be monotonous, to lack variety in tonal color; the other, that Schumann employs the idiom of the piano, when writing for other instruments, to such a degree that his compositions for orchestra are not effective. Mr. Piatigorsky quickly disproved the first. In his hands the violoncello vies with the violin in versatility. The depth and richness of its tone combined with its remarkable range make sharper contrasts possible, give it a character, while predominantly a melodic instrument, of being more than that. As for the sec-hestration is not matter! Despite music overflowdy, spiced with ches of humor. t and agile in ion is fine. He st sense of the in his techni- cile servant of mands and he with it. Taste n from becom- strument sings. turned phrases. Mr Piatigorsky ble. His regard ability to dove- ying with that instruments in is a constant veen the two— nship perhaps f his qualities. the result, for sitive accom- be desired. lliantly played. was embodied, g everything as champagne, ried humor. A does not run —one theme er, making a er one episode r, each almost utiful for its n for its bear- ith a stirring natic overture uded enthusi- eated tonight. k will be as ony in C ma- leasure Dome the poem of y, Suite from Fire-Bird"), a

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky honored the memory of the late George Whitefield Chadwick at the final Tuesday supplementary concert of this season yesterday afternoon, by playing the "Noel" movement from the noted American composer's suite, "Symphonic Sketches." Upon his first appearance before the orchestra Dr Koussevitzky bade the players rise; for a few moments they stood in silence, then resumed their seats and began the "Noel."

Possibly the reasons for the unexpected handclapping which occurred at the conclusion of the work was wholehearted admiration for Dr Koussevitzky's sympathetic and delicately beautiful reading, and for the exquisite, fine-textured scoring of the piece.

Schumann's first symphony, in B-flat major; Stravinsky's "Capriccio," in which Jesus Maria Sanroma played the piano solo, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," occupied the remainder of the program.

It truly seems as if Schumann unwittingly displayed, in this effervescent symphony, nearly all the weaknesses of his other music. The matter of the turgid, coarse-grained instrumentation aside, there remains Schumann's "long-windedness," his hysterical yet dull melodic material, his unrestrained romanticism that gushes outward and onward without reason or point.

Stravinsky's "Caprice," to judge from applause, is at least losing no favor. Yet on second thought, much of the handclapping yesterday undoubtedly was proffered in recognition of Mr Sanroma's excellent performance of the piano part. He plays with brilliance, of course, yet brilliance alone does not seem to account for his notable success with this piece. He recreates in his playing a spirit of jocularity and drollery with which the piano part, more than any other, is invested. And he has the gift of transmitting his musical feelings to his audience.

With the exception of the introductory chords, the first movement of the "Caprice" seems, to one listener, labored in treatment and sterile in thematic material. The second movement is as uninspired and dull. The concluding "Allegro capriccioso," however, is much better. There the manipulation of the material is interesting, the orchestral statements and answers are spontaneous. It is singular, however, that only the part allotted to the piano is consistently zestful and stimulating.

Strauss' tone poem, on the other hand, has all that the "Caprice" lacks. "Till" melodies have substance; there is variety of material and treatment; the work appears inspired from start to finish.

If Strauss used a system of instrumentation that is positively Gargantuan in scope and now out of fashion among composers, it nevertheless has merits that will endure, and "Till" remains a work of infinite beauty. Dr Koussevitzky's reading was, as usual in this work, a marvel of orchestral eloquence.

PLAY LAST OF TUESDAY CONCERTS

Pst Apr 22

Symphony Pays Tribute to Chadwick at Opening

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The final Tuesday Symphony concert of the season, which took place yesterday, was taken by Dr. Koussevitzky as the occasion on which to pay tribute to the memory of the late George W. Chadwick. At the head of the programme stood a single movement, the second, by title "Noel," from Mr. Chadwick's most characteristic orchestral composition, the "Symphonic Sketches." Before the performance the men of the orchestra, at a signal from the conductor, rose and stood for a moment with bowed heads.

REVERENTLY PLAYED

It had been Dr. Koussevitzky's original intention to play the Symphonic Sketches as whole at yesterday's concert, and by such performance the composer would have been more fittingly remembered. "Noel" is far from the strongest movement of the suite. But its frank sentimentality, its nostalgic mood, that suggest a little the Largo of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, though there is no thematic resemblance, were by no means unappropriate to the occasion. For most in the audience this music must have proved deeply affecting, and it was played with a reverent expressiveness.

These memorial rites accomplished, conductor and orchestra turned their attention to the First Symphony of Schumann, so notably performed at the regular concerts of last week and afterwards to Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist, and to Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." The Capriccio, which has now made the rounds of each of the series of concerts and has been played at a Pension Fund Concert as well, was received yesterday with the enthusiasm that it has unfailingly provoked. Whether or not the piece is to be dismissed as mere contrivance, Stravinsky has here scored an unmistakable hit. In its turn, the brilliant performance of Strauss' tone poem was warmly received.

A MUSICAL LANDMARK

By UNA L. ALLEN, Boston Club

IN THIS year 1931 which marks the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, any account of that organization, no matter how brief, would be incomplete without a glance at its history.

Its foundation was due entirely to the vision and efforts of one man—Henry Lee Higginson. He it was who first conceived the idea of a symphony orchestra for America—for Boston, his home city; who outlined the plan whereby it should be financed and whereby concerts could be given at nominal prices; who organized the orchestra and chose the conductor and, above all, who guaranteed its permanent success by making up personally the deficit which is unavoidable with such an undertaking. For nearly forty years he continued to be its sponsor and guiding genius.

From an initial season of twenty Saturday evening concerts prefaced by a "public rehearsal" on Friday afternoons the schedule of the orchestra has grown to include a series of twenty-four pairs of Friday and Saturday concerts, a Monday evening and a Tuesday afternoon series of six concerts each—all in Boston; eight concerts in Cambridge, four in Providence, and five pairs of concerts each in New York and Brooklyn, besides occasional separate concerts in various places, and "Pops" in summertime, which are a story in themselves.

One long-established feature of the Friday afternoon concerts is "rush seats," a goodly section of unreserved seats which up till a few years ago were priced at twenty-five cents. Now they cost twice as much but their popularity remains undiminished. Every Friday afternoon, no matter what the weather, the steps of Symphony Hall are jammed with an expectant and hopeful mob that often waits hours for the opening of the doors. The great demand for these seats is only partially explained by their cheapness. It is also due to the fact that every series of Boston concerts is sold out long in advance, and if one does not own a season ticket one's opportunity for hearing the symphony depends largely upon the generosity of more fortunate friends who hold subscription tickets, or upon "going rush."

Symphony Hall is, by the way, the centre and heart of Boston's musical life, for it is not only the home of the orchestra but the scene of most of the major concerts given in the city. The excellent acoustic qualities of the auditorium, its atmosphere and individuality make it an ideal concert hall.

From the outset the orchestra has had a distinguished line of conductors: George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux, and now Serge Koussevitzky. Within a comparatively few years after its foundation it attained an artistic standing which earned it international recognition, and which, despite vicissitudes of one sort and another it has never lost. Today under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky it ranks

FINE ARTS MUSEUM
Symphonic Concert

The first of two concerts given annually in the Museum of Fine Arts was played last evening my a small orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. The players, according to advance notice, were 45 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The entire museum was open from 7 until 11. The orchestra played in the rotunda just at the head of the grand staircase on the Huntington-av side. Eager listeners quickly filled all available seats in the galleries leading off the rotunda, and many were obliged to stand throughout the concert. Late comers found it difficult to get anywhere near the orchestra.

The program, apparently designed to suit varied tastes, comprised the overture to Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, Mozart's G minor symphony, the "March to the Scaffold" section from Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony, the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," two Hungarian dances of Brahms and Johann Strauss' ever and justly loved waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube."

Mr Fiedler conducted with his usual effort and discrimination. It would be unfair to attempt to estimate the quality of the performance, for since the Art Museum obviously was not designed with the acoustic properties necessary to a concert hall in mind, much of the music sounded quite different from what it does in Symphony Hall, for example. The balance of the orchestral choirs was greatly distorted at times.

These concerts are exceedingly worth while, and the size and enthusiasm of last evening's audience would appear to prove conclusively that they are highly appreciated. They are open to the public and no admission fee is charged.

The next concert will be given by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr Archibald Davison, director, on May 12, at 8 p m.

Trans Apr 21

The just fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stretched as far as Japan. When the Prince and the Princess Takamatsu were planning their present American tour and including Boston in their itinerary, they resolved to hear one of its concerts. The Princess is a practised musician, fond of symphonic pieces. The Prince hears them contentedly.

Next Friday afternoon, they and their suite will be guests of the Trustees of the Orchestra at Symphony Hall. Normally the audience fills the house; but by the courtesy of various subscribers, eleven seats together have been found for them. Originally Dr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program for chorus and orchestra. Informed of the coming of musically minded guests, he rightly inferred that they would prefer to hear the orchestra unassisted. Accordingly, he remade the program to include Schubert's Symphony in C major; Griffes's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," for a piece from an American composer; the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." . . .

To cultivated Europeans Boston is better known by its orchestra of the first rank than by any other thing within it. To these Europeans add now the corresponding Japanese.

NN ITH HONY Cellist, Con-

urve, by driv wise endanger of the publi inished by rev The compara on our road le privilege o to protect the thou sands of others who are law-abidin citizens. The best way to show ou patriotism on Patriots' Day is b obeying the statutes, by driving a moderate speeds, safely and sanely.

Dr. Quinby Heads Harvard Medical School Grads

The Harvard Medical School Alumn Associat'on held its triennial reunio at the Harvard Medical School, yester day afternoon and last night. The two day meeting will be concluded thi morning, when the alumni will visi various hospitals in Greater Boston.

At the business meeting, yesterday afternoon, Dr. William C. Quinby o Brookline was chosen president of th association for the next three years, and Dr. William Breed of the Back Bay wa elected vice-president. Dr. James M Faulkner, secretary, and Dr. Augustu Thorndike, Jr., treasurer, were re-elect ed to office.

Three new councillors were also chosen at the business meeting. They are Dr. Francis M. Rackemann of th sonnel through these fifty years; a roll of "assisting artists." Professor Bliss Perry's address at the recent concert in memory of Henry Lee Higginson will also be included.

The Houghton Mifflin Company are the publishers and the book will be ready for issue during the week of April 27—May 2.

toforé, the galleries of the Museum will be open from seven o'clock through the evening. As usual again, admission is free.

The Juilliard School of Music will publish Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation," the music for orchestra, women's chorus and speaker played at the dedication, last February, of the new hall in Cleveland for its Symphony Orchestra. In a ludicrous "press-notice," best described as Erskinian, the Juilliard School civilly explains who Mr. Loeffler is.

Trans Apr 14

Goes big for flannel trousers, gray or white. Despises knickers. Swank, young, dashing, dark. World traveller—but especially Paris. Biggest social success among musicians in town. Rides around in a small coupe. Lives in bachelor quarters, Riviera, Huntington avenue. While he has many competitors, some intramusical disputes, temperament, you know, and that sort of thing, is remarkable, considering his position, for his lack of enemies.

Esplanade concerts his greatest achievement.

Items of the Day Trans Apr. 21

Mr. Piatigorsky, the new violoncellist, repeating Schumann's Concerto at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, carried all before him. The audience recalled him again and again. Orchestra, conductor and virtuoso exchanged the usual congratulations. The violoncello may be an unfashionable solo-instrument; but by no means is the race of eminent violoncellists at an end.

easily among the world's leading symphony orchestras.

To sum up the results Dr. Koussevitzky has achieved with his men in the seven years he has been in Boston no better description need be sought than that given by Alfred H. Meyer, of the Boston Transcript, whose distinguished reviews of the symphony concerts are widely quoted by program annotators throughout the country:

"Mr. Koussevitzky has trained his men to a state of finish that seems to many the last word of perfection . . . The Boston Symphony Orchestra of the present he has made into an instrument unexcelled in responsiveness to his utmost demands."

With such a group at his command Dr. Koussevitzky did not hesitate to outline brilliant plans for celebrating the semi-centennial.

The opening program of the year reproduced the orchestra's first concert, with Sir George Henschel, who made the trip from England expressly for the purpose, again conducting. The advancing season brought first performances of numbers by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, Copland, Hill, Carpenter, and Hanson, written especially for this orchestra. The Beethoven Festival given in Washington last December was another event of the jubilee year, and the Bach Festival in Boston was planned as the culminating feature. This included performances of the Mass in B Minor, the Magnificat, four Cantatas, two Brandenburg Concertos, two Suites, the Concerto for two violins, the piano concerto in D Minor, various numbers for harpischord and for organ. For these concerts the orchestra had the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and the Bach Cantata Club, besides a number of important soloists. On the second evening of the Festival, dedicated to the memory of Major Higginson, Bliss Perry, his close friend and biographer gave an address.

It is said that in the early days of the organization "as dull as a symphony program" was a by-word in Boston. Certainly that phrase is thoroughly out of date now. Whatever may be the complaints elsewhere that contemporary composers are not given a hearing, the accusation does not apply here. Very seldom does a "regular" program fail to show at least one, sometimes two, or even more new numbers—often first performances. Moreover, anything which Dr. Koussevitzky considers of particular worth he repeats, regardless of adverse comments by critics and audience! On certain occasions a work has been given twice on the same program, but usually the second performance is reserved until a few weeks later when the listeners may perhaps hear it in a different mood and with growing familiarity judge it afresh.

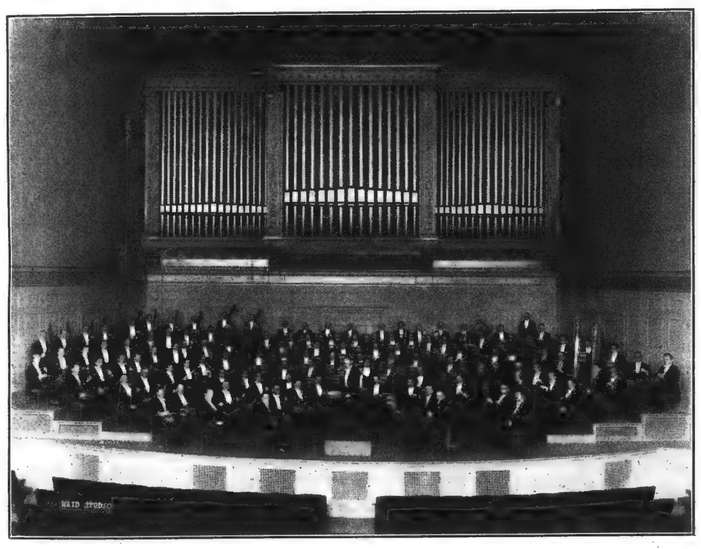
American composers, too, receive a just, even a generous, share of attention. The repertory of the orchestra includes works by Loeffler, Carpenter, Hill, Copland, Sessions, Steinert, Bloch, Gardner, Josten, Gruenberg, Eichheim, Chadwick and Foote, to list a few of the names that have appeared on recent programs.

To mention the fact that conservative Boston does not always greet these modern works—American or otherwise—with heartfelt enthusiasm is betraying no family secrets. Opinions are many and varied, and freely expressed, but Dr. Koussevitzky holds steadfastly to his artistic course, and when all is said and done Bostonians are inordinately and justifiably proud of their symphony orchestra and its brilliant conductor.



Concert-Chronicle

Griffes Remembered

IT IS the creditable habit of Dr. Koussevitzky not to let the end of a season sag. In such things he has keen sense of a conductor's obligation. Accordingly at the Symphony Concerts of next week he will revive Griffes's tone-poem, after Coleridge's verse, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan." Griffes, cut off in young prime, left no more characteristic or enduring work. In his lifetime Mr. Monteux discovered it; played it at Symphony Hall; repeated it—if recollection serves—after his death. It interested audiences and stirred reviewers as a finely sensitized and poetized music. More recently it fell into unwarranted neglect. Now Dr. Koussevitzky is bringing it back and in a new "edition"—that is to say as revised orchestrally by Frederick Stock, the Chicagoan conductor. In a note he explains the occasion and the nature of the changes:

I performed this work in Chicago in January, 1920. In the autumn of that year I had an opportunity of

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzy chose a Schumann program for this week's Symphony concerts, an honor seldom awarded these days to that composer's music. The "Manfred" overture, the concerto for violoncello, and the First Symphony adequately represent Schumann's work for orchestra. Thanks to the admirable playing of Gregor Piatigorsky, who made his first Boston appearance yesterday afternoon, the concerto was the most heartily applauded of the three pieces.

Mr Piatigorsky is a Russian, still in his 20s. He has served as first cellist in the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Fuertwangler, and toured extensively in Europe and America as a virtuoso. Yesterday's performance proved him a cellist of the first rank and a musician of eminence. The fine taste and the unobtrusive but very remarkable technical skill he showed were notable.

Between them he and Dr Kousse-

MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program, composed of works by Schumann, was as follows: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 129 (Gregor Piatigorsky, soloist) and Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, op. 38.

Yesterday afternoon's music served to dispel two platitudes: One, that the violoncello is inclined to be monotonous, to lack variety in tonal color; the other, that Schumann employs the idiom of the piano, when writing for other instruments, to such a degree that his compositions for orchestra are not effective. Mr. Piatigorsky quickly disproved the first. In his hands the violoncello vies with the violin in versatility. The depth and richness of its tone combined with its remarkable range make sharper contrasts possible, give it a character, while predominantly a melodic instrument, of being more than that. As for the sec-hestration is not matter! Despite music overflow-dy, spiced with iches of humor. ht and agile in ion is fine. He est sense of the in his techni-cile servant of mands and he with it. Taste n from becom-strument sings. turned phrases. Mr Piatigorsky ible. His regard ability to dove-aying with that instruments in is a constant ween the two—nship perhaps f his qualities. the result, for sitive accom-be desired. illiantly played. was embodied, g everything as champagne, aried humor. A does not run s—one theme ter, making a er one episode r, each almost utiful for its n for its bearith a stirring natic overture

uded enthusieated tonight. ek will be as ony in C ma-Pleasure Dome the poem of y, Suite from Fire-Bird"), a

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky honored the memory of the late George Whitefield Chadwick at the final Tuesday supplementary concert of this season yesterday afternoon, by playing the "Noel" movement from the noted American composer's suite, "Symphonic Sketches." Upon his first appearance before the orchestra Dr Koussevitzky bade the players rise; for a few moments they stood in silence, then resumed their seats and began the "Noel."

Possibly the reasons for the unexpected handclapping which occurred at the conclusion of the work was wholehearted admiration for Dr Koussevitzky's sympathetic and delicately beautiful reading, and for the exquisite, fine-textured scoring of the piece.

Schumann's first symphony, in B-flat major; Stravinsky's "Capriccio," in which Jesus Maria Sanroma played the piano solo, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," occupied the remainder of the program.

It truly seems as if Schumann unwittingly displayed, in this effervescent symphony, nearly all the weaknesses of his other music. The matter of the turgid, coarse-grained instrumentation aside, there remains Schumann's "long-windedness," his hysterical yet dull melodic material, his unrestrained romanticism that gushes outward and onward without reason or point.

Stravinsky's "Caprice," to judge from applause, is at least losing no favor. Yet on second thought, much of the handclapping yesterday undoubtedly was proffered in recognition of Mr Sanroma's excellent performance of the piano part. He plays with brilliance, of course, yet brilliance alone does not seem to account for his notable success with this piece. He recreates in his playing a spirit of jocularity and drollery with which the piano part, more than any other, is invested. And he has the gift of transmitting his musical feelings to his audience.

With the exception of the introductory chords, the first movement of the "Caprice" seems, to one listener, labored in treatment and sterile in thematic material. The second movement is as uninspired and dull. The concluding "Allegro capriccioso," however, is much better. There the manipulation of the material is interesting, the orchestral statements and answers are spontaneous. It is singular, however, that only the part allotted to the piano is consistently zestful and stimulating.

Strauss' tone poem, on the other hand, has all that the "Caprice" lacks. "Till" melodies have substance; there is variety of material and treatment; the work appears inspired from start to finish.

If Strauss used a system of instrumentation that is positively Gargantaun in scope and now out of fashion among composers, it nevertheless has merits that will endure, and "Till" remains a work of infinite beauty. Dr Koussevitzky's reading was, as usual in this work, a marvel of orchestral eloquence.

FINE ARTS MUSEUM
Symphonic Concert

The first of two concerts given annually in the Museum of Fine Arts was played last evening my a small orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. The players, according to advance notice, were 45 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.,

The entire museum was open from 7 until 11. The orchestra played in the rotunda just at the head of the grand staircase on the Huntington-av side. Eager listeners quickly filled all available seats in the galleries leading off the rotunda, and many were obliged to stand throughout the concert. Late comers found it difficult to get anywhere near the orchestra.

The program, apparently designed to suit varied tastes, comprised the overture to Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, Mozart's G minor symphony, the "March to the Scaffold" section from Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony, the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," two Hungarian dances of Brahms and Johann Strauss' ever and justly loved waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube."

Mr Fiedler conducted with his usual effort and discrimination. It would be unfair to attempt to estimate the quality of the performance, for since the Art Museum obviously was not designed with the acoustic properties necessary to a concert hall in mind, much of the music sounded quite different from what it does in Symphony Hall, for example. The balance of the orchestral choirs was greatly distorted at times.

These concerts are exceedingly worth while, and the size and enthusiasm of last evening's audience would appear to prove conclusively that they are highly appreciated. They are open to the public and no admission fee is charged.

The next concert will be given by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr Archibald Davison, director, on May 12, at 8 p m.

PLAY
OF TU
CO
Pnt

Symphony ute to at O

BY WARREN

The final Tues
cert of the season
yesterday, was tak
vitzky as the occ
pay tribute to the
George W. Chadw
of the programm
movement, the sec
from Mr. Chadwic
istic orchestral
"Symphonic Sketc
performance the chestra, at a signa
tor, rose and sto
with bowed heads.

REVERENT

It had been Dr.
inal intention to p
Sketches as whole
cert, and by such composer would ha
tingly remembered
from the strongest suite. But its fra
its nostalgic mood
little the Largo o
World" Symphony,
thematic resemblan
means unappropriat
For most in the a must have proved
and it was played expressiveness.

These memorial conductor and orch attention to the F
Schumann, so nota
the regular concerts
afterwards to Stra
for piano and orch
Maria Sanroma as Strauss' "Till Eu
Capriccio, which ha
rounds of each of certs and has been
sion Fund Concert
ceived yesterday wit
that it has unfa
Whether or not th
dismissed as mere vinsky has here scor
ble hit. In its turn,
formance of Strauss
warmly received.

Hans ap

The just fame
Symphony Orchest
as far as Japan. W
and the Princess T
planning their pr
tour and including itinerary, they re
one of its concerts.
is a practised mu
symphonic pieces
hears them conter

Next Friday a and their suite w
the Trustees of th
Symphony Hall.
audience fills the
the courtesy of v
bers, eleven seats
been found for th
Dr. Koussevitzky program for chor
tra. Informed of musically minded g
ly inferred that the
to hear the orches
Accordingly, he re
gram to include S
phony in C ma
"Pleasure-Dome of
for a piece from composer; the Suite
sky's ballet, "The
To cultivated Eur
is better known by
of the first rank
other thing within Europeans add no
ponding Japanese.

NN
ITH HONY

Cellist,
Con-

urve, by driv vise endanger of the publi
inished by rev
The compara on our road
e privilege o

f

motoring in order to protect the thou sands of others who are law-abidin citizens. The best way to show ou patriotism on Patriots' Day is b obeying the statutes, by driving a moderate speeds, safely and sanely.

Dr. Quinby Heads Harvard Medical School Grads

The Harvard Medical School Alumn
Association held its triennial reunio at the Harvard Medical School, yester day afternoon and last night. The two day meeting will be concluded thi morning, when the alumni will visi various hospitals in Greater Boston.

At the business meeting, yesterda afternoon, Dr. William C. Quinby o
Brookline was chosen president of th association for the next three years, and
Dr. William Breed of the Back Bay wa elected vice-president. Dr. James M
Faulkner, secretary, and Dr. Augustu Thorndike, Jr., treasurer, were re-elect ed to office.

Three new councillors were als chosen at the business meeting. The are Dr. Francis M. Rackemann of th

tofore, the galleries of the Museum will be open from seven o'clock through the evening. As usual again, admission is free.

The Juilliard School of Music will publish Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation," the music for orchestra, women's chorus and speaker played at the dedication, last February, of the new hall in Cleveland for its Symphony Orchestra. In a ludicrous press-notice," best described as Erskin-ian, the Juilliard School civilly explains who Mr. Loeffler is.

sonnel through these fifty years; a roll of "assisting artists." Professor Bliss Perry's address at the recent concert in memory of Henry Lee Higginson will also be included.

The Houghton Mifflin Company are the publishers and the book will be ready for issue during the week of April 27—May 2.

Hans apr 16

Goes big for flannel trousers, gray or white. Despises knickers. Swank, young, dashing, dark. World traveller—but especially Paris. Biggest social success among musicians in town. Rides around in a small coupe. Lives in bachelor quarters, Riviera, Huntington avenue. While he has many competitors, some intramusical disputes, temperament, you know, and that sort of thing, is remarkable, considering his position, for his lack of enemies.

Esplanade concerts his greatest achievement.

Items of the Day Hans apr. 21

Mr. Piatigorsky, the new violoncellist, repeating Schumann's Concerto at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, carried all before him. The audience recalled him again and again. Orchestra, conductor and virtuoso exchanged the usual congratulations. The violoncello may be an unfashionable solo-instrument; but by no means is the race of eminent violoncellists at an end.

FILMED AS BOUND

THE GREAT CATHEDRAL CHOIR

By MARVEL MCCORMICK, Mu Gamma

EVERY town and city in the country has something of which it boasts—it may be the city pride of its citizens, it may be its public school system. One little town in southern Illinois was proud of the fact that its high school rated as fourth best in the state; New York boasts of its financial prowess; Chicago of its Marshall Fields; Salt Lake City of its Tabernacle, and so on. Lincoln, Nebraska, also has its boasts, its beautiful new capitol is one of the most noted of its kind; many families move here for educational advantages; it has some beautiful new churches; William Jennings Bryan made his home here as well as Charles Dawes, and it is now the home of General Pershing.

Ten years ago some young people conceived the idea of forming a classical choir. Today this choir has come to rank as one of the most artistic and highly finished of its kind in the United States. From the beginning it has centered its efforts on A Cappella singing entirely, and for its repertoire has sought out the very finest literature. For the first few years it appeared in public very little; satisfied to keep it a study organization. But five years ago Lincoln built a beautiful church called Westminster. A magnificent Skinner organ was installed and they secured the services of the Great Cathedral Choir (formerly known as the Lincoln A Cappella Choir) to complete their musical program. This was something new for Lincoln—a choir singing entirely unaccompanied, whose membership was made up of students of the State University. It was an experiment, but it was not long before this church became famous for its beautiful music and today visitors come from many nearby cities to attend this unusual service. Just a few weeks ago one of America's finest organists attended the morning service at Westminster, and he told to his friends afterward that he had seldom witnessed anything more beautiful in any church in America, and to him it seemed a perfect union of religion and art. Though one may think of a choir as nothing more than a body of singers, when one hears this unique organization he is not only profoundly moved by the musical rendition, but by a remarkable attitude of devotion on the part of the singers. No wonder then, that Lincoln is proud of such a cultural institution; if it continues to grow, musical America will come to hold it in high esteem.

The director of the choir, John M. Rosborough, was graduated from Northwestern University in 1906 where he was a private student of Dean Emeritus, Peter Christian Lutkin for five years, and it was through hearing the renowned Northwestern A Cappella Choir that he received his first inspiration for this style of music. During his three years abroad his interest was further awakened in hearing the beautiful choirs of the cathedrals of England and those of Germany and France. On coming to Lincoln he made the friendship of Dr. F. Melius

Concert-Chronicle

Griffes Remembered

IT IS the creditable habit of Dr. Koussevitzky not to let the end of a season sag. In such things he has keen sense of a conductor's obligation. Accordingly at the Symphony Concerts of next week he will revive Griffes's tone-poem, after Coleridge's verse, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan." Griffes, cut off in young prime, left no more characteristic or enduring work. In his lifetime Mr. Monteux discovered it; played it at Symphony Hall; repeated it—if recollection serves—after his death. It interested audiences and stirred reviewers as a finely sensitized and poetized music. More recently it fell into unwarranted neglect. Now Dr. Koussevitzky is bringing it back and in a new "edition"—that is to say as revised orchestrally by Frederick Stock, the Chicagoan conductor. In a note he explains the occasion and the nature of the changes:

I performed this work in Chicago in January, 1920. In the autumn of that year I had an opportunity of

MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzy chose a Schumann program for this week's Symphony concerts, an honor seldom awarded these days to that composer's music. The "Manfred" overture, the concerto for violoncello, and the First Symphony adequately represent Schumann's work for orchestra. Thanks to the admirable playing of Gregor Piatigorsky, who made his first Boston appearance yesterday afternoon, the concerto was the most heartily applauded of the three pieces.

Mr Piatigorsky is a Russian, still in his 20s. He has served as first cellist in the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Fuertwangler, and toured extensively in Europe and America as a virtuoso. Yesterday's performance proved him a cellist of the first rank and a musician of eminence. The fine taste and the unobtrusive but very remarkable technical skill he showed were notable.

Between them he and Dr Kousse-

MU
SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program, composed of works by Schumann, was as follows: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 129 (Gregor Piatigorsky, soloist) and Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, op. 38.

Yesterday afternoon's music served to dispel two platitudes: One, that the violoncello is inclined to be monotonous, to lack variety in tonal color; the other, that Schumann employs the idiom of the piano, when writing for other instruments, to such a degree that his compositions for orchestra are not effective. Mr. Piatigorsky quickly disproved the first. In his hands the violoncello vies with the violin in versatility. The depth and richness of its tone combined with its remarkable range make sharper contrasts possible, give it a character, while predominantly a melodic instrument, of being more than that. As for the sec-hestration is not matter! Despite music overflow-dy, spiced with ches of humor. at and agile in ion is fine. He est sense of the l in his techni-cile servant of mands and he with it. Taste n from becom-strument sings. turned phrases. Mr Piatigorsky ible. His regard ability to dove-aying with that instruments in is a constant ween the two—nship perhaps f his qualities. the result, for isitive accom-be desired. illiantly played. was embodied, g everything as champagne, aried humor. A does not run s—one theme ier, making a er one episode r, each almost utiful for its n for its bear-ith a stirring natic overture uded enthusi-eated tonight. ek will be as ony in C ma-leasure Dome the poem of y, Suite from Fire-Bird"), a

MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky honored the memory of the late George Whitefield Chadwick at the final Tuesday supplementary concert of this season yesterday afternoon, by playing the "Noel" movement from the noted American composer's suite, "Symphonic Sketches." Upon his first appearance before the orchestra Dr Koussevitzky bade the players rise; for a few moments they stood in silence, then resumed their seats and began the "Noel."

Possibly the reasons for the unexpected handclapping which occurred at the conclusion of the work was wholehearted admiration for Dr Koussevitzky's sympathetic and delicately beautiful reading; and for the exquisite, fine-textured scoring of the piece.

Schumann's first symphony, in B-flat major; Stravinsky's "Capriccio," in which Jesus Maria Sanroma played the piano solo, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," occupied the remainder of the program.

It truly seems as if Schumann unwittingly displayed, in this effervescent symphony, nearly all the weaknesses of his other music. The matter of the turgid, coarse-grained instrumentation aside, there remains Schumann's "long-windedness," his hysterical yet dull melodic material, his unrestrained romanticism that gushes outward and onward without reason or point.

Stravinsky's "Caprice," to judge from applause, is at least losing no favor. Yet on second thought, much of the handclapping yesterday undoubtedly was proffered in recognition of Mr Sanroma's excellent performance of the piano part. He plays with brilliance, of course, yet brilliance alone does not seem to account for his notable success with this piece. He recreates in his playing a spirit of jocularity and drollery with which the piano part, more than any other, is invested. And he has the gift of transmitting his musical feelings to his audience.

With the exception of the introductory chords, the first movement of the "Caprice" seems, to one listener, labored in treatment and sterile in thematic material. The second movement is as uninspired and dull. The concluding "Allegro capriccioso," however, is much better. There the manipulation of the material is interesting, the orchestral statements and answers are spontaneous. It is singular, however, that only the part allotted to the piano is consistently zestful and stimulating.

Strauss' tone poem, on the other hand, has all that the "Caprice" lacks. "Till" melodies have substance; there is variety of material and treatment; the work appears inspired from start to finish.

If Strauss used a system of instrumentation that is positively Gargantaun in scope and now out of fashion among composers, it nevertheless has merits that will endure, and "Till" remains a work of infinite beauty. Dr Koussevitzky's reading was, as usual in this work, a marvel of orchestral eloquence.

FINE ARTS MUSEUM
Symphonic Concert

The first of two concerts given annually in the Museum of Fine Arts was played last evening my a small orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. The players, according to advance notice, were 45 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The entire museum was open from 7 until 11. The orchestra played in the rotunda just at the head of the grand staircase on the Huntington-av side. Eager listeners quickly filled all available seats in the galleries leading off the rotunda, and many were obliged to stand throughout the concert. Late comers found it difficult to get anywhere near the orchestra.

The program, apparently designed to suit varied tastes, comprised the overture to Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, Mozart's G minor symphony, the "March to the Scaffold" section from Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony, the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," two Hungarian dances of Brahms and Johann Strauss' ever and justly loved waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube."

Mr Fiedler conducted with his usual effort and discrimination. It would be unfair to attempt to estimate the quality of the performance, for since the Art Museum obviously was not designed with the acoustic properties necessary to a concert hall in mind, much of the music sounded quite different from what it does in Symphony Hall, for example. The balance of the orchestral choirs was greatly distorted at times.

These concerts are exceedingly worth while, and the size and enthusiasm of last evening's audience would appear to prove conclusively that they are highly appreciated. They are open to the public and no admission fee is charged.

The next concert will be given by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr Archibald Davison, director, on May 12, at 8 p m.

PLAY I... OF TU... CON...
Pvt. C...

Symphony ...
ute to C... at Op...

BY WARREN ST...

The final Tuesda... cert of the season, ... yesterday, was take... vitzky as the occas... pay tribute to the m... George W. Chadwi... of the programme ... movement, the secon... from Mr. Chadwick'... istic orchestral c... "Symphonic Sketch... performance the n... chestra, at a signal ... tor, rose and stood... with bowed heads.

REVERENTL...

It had been Dr. Ko... inal intention to pla... Sketches as whole a... cert, and by such ... composer would hav... tingly remembered. ... from the strongest ... suite. But its fran... its nostalgic mood, ... little the Largo of ... World" Symphony, th... thematic resemblanc... means unappropriate ... For most in the aud... must have proved ... and it was played ... expressiveness.

These memorial ri... conductor and orches... attention to the Fir... Schumann, so notabl... the regular concerts ... afterwards to Stravi... for piano and orches... Maria Sanroma as th... Strauss' "Till Eule... Capriccio, which has ... rounds of each of th... certs and has been p... sion Fund Concert a... ceived yesterday with ... that it has unfail... Whether or not the ... dismissed as mere co... vinsky has here score... ble hit. In its turn, t... formance of Strauss' ... warmly received.

Sam Ap...

The just fame ... Symphony Orchestra ... as far as Japan. W... and the Princess Ta... planning their pres... tour and including ... itinerary, they re... one of its concerts. ... is a practised mus... symphonic pieces. ... hears them content...

Next Friday af... and their suite will ... the Trustees of the ... Symphony Hall. ... audience fills the h... the courtesy of va... bers, eleven seats t... been found for ther... Dr. Koussevitzky ha... program for chorus ... tra. Informed of t... musically minded gu... ly inferred that they ... to hear the orchestr... Accordingly, he ren... gram to include Sch... phony in C ma... "Pleasure-Dome of K... for a piece from ... composer; the Suite f... sky's ballet, "The Fi...

To cultivated Euro... is better known by ... of the first rank t... other thing within ... Europeans add now ... ponding Japanese.

delightful program.

PIANO—
Berceuse ..... Ilyinsky
HERMENIA ELLIS JAMES

'CELLO—
Arioso ..... Bach
Scherzo ..... Von Goens
ROZELLA ZIEGLER HINTON
JOSEPHINE BEASLEY, Guest Accompanist

VOICE—
Sleep to Me No Rest is Bringing ..... Brahms
Impatience ..... Schubert
MILDRED SCOTT
ELTA OSTHOFF, Accompanist

'CELLO—
Hebrew Melody ..... Bantock
Tarantelle ..... Popper
ROZELLA ZIEGLER HINTON
JOSEPHINE BEASLEY, Guest Accompanist

PIANO—
Romance ..... Sibelius
HERMENIA ELLIS JAMES

Our second season draws to a close. Our annual meeting will be held in May and will be the final regular meeting. At this time the new officers will be installed. Those elected last night during the business session were the following: Eva Clement Franklin, president; Elta Osthoff, vice-president; Hermenia James, secretary; Lela Longman Rossey, treasurer; Rozella Hinton, warden, and Dorothy Ullrich, historian.

Much credit goes to our beloved out-going president, Edna Werdehoff, whose guidance has brought us through our first two years. We are still a small group but it would be hard to excel the spirit of loyalty and cooperation found in this Club. And we are already looking forward with eagerness and confidence to a "bigger and better" Club next year.

DOROTHY CECIL ULLRICH.

PHILADELPHIA CLUB

BIT by bit, we are gaining in the material things for the studio and it is begging to look like a real studio. We lack a few things and among them is a piano, but guess we shall have to renew our faith in the old adage, "Everything comes to those who wait," but in the meantime putting forth every effort possible, while we wait.

We had planned to have a bridge for February, each girl bringing a lunch packed for two, which was to be sold at auction. Being unable to attend this function personally, upon inquiry there seemed to be a bit of mysterious fun concerning it. I was finally able to fathom out that it turned into a glorious poker party.

Ruth Row Clutcher was the accompanist for Morris Braun, a well-known violinist of the city, who gave a concert under the auspices of the active chapter. They had glowing press notices, for both artists, and Mu Phil Epsilon.

We had hoped to spend a Sunday with the girls in the New York Club House. We were not able to carry out this plan, but will try to plan on it for next year. To tell the honest truth, we were too poor to make the trip.

Our musical tea given at the home of Madelle Eksergian, was a huge success. Following was the program given:

Andante ..... Loeillet
STRING TRIO
O Cessati di Piagarrimi ..... Scarlatti
Nel cor pin non mi sento ..... Paisiello
Voice, ADA BRITTON
Prayer ..... Wolf Ferrari
(From the Jewels of the Madonna)
Violin, HAZEL HARTMAN
Gavotte ..... Massanet
TRIO
Arias ..... Bach
'Cello, MADELLE EKSERGIAN
Over The Steppe ..... Gretchaninow
Lullaby ..... Gretchaninow
ADA BRITTON
Song of the Dale ..... Sanby
TRIO
Ballet dancing, GLORIA EKSERGIAN

I wish to especially mention the dancer as being the talented little daughter of Madelle's. We hope we may often have her to aid in our concerts.

The Trio play under the name of "Mu Phi." These girls have been giving benefit concerts for the club and we are hoping to soon hear them over station WIP in the near future.

At our March meeting it was moved and seconded to accept the report of the nominating committee, of re-electing the same officers for another year. We adjourned to meet at the home of Peggy Stever for our April meeting.

...sonnel through these fifty years; a roll of "assisting artists." Professor Bliss Perry's address at the recent concert in memory of Henry Lee Higginson will also be included.

The Houghton Mifflin Company are the publishers and the book will be ready for issue during the week of April 27—May 2.

...tofore, the galleries of the Museum will be open from seven o'clock through the evening. As usual again, admission is free.

The Juillard School of Music will publish Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation," the music for orchestra, women's chorus and speaker played at the dedication, last February, of the new hall in Cleveland for its Symphony Orchestra. In a ludicrous "press-notice," best described as Erskinian, the Juillard School civilly explains who Mr. Loeffler is.

Trans Apr 16

Goes big for flannel trousers, gray or white. Despises knickers. Swank, young, dashing, dark. World traveller—but especially Paris. Biggest social success among musicians in town. Rides around in a small coupe. Lives in bachelor quarters, Riviera, Huntington avenue. While he has many competitors, some intramusical disputes, temperament, you know, and that sort of thing, is remarkable, considering his position, for his lack of enemies. Espianade concerts his greatest achievement.

...f

...motoring in order to protect the thousands of others who are law-abiding citizens. The best way to show our patriotism on Patriots' Day is by obeying the statutes, by driving at moderate speeds, safely and sanely.

Dr. Quinby Heads Harvard Medical School Grads

The Harvard Medical School Alumni Association held its triennial reunion at the Harvard Medical School, yesterday afternoon and last night. The two-day meeting will be concluded this morning, when the alumni will visit various hospitals in Greater Boston.

At the business meeting, yesterday afternoon, Dr. William C. Quinby of Brookline was chosen president of the association for the next three years, and Dr. William Breed of the Back Bay was elected vice-president. Dr. James M. Faulkner, secretary, and Dr. Augustus Thorndike, Jr., treasurer, were re-elected to office.

Three new councillors were also chosen at the business meeting. They are Dr. Francis M. Rackemann of the

...NN
...ITH
...HONY
...Cellist,
...Con-

...urve, by driv...wise endanger... of the publ... nished by rev... The compara... on our road... e privilege o...

Items of the Day Trans Apr. 21

Mr. Piatigorsky, the new violoncellist, repeating Schumann's Concerto at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, carried all before him. The audience recalled him again and again. Orchestra, conductor and virtuoso exchanged the usual congratulations. The violoncello may be an unfashionable solo-instrument; but by no means is the race of eminent violoncellists at an end.

We will give the last program which will consist of each girl taking part, selecting her own part of the program. Unknown to Peggy, we are planning a "Lullaby" program for her future use.

Last, but not least, we have just been inspected by Alma Geiser. We were glad to be the hostess to such a gracious and charming guest. We had a very informal luncheon in our studio, where we told her all our trials and tribulations as well as all our good accomplishments. She then had dinner at the school as the guest of the active chapter, after which she had an interview with Mr. Coombs. The active girls had an initiation ceremony and a program was given by members of both active chapter and alumnæ club.

Since Ada Britton was confined to her home with a severe cold, she had Alma come to her home for lunch and to hear her report.

We all entertained at a dinner at the Warwick Hotel. A meeting was called at the studio to finish all remaining discussions and unfinished business.

I was unable to attend all of these functions and so have not the complete report of these meetings.

HELENE WEBER.

PITTSBURGH CLUB

OUR club has had two interesting meetings since the last report to THE TRIANGLE. The February meeting was a luncheon held in McCreery's dining room. In March, Jean Wickersham Zimmerman entertained in her very beautiful new home. Leone Marquis Woelfel sang several numbers and she was accompanied by Grace Hall. Plans are being made for a benefit bridge to be held this spring to raise money for the annual prize for composition which the Pittsburgh Alumnæ Club gives through the Art Society. Later in the spring, a musicale will be presented. Election of officers was also held at the March meeting. The following were elected:

President, Elizabeth Irwin; vice-president, Martha Brubaker Sutton; recording secretary, Berniece Thompson Caldwell; corresponding secretary, Elizabeth Storer; treasurer, Grace Hall; historian, Margaret Spaulding Stockdale; chaplain, Clara Griffith.

The Pittsburgh Club was honored by a visit from Phyllis Fergus, Iota Alpha, who was here for the meeting of the Pittsburgh branch of the League of American Pen Women.

Alta May Knapp, Mu Pi, was a visitor from the Cleveland Alumnæ chapter.

Louise Dicus, Sigma, was a guest of Bernice Austin.

Elizabeth Irwin gave a violin recital for a meeting of the American Association of University Women.

Janet Turner gave a violin recital for the Congress of Clubs. She has also been playing on various other programs.

Marjorie Spear Mather has moved to Elkins, West Virginia.

Carolyn Hunt was soloist at the Tuesday Musical Club.

Helen Machette was accompanist for a concert given by the Choral of the Twentieth Century Club.

Ruth Barnes (Mrs. Lee Hess), Chi, is a new member of our club.

ELIZABETH STORER.

ROCHESTER CLUB

ROCHESTER CLUB has had a busy year so far, and we are looking forward to still more interesting events to come.

Our Founders' Day celebration took the form of a very informal program and fancy dress party for Mu Upsilon chapter members. The program was hilarious and likewise the costumes, ranging anywhere from Apache dancers to Southern mammies!

Our plans for making money this year have included Benefit Bridge parties at the homes of the members, and home-made-candy sales in the lunch room of the Eastman School of Music. The bridge parties extended through the summer and into the fall and our last one took place at the lovely new home of Florence Bradley, just last month. It was lots of fun and there were lots of good eats, too!

In December we entertained Mu Upsilon's six initiates at tea, at the home of our treasurer, Helen Wilson Ferris, and it was so nice to make the acquaintance of these charming new Mu Phi sisters.

On the evening of January 26 we held our first Musicale of the year at the home of Helen

Concert-Chronicle

Griffes Remembered

IT IS the creditable habit of Dr. Koussevitzky not to let the end of a season sag. In such things he has keen sense of a conductor's obligation. Accordingly at the Symphony Concerts of next week he will revive Griffes's tone-poem, after Coleridge's verse, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan." Griffes, cut off in young prime, left no more characteristic or enduring work. In his lifetime Mr. Monteux discovered it; played it at Symphony Hall; repeated it —if recollection serves—after his death. It interested audiences and stirred reviewers as a finely sensitized and poetized music. More recently it fell into unwarranted neglect. Now Dr. Koussevitzky is bringing it back and in a new "edition"—that is to say as revised orchestrally by Frederick Stock, the Chicagoan conductor. In a note he explains the occasion and the nature of the changes:

> I performed this work in Chicago in January, 1920. In the autumn of that year I had an opportunity of meeting Mr. Griffes during a festival chamber-music at Pittsfield in assachusetts, when I suggested to m that the scoring of his work, some places, could be improved on. This he readily admitted, d we arranged to meet again in der to go over the score together. The results of this very careful crutiny are faithfully embodied in is revised version [published since Griffes's death]. Nothing has been dded that would not have been anctioned by the composer. I have o doubt that with these changes nd amplifications the orchestration ill "sound" more readily, and preent this very fine work to its very est advantage.

Schubert's Symphony in C major, ich Dr. Koussevitzky has played but ce—in a centenary program—through seven years in Boston, will fill the t half of these concerts. The third ce is the perennial Suite from Strasky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird."

grams in Prospect

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supmentary matinée of the Symphony chesta on Tuesday next:

mphony, No. 1, in B-flat major....Schumann bel" from the "Symphonic Sketches." Chadwick ece for Orchestra with Piano....Stravinsky (Pianist: Mr. Sanroma) o, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Strauss

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supmentary concert of the Symphony chestra on Monday evening, April 27, h the Cecilia, trained by Arthur Fiedfor assisting chorus:

e Rio Grande," for Orchestra, Piano and Chorus, Setting of the Like-Named Poem by Sacheverell Sitwell.....Lambert rodin," Ballet for Orchestra with Chorus.....N. Cherepnin mphony, No. 1, in C minor.....Brahms word of explanation as to both proms. The conductor, wishing to honor memory of Chadwick as composer teacher in Boston, finds "Noel," the nd of the "Symphonic Sketches," e feasible and more appropriate than whole four which he had originally nded to play. It is a warmly felt e bearing the name of the composer's nd son. . . . Stravinsky's "Caprice" ain repeated in deference to general est, various requests and Mr. Sanfs merit in that lively piece.

The Rio Grande" and "Borodin" were nally intended for performance on riday and a Saturday; then shifted, er stress of circumstances, to the final day. (As some believe, this Monday ence ranks next in receptive intelli-ce to that of Saturday.) "The Rio nde"—the Brazilian, not the Texan. r—is music of Constant Lambert, n the younger generation of English posers. Produced in London a year more ago, it kindled much interest received much praise for its imaginaingenuities with "symphonic jazz." ew York, last winter, it was less well ved. Of it and of "Borodin"—the ge of one Russian composer to her—more will be printed in this next week.

ents and Prospects

e Museum of Fine Arts announces nnual spring concert for Tuesday ng of next week, when Arthur Fiedill lead an orchestra from Symphony over a light program. As heretofore, the galleries of the Museum will open from seven o'clock through the ening. As usual again, admission is ee.

The Juillard School of Music will pubh Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation," the music r orchestra, women's chorus and speakplayed at the dedication, last Februy, of the new hall in Cleveland for its mphony Orchestra. In a ludicrous ress-notice," best described as Erskin, the Juillard School civilly explains o Mr. Loeffler is.

Goes big for flannel trousers, gray or white. Despises knickers. Swank, young, dashing, dark. World traveller —but especially Paris. Biggest social success among musicians in town. Rides around in a small coupe. Lives in bachelor quarters, Riviera, Huntington avenue. While he has many competitors, some intramusical disputes, temperament, you know, and that sort of thing, is remarkable, considering his position, for his lack of enemies.

Esplanade concerts his greatest achievement.

MUSIC

Globe Apr. 18

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzy chose a Schumann program for this week's Symphony concerts, an honor seldom awarded these days to that composer's music. The "Manfred" overture, the concerto for violoncello, and the First Symphony adequately represent Schumann's work for orchestra. Thanks to the admirable playing of Gregor Piatigorsky, who made his first Boston appearance yesterday afternoon, the concerto was the most heartily applauded of the three pieces.

Mr Piatigorsky is a Russian, still in his 20s. He has served as first cellist in the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Fuertwangler, and toured extensively in Europe and America as a virtuoso. Yesterday's performance proved him a cellist of the first rank and a musician of eminence. The fine taste and the unobtrusive but very remarkable technical skill he showed were notable.

Between them he and Dr Koussevitzky conveyed to the audience the full emotional warmth of Schumann's music. The many recalls for the soloist were richly deserved. Dr Koussevitzky, as is his custom, refrained from sharing Mr Piatigorsky's plaudits, though there was no doubt that many in the audience wished to clap conductor and orchestra as well as the soloist.

Schuman's Music

Schumann's music is less admired nowadays by musicians than it was 50 years ago. To his contemporaries, brought up on Haydn and Beethoven, his work seemed daringly original, but the greater daring and the more powerful originality of Wagner soon ranked Schumann with the musical conservatives.

That Schumann never learned to write effectively for orchestra is a commonplace of musical criticism. That his best work is to be found among his short pieces for piano, such as those in his opus 12; and among the songs, is now universally recognized. Nothing on yesterday's program is to be ranked with the "Aufschwung" for piano, or such songs as "Mondnacht," both of them masterpieces still deservedly beloved of concertgoers.

Much of the "Manfred" overture sounds labored and conventional to a generation which loves in Byron "only the short lyrics and the satirical "Don Juan." Much of the concerto for violoncello seems crabbed and formless to ears attuned to the rigorous style of Stravinsky or the elegance of Debussy. Even the B flat Symphony, for all the splendid vitality of its nobler passages contains much that seems repetitious and clumsy today. Nineteenth century German romanticism, is, in short, out of fashion.

Yet there is no denying the imaginative power back of Schumann's music. He is one of the great lyricists of music, incapable of the epic grandeur of Bach, the nobility of Beethoven, the dramatic intensity of Wagner, but unsurpassed in his own twilight realm of day dream and fantasy, of short-breathed shouts of exultation, of musing languors.

A Triumph

The fiftieth year of the Symphony Orchestra will be rounded with the publication of a complete history of its half century. Mr. M. A. De Wolfe Howe's "Boston Symphony Orchestra," published in 1914, brought such a chronicle to the beginning of the late war. He has now continued it through the troubled war-period to the withdrawal of Mr. Higginson from active control. Mr. J. N. Burk of the staff at Symphony Hall then takes the tale to the end of the current season.

To this narrative appendices will add a detailed list, with dates, of the numbers played at the regular concerts of the orchestra from October, 1881, to May, 1931; a roster of the personnel through these fifty years; a roll of "assisting artists." Professor Bliss Perry's address at the recent concert in memory of Henry Lee Higginson will also be included.

The Houghton Mifflin Company are the publishers and the book will be ready for issue during the week of April 27—May 2.

MU

Herald Apr 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program, composed of works by Schumann, was as follows: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 129 (Gregor Piatigorsky, soloist) and Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, op. 38.

Yesterday afternoon's music served to dispel two platitudes: One, that the violoncello is inclined to be monotonous, to lack variety in tonal color; the other, that Schumann employs the idiom of the piano, when writing for other instruments, to such a degree that his compositions for orchestra are not effective. Mr. Piatigorsky quickly disproved the first. In his hands the violoncello vies with the violin in versatility. The depth and richness of its tone combined with its remarkable range make sharper contrasts possible, give it a character, while predominantly a melodic instrument, of being more than that. As for the second—if Schumann's orchestration is not of the best, what does it matter! Despite the fact, he composed music overflowing with exquisite melody, spiced with varied rhythms and touches of humor.

Mr. Piatigorsky is light and agile in his bowing; his intonation is fine. He is a virtuoso in the highest sense of the word for he is interested in his technical skill only as the docile servant of music. The music commands and he obeys; he lets himself go with it. Taste that is flawless saves him from becoming sentimental. His instrument sings, richly sonorous, nicely turned phrases. Not only as soloist Mr Piatigorsky excels but also in ensemble. His regard for the other players, his ability to dovetail the phrase he is playing with that played by one or other instruments in the orchestra—for there is a constant interplay of themes between the two—proves his fine musicianship perhaps better than any other of his qualities. "Beauty truly blest" was the result, for Dr. Koussevitsky's sensitive accompaniment left nothing to be desired.

The Symphony was brilliantly played. In it the spirit of spring was embodied, then loosened sweeping everything before. It is effervescent as champagne, of changeful mood and varied humor. A definite plot, as it were, does not run through its movements—one theme germinating from another, making a closely knit whole. Rather one episode follows hard upon another, each almost complete in itself, beautiful for its intrinsic values more than for its bearing on the whole.

The concert opened with a stirring performance of the dramatic overture to Byron's "Manfred."

A large audience applauded enthusiastically.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C major, No. 7; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" (after the poem of S. T. Coleridge; Stravinsky, Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu ("The Fire-Bird"), a danced legend.

SCHUMANN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Piatigorsky, Cellist, Plays the Con-

wheat crust

line, by passing on a curve, by driving recklessly or otherwise endangering the lives and safety of the public will be prosecuted and punished by revocation of his license. The comparatively few bad actors on our road must be deprived of the privilege of motoring in order to protect the thousands of others who are law-abiding citizens. The best way to show our patriotism on Patriots' Day is by obeying the statutes, by driving at moderate speeds, safely and sanely.

Dr. Quinby Heads Harvard Medical School Grads

The Harvard Medical School Alumni Association held its triennial reunion at the Harvard Medical School, yesterday afternoon and last night. The two-day meeting will be concluded this morning, when the alumni will visit various hospitals in Greater Boston.

At the business meeting, yesterday afternoon, Dr. William C. Quinby of Brookline was chosen president of the association for the next three years, and Dr. William Breed of the Back Bay was elected vice-president. Dr. James M. Faulkner, secretary, and Dr. Augustus Thorndike, Jr., treasurer, were re-elected to office.

Three new councillors were also chosen at the business meeting. They are Dr. Francis M. Rackemann of the

Items of the Day Trans Apr. 21

Mr. Piatigorsky, the new violoncellist, repeating Schumann's Concerto at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, carried all before him. The audience recalled him again and again. Orchestra, conductor and virtuoso exchanged the usual congratulations. The violoncello may be an unfashionable solo-instrument; but by no means is the race of eminent violoncellists at an end.

MUSIC

Globe Apr 22

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky honored the memory of the late George Whitefield Chadwick at the final Tuesday supplementary concert of this season yesterday afternoon, by playing the "Noel" movement from the noted American composer's suite, "Symphonic Sketches." Upon his first appearance before the orchestra Dr Koussevitzky bade the players rise; for a few moments they stood in silence, then resumed their seats and began the "Noel."

Possibly the reasons for the unexpected handclapping which occurred at the conclusion of the work was wholehearted admiration for Dr Koussevitzky's sympathetic and delicately beautiful reading, and for the exquisite, fine-textured scoring of the piece.

Schumann's first symphony, in B-flat major; Stravinsky's "Capriccio," in which Jesus Maria Sanroma played the piano solo, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," occupied the remainder of the program.

It truly seems as if Schumann unwittingly displayed, in this effervescent symphony, nearly all the weaknesses of his other music. The matter of the turgid, coarse-grained instrumentation aside, there remains Schumann's "long-windedness," his hysterical yet dull melodic material, his unrestrained romanticism that gushes outward and onward without reason or point.

Stravinsky's "Caprice," to judge from applause, is at least losing no favor. Yet on second thought, much of the handclapping yesterday undoubtedly was proffered in recognition of Mr Sanroma's excellent performance of the piano part. He plays with brilliance, of course, yet brilliance alone does not seem to account for his notable success with this piece. He recreates in his playing a spirit of jocularity and drollery with which the piano part, more than any other, is invested. And he has the gift of transmitting his musical feelings to his audience.

With the exception of the introductory chords, the first movement of the "Caprice" seems, to one listener, labored in treatment and sterile in thematic material. The second movement is as uninspired and dull. The concluding "Allegro capriccioso," however, is much better. There the manipulation of the material is interesting, the orchestral statements and answers are spontaneous. It is singular, however, that only the part allotted to the piano is consistently zestful and stimulating.

Strauss' tone poem, on the other hand, has all that the "Caprice" lacks. "Till" melodies have substance; there is variety of material and treatment; the work appears inspired from start to finish.

If Strauss used a system of instrumentation that is positively Gargantaun in scope and now out of fashion among composers, it nevertheless has merits that will endure, and "Till" remains a work of infinite beauty. Dr Koussevitzky's reading was, as usual in this work, a marvel of orchestral eloquence.

FINE ARTS MUSEUM
Symphonic Concert

The first of two concerts given annually in the Museum of Fine Arts was played last evening my a small orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. The players, according to advance notice, were 45 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The entire museum was open from 7 until 11. The orchestra played in the rotunda just at the head of the grand staircase on the Huntington-av side. Eager listeners quickly filled all available seats in the galleries leading off the rotunda, and many were obliged to stand throughout the concert. Late comers found it difficult to get anywhere near the orchestra.

The program, apparently designed to suit varied tastes, comprised the overture to Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, Mozart's G minor symphony, the "March to the Scaffold" section from Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony, the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," two Hungarian dances of Brahms and Johann Strauss' ever and justly loved waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube."

Mr Fiedler conducted with his usual effort and discrimination. It would be unfair to attempt to estimate the quality of the performance, for since the Art Museum obviously was not designed with the acoustic properties necessary to a concert hall in mind, much of the music sounded quite different from what it does in Symphony Hall, for example. The balance of the orchestral choirs was greatly distorted at times.

These concerts are exceedingly worth while, and the size and enthusiasm of last evening's audience would appear to prove conclusively that they are highly appreciated. They are open to the public and no admission fee is charged.

The next concert will be given by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr Archibald Davison, director, on May 12, at 8 p m.

PLAY
OF TU
CON

Post

Symphony
ute to C at Op

BY WARREN S

The final Tuesd
cert of the season
yesterday, was tak
vitzky as the occa
pay tribute to the
George W. Chadw
of the programm
movement, the seco
from Mr. Chadwick
istic orchestral
"Symphonic Sketc
performance the chestra, at a signal
tor, rose and stoo
with bowed heads.

REVERENTI

It had been Dr. K
inal intention to pl
Sketches as whole
cert, and by such composer would ha
tingly remembered,
from the strongest
suite. But its fra
its nostalgic mood,
little the Largo o
World" Symphony,
thematic resemblan
means unappropriate
For most in the a must have proved
and it was played expressiveness.

These memorial r
conductor and orche
attention to the Fi
Schumann, so notal
the regular concerts
afterwards to Stra
for piano and orch
Maria Sanroma as t
Strauss' "Till Eu
Capriccio, which ha rounds of each of t certs and has been
sion Fund Concert
ceived yesterday wit
that it has unfa
Whether or not the dismissed as mere vinsky has here scor
ble hit. In its turn,
formance of Strauss'
warmly received.

Trans Apr

The just fame
Symphony Orchest
as far as Japan. W
and the Princess T
planning their pr
tour and including
itinerary, they re
one of its concerts.
is a practised mu
symphonic pieces
hears them conter

Next Friday a
and their suite w
the Trustees of th
Symphony Hall.
audience fills the
the courtesy of v
bers, eleven seats
been found for the
Dr. Koussevitzky
program for chor
tra. Informed of musically minded g
ly inferred that the
to hear the orches
Accordingly, he re
gram to include S
phony in C ma
"Pleasure-Dome of
for a piece from composer; the Suite
sky's ballet, "The F

To cultivated Eur
is better known by
of the first rank
other thing within Europeans add no
ponding Japanese.

h which will con-
selecting her own
wn to Peggy, we program for her

ve just been in-were glad to be s and charming nal luncheon in r all our trials
ll our good ac-
d dinner at the e chapter, after
th Mr. Coombs.
n ceremony and
rs of both active

ed to her home
na come to her r report. er at the War-
called at the iscussions and hese functions report of these

WEBER.

B

ting meetings
RIANGLE. The held in Mc-
Jean Wicker-er very beau-
Woelfel sang mpanied by le for a bene-raise money on which the through the
, a musicale
cers was also he following

ice-president,
ng secretary,
rresponding urer, Grace
g Stockdale;

The Pittsburgh Club was honored by a visit from Phyllis Fergus, Iota Alpha, who was here for the meeting of the Pittsburgh branch of the League of American Pen Women.

Alta May Knapp, Mu Pi, was a visitor from the Cleveland Alumnæ chapter.

Louise Dicus, Sigma, was a guest of Bernice Austin.

Elizabeth Irwin gave a violin recital for a meeting of the American Association of University Women.

Janet Turner gave a violin recital for the Congress of Clubs. She has also been playing on various other programs.

Marjorie Spear Mather has moved to Elkins, West Virginia.

Carolyn Hunt was soloist at the Tuesday Musical Club.

Helen Machette was accompanist for a concert given by the Choral of the Twentieth Century Club.

Ruth Barnes (Mrs. Lee Hess), Chi, is a new member of our club.

ELIZABETH STORER.

ROCHESTER CLUB

ROCHESTER CLUB has had a busy year so far, and we are looking forward to still more interesting events to come.

Our Founders' Day celebration took the form of a very informal program and fancy dress party for Mu Upsilon chapter members. The program was hilarious and likewise the costumes, ranging anywhere from Apache dancers to Southern mammies!

Our plans for making money this year have included Benefit Bridge parties at the homes of the members, and home-made-candy sales in the lunch room of the Eastman School of Music. The bridge parties extended through the summer and into the fall and our last one took place at the lovely new home of Florence Bradley, just last month. It was lots of fun and there were lots of good eats, too!

In December we entertained Mu Upsilon's six initiates at tea, at the home of our treasurer, Helen Wilson Ferris, and it was so nice to make the acquaintance of these charming new Mu Phi sisters.

On the evening of January 26 we held our first Musicale of the year at the home of Helen

Concert-Chronicle

Griffes Remembered

IT IS the creditable habit of Dr. Koussevitzky not to let the end of a season sag. In such things he has keen sense of a conductor's obligation. Accordingly at the Symphony Concerts of next week he will revive Griffes's tone-poem, after Coleridge's verse, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan." Griffes, cut off in young prime, left no more characteristic or enduring work. In his lifetime Mr. Monteux discovered it; played it at Symphony Hall; repeated it —if recollection serves—after his death. It interested audiences and stirred reviewers as a finely sensitized and poetized music. More recently it fell into unwarranted neglect. Now Dr. Koussevitzky is bringing it back and in a new "edition"—that is to say as revised orchestrally by Frederick Stock, the Chicagoan conductor. In a note he explains the occasion and the nature of the changes:

> I performed this work in Chicago in January, 1920. In the autumn of that year I had an opportunity of meeting Mr. Griffes during a festival of chamber-music at Pittsfield in Massachusetts, when I suggested to him that the scoring of his work, in some places, could be improved upon. This he readily admitted, and we arranged to meet again in order to go over the score together. The results of this very careful scrutiny are faithfully embodied in this revised version [published since Griffes's death]. Nothing has been added that would not have been sanctioned by the composer. I have no doubt that with these changes and amplifications the orchestration will "sound" more readily, and present this very fine work to its very best advantage.

Schubert's Symphony in C major, which Dr. Koussevitzky has played but once—in a centenary program—through the seven years in Boston, will fill the first half of these concerts. The third piece is the perennial Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird."

Programs in Prospect

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary matinée of the Symphony Orchesta on Tuesday next:

Haydn, No. 1, in B-flat major....Schumann
"Pan" from the "Symphonic Sketches,"
Chadwick
Concerto for Orchestra with Piano....Stravinsky
(Pianist: Mr. Sanroma)
Suite, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, April 27, with the Cecilia, trained by Arthur Fiedler, for assisting chorus:

"The Rio Grande," for Orchestra, Piano and Chorus, Setting of the Like-Named Poem by Sacheverell Sitwell.....Lambert
"Borodin," Ballet for Orchestra with Chorus.....N. Cherepnin
Symphony, No. 1, in C minor.....Brahms

A word of explanation as to both programs. The conductor, wishing to honor the memory of Chadwick as composer and teacher in Boston, finds "Noel," the second of the "Symphonic Sketches," the feasible and more appropriate than the whole four which he had originally intended to play. It is a warmly felt piece bearing the name of the composer's friend son. . . . Stravinsky's "Caprice" is again repeated in deference to general request, various requests and Mr. Sanroma's merit in that lively piece.

"The Rio Grande" and "Borodin" were originally intended for performance on Friday and a Saturday; then shifted, under stress of circumstances, to the final Monday. (As some believe, this Monday audience ranks next in receptive intelligence to that of Saturday.) "The Rio Grande"—the Brazilian, not the Texan river—is music of Constant Lambert, of the younger generation of English composers. Produced in London a year or more ago, it kindled much interest and received much praise for its imaginative ingenuities with "symphonic jazz." In New York, last winter, it was less well received. Of it and of "Borodin"—the ballet page of one Russian composer to another—more will be printed in this column next week.

Students and Prospects

The Museum of Fine Arts announces its annual spring concert for Tuesday evening of next week, when Arthur Fiedler will lead an orchestra from Symphony Hall over a light program. As heretofore, the galleries of the Museum will be open from seven o'clock through the evening. As usual again, admission is free.

The Juilliard School of Music will publish Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation," the music for orchestra, women's chorus and speaker played at the dedication, last February, of the new hall in Cleveland for its Symphony Orchestra. In a ludicrous "press-notice," best described as Erskinian, the Juilliard School civilly explains who Mr. Loeffler is.

Goes big for flannel trousers, gray or white. Despises knickers. Swank, young, dashing, dark. World traveller —but especially Paris. Biggest social success among musicians in town. Rides around in a small coupe. Lives in bachelor quarters, Riviera, Huntington avenue. While he has many competitors, some intramusical disputes, temperament, you know, and that sort of thing, is remarkable, considering his position, for his lack of enemies.

Esplanade concerts his greatest achievement.

• • • •

MUSIC
Boston Evening Transcript Apr. 16

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzy chose a Schumann program for this week's Symphony concerts, an honor seldom awarded these days to that composer's music. The "Manfred" overture, the concerto for violoncello, and the First Symphony adequately represent Schumann's work for orchestra. Thanks to the admirable playing of Gregor Piatigorsky, who made his first Boston appearance yesterday afternoon, the concerto was the most heartily applauded of the three pieces.

Mr Piatigorsky is a Russian, still in his 20s. He has served as first cellist in the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Fuertwangler, and toured extensively in Europe and America as a virtuoso. Yesterday's performance proved him a cellist of the first rank and a musician of eminence. The fine taste and the unobtrusive but very remarkable technical skill he showed were notable.

Between them he and Dr Koussevitzky conveyed to the audience the full emotional warmth of Schumann's music. The many recalls for the soloist were richly deserved. Dr Koussevitzky, as is his custom, refrained from sharing Mr Piatigorsky's plaudits, though there was no doubt that many in the audience wished to clap conductor and orchestra as well as the soloist.

Schuman's Music

Schumann's music is less admired nowadays by musicians than it was 50 years ago. To his contemporaries, brought up on Haydn and Beethoven, his work seemed daringly original, but the greater daring and the more powerful originality of Wagner soon ranked Schumann with the musical conservatives.

That Schumann never learned to write effectively for orchestra is a commonplace of musical criticism. That his best work is to be found among his short pieces for piano, such as those in his opus 12; and among the songs, is now universally recognized. Nothing on yesterday's program is to be ranked with the "Aufschwung" for piano, or such songs as "Mondnacht," both of them masterpieces still deservedly beloved of concertgoers.

Much of the "Manfred" overture sounds labored and conventional to a generation which loves in Byron only the short lyrics and the satirical "Don Juan." Much of the concerto for violoncello seems crabbed and formless to ears attuned to the rigorous style of Stravinsky or the elegance of Debussy. Even the B flat Symphony, for all the splendid vitality of its nobler passages contains much that seems repetitious and clumsy today. Nineteenth century German romanticism, is, in short, out of fashion.

Yet there is no denying the imaginative power back of Schumann's music. He is one of the great lyricists of music, incapable of the epic grandeur of Bach, the nobility of Beethoven, the dramatic intensity of Wagner, but unsurpassed in his own twilight realm of day dream and fantasy, of short-breathed shouts of exultation, of musing languors.

A Triumph

The fiftieth year of the Symphony Orchestra will be rounded with the publication of a complete history of its half century. Mr. M. A. De Wolfe Howe's "Boston Symphony Orchestra," published in 1914, brought such a chronicle to the beginning of the late war. He has now continued it through the troubled war-period to the withdrawal of Mr. Higginson from active control. Mr. J. N. Burk of the staff at Symphony Hall then takes the tale to the end of the current season.

To this narrative appendices will add a detailed list, with dates, of the numbers played at the regular concerts of the orchestra from October, 1881, to May, 1931; a roster of the personnel through these fifty years; a roll of "assisting artists." Professor Bliss Perry's address at the recent concert in memory of Henry Lee Higginson will also be included.

The Houghton Mifflin Company are the publishers and the book will be ready for issue during the week of April 27—May 2.

MU
Hera Apr 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program, composed of works by Schumann, was as follows: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 129 (Gregor Piatigorsky, soloist) and Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, op. 38.

Yesterday afternoon's music served to dispel two platitudes: One, that the violoncello is inclined to be monotonous, to lack variety in tonal color; the other, that Schumann employs the idiom of the piano, when writing for other instruments, to such a degree that his compositions for orchestra are not effective. Mr. Piatigorsky quickly disproved the first. In his hands the violoncello vies with the violin in versatility. The depth and richness of its tone combined with its remarkable range make sharper contrasts possible, give it a character, while predominantly a melodic instrument, of being more than that. As for the second—if Schumann's orchestration is not of the best, what does it matter! Despite the fact, he composed music overflowing with exquisite melody, spiced with varied rhythms and touches of humor.

Mr. Piatigorsky is light and agile in his bowing; his intonation is fine. He is a virtuoso in the highest sense of the word for he is interested in his technical skill only as the docile servant of music. The music commands and he obeys; he lets himself go with it. Taste that is flawless saves him from becoming sentimental. His instrument sings, richly sonorous, nicely turned phrases. Not only as soloist Mr Piatigorsky excels but also in ensemble. His regard for the other players, his ability to dovetail the phrase he is playing with that played by one or other instruments in the orchestra—for there is a constant interplay of themes between the two—proves his fine musicianship perhaps better than any other of his qualities. "Beauty truly blest" was the result, for Dr. Koussevitsky's sensitive accompaniment left nothing to be desired.

The Symphony was brilliantly played. In it the spirit of spring was embodied, then loosened sweeping everything before. It is effervescent as champagne, of changeful mood and varied humor. A definite plot, as it were, does not run through its movements—one theme germinating from another, making a closely knit whole. Rather one episode follows hard upon another, each almost complete in itself, beautiful for its intrinsic values more than for its bearing on the whole.

The concert opened with a stirring performance of the dramatic overture to Byron's "Manfred."

A large audience applauded enthusiastically.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C major, No. 7; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" (after the poem of S. T. Coleridge; Stravinsky, Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu ("The Fire-Bird"), a danced legend.

SCHUMANN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Piatigorsky, Cellist, Plays the Con-

wheat crust

line, by passing on a curve, by driving recklessly or otherwise endangering the lives and safety of the public will be prosecuted and punished by revocation of his license. The comparatively few bad actors on our roads must be deprived of the privilege of motoring in order to protect the thousands of others who are law-abiding citizens. The best way to show our patriotism on Patriots' Day is by obeying the statutes, by driving at moderate speeds, safely and sanely.

Dr. Quinby Heads Harvard Medical School Grads

The Harvard Medical School Alumni Association held its triennial reunion at the Harvard Medical School, yesterday afternoon and last night. The two-day meeting will be concluded this morning, when the alumni will visit various hospitals in Greater Boston.

At the business meeting, yesterday afternoon, Dr. William C. Quinby of Brookline was chosen president of the association for the next three years, and Dr. William Breed of the Back Bay was elected vice-president. Dr. James M. Faulkner, secretary, and Dr. Augustus Thorndike, Jr., treasurer, were re-elected to office.

Three new councillors were also chosen at the business meeting. They are Dr. Francis M. Rackemann of the [illegible] president; Dr. Will-

Items of the Day Trans Apr. 21

Mr. Piatigorsky, the new violoncellist, repeating Schumann's Concerto at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, carried all before him. The audience recalled him again and again. Orchestra, conductor and virtuoso exchanged the usual congratulations. The violoncello may be an unfashionable solo-instrument; but by no means is the race of eminent violoncellists at an end.

MUSIC
Boston Evening Transcript Apr 22

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky honored the memory of the late George Whitefield Chadwick at the final Tuesday supplementary concert of this season yesterday afternoon, by playing the "Noel" movement from the noted American composer's suite, "Symphonic Sketches." Upon his first appearance before the orchestra Dr Koussevitzky bade the players rise; for a few moments they stood in silence, then resumed their seats and began the "Noel."

Possibly the reasons for the unexpected handclapping which occurred at the conclusion of the work was wholehearted admiration for Dr Koussevitzky's sympathetic and delicately beautiful reading, and for the exquisite, fine-textured scoring of the piece.

Schumann's first symphony, in B-flat major; Stravinsky's "Capriccio," in which Jesus Maria Sanroma played the piano solo, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," occupied the remainder of the program.

It truly seems as if Schumann unwittingly displayed, in this effervescent symphony, nearly all the weaknesses of his other music. The matter of the turgid, coarse-grained instrumentation aside, there remains Schumann's "long-windedness," his hysterical yet dull melodic material, his unrestrained romanticism that gushes outward and onward without reason or point.

Stravinsky's "Caprice," to judge from applause, is at least losing no favor. Yet on second thought, much of the handclapping yesterday undoubtedly was proffered in recognition of Mr Sanroma's excellent performance of the piano part. He plays with brilliance, of course, yet brilliance alone does not seem to account for his notable success with this piece. He recreates in his playing a spirit of jocularity and drollery with which the piano part, more than any other, is invested. And he has the gift of transmitting his musical feelings to his audience.

With the exception of the introductory chords, the first movement of the "Caprice" seems, to one listener, labored in treatment and sterile in thematic material. The second movement is as uninspired and dull. The concluding "Allegro capriccioso," however, is much better. There the manipulation of the material is interesting, the orchestral statements and answers are spontaneous. It is singular, however, that only the part allotted to the piano is consistently zestful and stimulating.

Strauss' tone poem, on the other hand, has all that the "Caprice" lacks. "Till" melodies have substance; there is variety of material and treatment; the work appears inspired from start to finish.

If Strauss used a system of instrumentation that is positively Gargantaun in scope and now out of fashion among composers, it nevertheless has merits that will endure, and "Till" remains a work of infinite beauty. Dr Koussevitzky's reading was, as usual in this work, a marvel of orchestral eloquence.

FINE ARTS MUSEUM
Symphonic Concert

The first of two concerts given annually in the Museum of Fine Arts was played last evening my a small orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. The players, according to advance notice, were 45 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The entire museum was open from 7 until 11. The orchestra played in the rotunda just at the head of the grand staircase on the Huntington-av side. Eager listeners quickly filled all available seats in the galleries leading off the rotunda, and many were obliged to stand throughout the concert. Late comers found it difficult to get anywhere near the orchestra.

The program, apparently designed to suit varied tastes, comprised the overture to Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, Mozart's G minor symphony, the "March to the Scaffold" section from Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony, the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," two Hungarian dances of Brahms and Johann Strauss' ever and justly loved waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube."

Mr Fiedler conducted with his usual effort and discrimination. It would be unfair to attempt to estimate the quality of the performance, for since the Art Museum obviously was not designed with the acoustic properties necessary to a concert hall in mind, much of the music sounded quite different from what it does in Symphony Hall, for example. The balance of the orchestral choirs was greatly distorted at times.

These concerts are exceedingly worth while, and the size and enthusiasm of last evening's audience would appear to prove conclusively that they are highly appreciated. They are open to the public and no admission fee is charged.

The next concert will be given by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr Archibald Davison, director, on May 12, at 8 p m.

PLAY LAST OF TUESDAY CONCERTS

Post Apr 22

Symphony Pays Tribute to Chadwick at Opening

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The final Tuesday Symphony concert of the season, which took place yesterday, was taken by Dr. Koussevitzky as the occasion on which to pay tribute to the memory of the late George W. Chadwick. At the head of the programme stood a single movement, the second, by title "Noel," from Mr. Chadwick's most characteristic orchestral composition, the "Symphonic Sketches." Before the performance the men of the orchestra, at a signal from the conductor, rose and stood for a moment with bowed heads.

REVERENTLY PLAYED

It had been Dr. Koussevitzky's original intention to play the Symphonic Sketches as whole at yesterday's concert, and by such performance the composer would have been more fittingly remembered. "Noel" is far from the strongest movement of the suite. But its frank sentimentality, its nostalgic mood, that suggest a little the Largo of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, though there is no thematic resemblance, were by no means unappropriate to the occasion. For most in the audience this music must have proved deeply affecting, and it was played with a reverent expressiveness.

These memorial rites accomplished, conductor and orchestra turned their attention to the First Symphony of Schumann, so notably performed at the regular concerts of last week and afterwards to Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist, and to Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." The Capriccio, which has now made the rounds of each of the series of concerts and has been played at a Pension Fund Concert as well, was received yesterday with the enthusiasm that it has unfailingly provoked. Whether or not the piece is to be dismissed as mere contrivance, Stravinsky has here scored an unmistakable hit. In its turn, the brilliant performance of Strauss' tone poem was warmly received.

Trans Apr. 21

The just fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stretched as far as Japan. When the Prince and the Princess Takamatsu were planning their present American tour and including Boston in their itinerary, they resolved to hear one of its concerts. The Princess is a practised musician, fond of symphonic pieces. The Prince hears them contentedly.

Next Friday afternoon, they and their suite will be guests of the Trustees of the Orchestra at Symphony Hall. Normally the audience fills the house; but by the courtesy of various subscribers, eleven seats together have been found for them. Originally Dr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program for chorus and orchestra. Informed of the coming of musically minded guests, he rightly inferred that they would prefer to hear the orchestra unassisted. Accordingly, he remade the program to include Schubert's Symphony in C major; Griffes's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," for a piece from an American composer; the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." . . .

To cultivated Europeans Boston is better known by its orchestra of the first rank than by any other thing within it. To these Europeans add now the corresponding Japanese.

Mu Phi Epsilon Triangle [April n which will con-

selecting her own own to Peggy, we program for her ave just been ine were glad to be us and charming rmal luncheon in ler all our trials

ll our good ac-
d dinner at the ve chapter, after ith Mr. Coombs.
on ceremony and ers of both active

ed to her home
lma come to her
r report.
ner at the War-
called at the discussions and these functions report of these

E WEBER.

UB

sting meetings
TRIANGLE. The on held in Mc-
, Jean Wicker-
her very beau-
Woelfel sang companied by de for a bene-to raise money
tion which the
through the ng, a musicale
ficers was also
The following

ice-president,
ding secretary,
corresponding asurer, Grace
ng Stockdale;

'The Pittsburgh Club was honored by a visit from Phyllis Fergus, Iota Alpha, who was here for the meeting of the Pittsburgh branch of the League of American Pen Women.

Alta May Knapp, Mu Pi, was a visitor from the Cleveland Alumnæ chapter.

Louise Dicus, Sigma, was a guest of Bernice Austin.

Elizabeth Irwin gave a violin recital for a meeting of the American Association of University Women.

Janet Turner gave a violin recital for the Congress of Clubs. She has also been playing on various other programs.

Marjorie Spear Mather has moved to Elkins, West Virginia.

Carolyn Hunt was soloist at the Tuesday Musical Club.

Helen Machette was accompanist for a concert given by the Choral of the Twentieth Century Club.

Ruth Barnes (Mrs. Lee Hess), Chi, is a new member of our club.

ELIZABETH STORER.

ROCHESTER CLUB

ROCHESTER CLUB has had a busy year so far, and we are looking forward to still more interesting events to come.

Our Founders' Day celebration took the form of a very informal program and fancy dress party for Mu Upsilon chapter members. The program was hilarious and likewise the costumes, ranging anywhere from Apache dancers to Southern mammies!

Our plans for making money this year have included Benefit Bridge parties at the homes of the members, and home-made-candy sales in the lunch room of the Eastman School of Music. The bridge parties extended through the summer and into the fall and our last one took place at the lovely new home of Florence Bradley, just last month. It was lots of fun and there were lots of good eats, too!

In December we entertained Mu Upsilon's six initiates at tea, at the home of our treasurer, Helen Wilson Ferris, and it was so nice to make the acquaintance of these charming new Mu Phi sisters.

On the evening of January 26 we held our first Musicale of the year at the home of Helen

Concert-Chronicle

Griffes Remembered

IT IS the creditable habit of Dr. Koussevitzky not to let the end of a season sag. In such things he has keen sense of a conductor's obligation. Accordingly at the Symphony Concerts of next week he will revive Griffes's tone-poem, after Coleridge's verse, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan." Griffes, cut off in young prime, left no more characteristic or enduring work. In his lifetime Mr. Monteux discovered it; played it at Symphony Hall; repeated it—if recollection serves—after his death. It interested audiences and stirred reviewers as a finely sensitized and poetized music. More recently it fell into unwarranted neglect. Now Dr. Koussevitzky is bringing it back and in a new "edition"—that is to say as revised orchestrally by Frederick Stock, the Chicagoan conductor. In a note he explains the occasion and the nature of the changes:

> I performed this work in Chicago in January, 1920. In the autumn of that year I had an opportunity of meeting Mr. Griffes during a festival of chamber-music at Pittsfield in Massachusetts, when I suggested to him that the scoring of his work, in some places, could be improved upon. This he readily admitted, and we arranged to meet again in order to go over the score together. The results of this very careful scrutiny are faithfully embodied in this revised version [published since Griffes's death]. Nothing has been added that would not have been sanctioned by the composer. I have no doubt that with these changes and amplifications the orchestration will "sound" more readily, and present this very fine work to its very best advantage.

Schubert's Symphony in C major, which Dr. Koussevitzky has played but once—in a centenary program—through seven years in Boston, will fill the first half of these concerts. The third piece is the perennial Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird."

Programs in Prospect

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary matinée of the Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday next:

Suite No. 1, in B-flat major.....Schumann (Played from the "Symphonic Sketches.")
.....Chadwick
Concerto for Orchestra with Piano.....Stravinsky
(Pianist: Mr. Sanroma)
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
.....Strauss

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, April 27, with the Cecilia, trained by Arthur Fiedler, for assisting chorus:

"Rio Grande," for Orchestra, Piano and Chorus, Setting of the Like-Named Poem by Sacheverell Sitwell.....Lambert
Violin, Ballet for Orchestra with Chorus.....N. Cherepnin
Symphony, No. 1, in C minor.....Brahms

A word of explanation as to both programs. The conductor, wishing to honor the memory of Chadwick as composer and teacher in Boston, finds "Noel," the second of the "Symphonic Sketches," a possible and more appropriate than the whole from which he had originally intended to play. It is a warmly felt tribute bearing the name of the composer's admission, as architect for the yet-to-be-built Rindge Technical School which is to be built in Cambridge.

The appointment followed closely after City Solicitor Thomas F. Sullivan had said that the mayor had the appointive power. School Committeeman Russell A. Wood had previously contended that the school committee had the right to share in making the selection.

First "Open Night" at Harvard Observatory

The Harvard Astronomical Observatory held the first of its four annual spring "open nights" at the observatory last night. Visitors were allowed to view the night spectacles through the observatory telescopes, and Bart J. Bok, Harvard instructor in astronomy, gave a public address on the size of the universe.

Man Boy to Yale Freshman Council

To the Transcript:

New Haven, Conn., April 16—Charles Elliott, of 119 Grasmere street, Newton, today was elected a member of the Freshmen Student Council at Yale. Elliott is the son of Charles M. Elliott, graduated from Yale in 1909.

Index of futility: learning German in order able to discuss the relativity theory with Professor Einstein. [Los An-

MUSIC
Christian Sci. Mon. Apr. 18

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzy chose a Schumann program for this week's Symphony concerts, an honor seldom awarded these days to that composer's music. The "Manfred" overture, the concerto for violoncello, and the First Symphony adequately represent Schumann's work for orchestra. Thanks to the admirable playing of Gregor Piatigorsky, who made his first Boston appearance yesterday afternoon, the concerto was the most heartily applauded of the three pieces.

Mr Piatigorsky is a Russian, still in his 20s. He has served as first cellist in the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Fuertwangler, and toured extensively in Europe and America as a virtuoso. Yesterday's performance proved him a cellist of the first rank and a musician of eminence. The fine taste and the unobtrusive but very remarkable technical skill he showed were notable.

Between them he and Dr Koussevitzky conveyed to the audience the full emotional warmth of Schumann's music. The many recalls for the soloist were richly deserved. Dr Koussevitzky, as is his custom, refrained from sharing Mr Piatigorsky's plaudits, though there was no doubt that many in the audience wished to clap conductor and orchestra as well as the soloist.

Schuman's Music

Schumann's music is less admired nowadays by musicians than it was 50 years ago. To his contemporaries, brought up on Haydn and Beethoven, his work seemed daringly original, but the greater daring and the more powerful originality of Wagner soon ranked Schumann with the musical conservatives.

That Schumann never learned to write effectively for orchestra is a commonplace of musical criticism. That his best work is to be found among his short pieces for piano, such as those in his opus 12; and among the songs, is now universally recognized. Nothing on yesterday's program is to be ranked with the "Aufschwung" for piano, or such songs as "Mondnacht," both of them masterpieces still deservedly beloved of concertgoers.

Much of the "Manfred" overture sounds labored and conventional to a generation which loves in Byron only the short lyrics and the satirical "Don Juan." Much of the concerto for violoncello seems crabbed and formless to ears attuned to the rigorous style of Stravinsky or the elegance of Debussy. Even the B flat Symphony, for all the splendid vitality of its nobler passages contains much that seems repetitious and clumsy today. Nineteenth century German romanticism, is, in short, out of fashion.

Yet there is no denying the imaginative power back of Schumann's music. He is one of the great lyricists of music, incapable of the epic grandeur of Bach, the nobility of Beethoven, the dramatic intensity of Wagner, but unsurpassed in his own twilight realm of day dream and fantasy, of short-breathed shouts of exultation, of musing languors.

A Triumph

Dr Koussevitzy's readings of Schumann are invariably eloquent, always emotional, always dramatic. But they do not do full justice to his moodiness, his waywardness, his peculiar personal imagination. There is always a hint of strangeness, even of madness, in Schumann's music. It has neither the essential sanity nor the solidity of the work of his disciple Brahms. It is this romantic strangeness that one misses in such readings of Schumann as those given us yesterday.

The orchestra sounded magnificently yesterday. The strings, in particular, had a glowing intensity, a richness that struck even ears familiar with the excellences of the Boston Symphony. It was a triumph to make music so ill written for orchestra sound so well.

The program for next week includes Schubert's C major Symphony, Griffes' "Khubla Khan," and the suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird." P. R.

Gossip of the Town

Tel Apr. 22

Arthur Fiedler, our flashlight biography for today: Best known individual member Boston Symphony orchestra long before he became its Pops conductor. Falls short by two years' intensive musical study, his friends say, of being one of the country's outstanding second-string symphony leaders. Sympathetic with popular musical taste and not inclined to be highbrow in his programmes. So easy to approach that Symphony players call him by first name.

Goes big for flannel trousers, gray or white. Despises knickers. Swank, young, dashing, dark. World traveller—but especially Paris. Biggest social success among musicians in town. Rides around in a small coupe. Lives in bachelor quarters, Riviera, Huntington avenue. While he has many competitors, some intramusical disputes, temperament, you know, and that sort of thing, is remarkable, considering his position, for his lack of enemies.

Esplanade concerts his greatest achievement.

MU
Herald Apr. 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program, composed of works by Schumann, was as follows: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 129 (Gregor Piatigorsky, soloist) and Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, op. 38.

Yesterday afternoon's music served to dispel two platitudes: One, that the violoncello is inclined to be monotonous, to lack variety in tonal color; the other, that Schumann employs the idiom of the piano, when writing for other instruments, to such a degree that his compositions for orchestra are not effective. Mr. Piatigorsky quickly disproved the first. In his hands the violoncello vies with the violin in versatility. The depth and richness of its tone combined with its remarkable range make sharper contrasts possible, give it a character, while predominantly a melodic instrument, of being more than that. As for the second—if Schumann's orchestration is not of the best, what does it matter! Despite the fact, he composed music overflowing with exquisite melody, spiced with varied rhythms and touches of humor.

Mr. Piatigorsky is light and agile in his bowing; his intonation is fine. He is a virtuoso in the highest sense of the word for he is interested in his technical skill only as the docile servant of music. The music commands and he obeys; he lets himself go with it. Taste that is flawless saves him from becoming sentimental. His instrument sings, richly sonorous, nicely turned phrases. Not only as soloist Mr Piatigorsky excels but also in ensemble. His regard for the other players, his ability to dovetail the phrase he is playing with that played by one or other instruments in the orchestra—for there is a constant interplay of themes between the two—proves his fine musicianship perhaps better than any other of his qualities. "Beauty truly blest" was the result, for Dr. Koussevitsky's sensitive accompaniment left nothing to be desired.

The Symphony was brilliantly played. In it the spirit of spring was embodied, then loosened sweeping everything before. It is effervescent as champagne, of changeful mood and varied humor. A definite plot, as it were, does not run through its movements—one theme germinating from another, making a closely knit whole. Rather one episode follows hard upon another, each almost complete in itself, beautiful for its intrinsic values more than for its bearing on the whole.

The concert opened with a stirring performance of the dramatic overture to Byron's "Manfred."

A large audience applauded enthusiastically.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C major, No. 7; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" (after the poem of S. T. Coleridge; Stravinsky, Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu ("The Fire-Bird"), a danced legend.

SCHUMANN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Piatigorsky, Cellist, Plays the Concerto

Tel Apr. 18

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That orchestral rarity, an all-Schumann programme, made the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. In order of performance, though not of interest, the pieces were the "Overture" to "Manfred," the Concerto for Violon-cello, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, and the First Symphony.

THE "SPRING" SYMPHONY

It is possible to read that the "Manfred" Overture is the finest, the most successful of Schumann's orchestra pieces. Yet in yesterday's performance it was overshadowed by the Symphony, written seven years before. To be sure, this "Spring" Symphony is one of Dr. Koussevitzy's happiest ventures. At his hands the work undergoes a veritable re-creation; other conductors do not make of it all that he makes of it.

But for the matter of that, Dr. Koussevitzky directed yesterday a singularly sympathetic performance of the Overture, which heretofore he had led only at a Tuesday afternoon concert. There was abundant realization of the music's poetic content, its romantic ardor. No, it is not a matter of interpretation, but of orchestration. The scoring of the Overture is thick and monotonous; the strings are employed too constantly, the wind instruments, when they appear, are ineffectively handled. Virtually all of the important thematic material is assigned to the first violins. And as a result Schumann's intrinsically appealing ideas fail to make their rightful effect.

Of Mr. Piatigorsky, a young Russian giant who displays an uncommon mastery over the 'cello, reviewers in New York, where he was heard last season, have written ecstatically. The more the pity, then, that he chose as the vehicle for his Boston debut so unrewarding a work as this Concerto of Schumann, which is saved from utter and complete dullness only by the expressive slow division. From his playing yesterday it was chiefly to be gathered that Mr. Piatigorsky is an excellent musician, that he has an admirable control of the 'cello's often treacherous tone and that his technique was more than adequate to any demands that Schumann's piece laid upon him. He was warmly received by an audience that, in turn, lavished applause upon infinitely fresher music of the Symphony.

Items of the Day

Trans Apr. 21

Mr. Piatigorsky, the new violoncellist, repeating Schumann's Concerto at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, carried all before him. The audience recalled him again and again. Orchestra, conductor and virtuoso exchanged the usual congratulations. The violoncello may be an unfashionable solo-instrument; but by no means is the race of eminent violoncellists at an end.

MUSIC
Christian Sci. Mon. Apr. 22

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky honored the memory of the late George Whitefield Chadwick at the final Tuesday supplementary concert of this season yesterday afternoon, by playing the "Noel" movement from the noted American composer's suite, "Symphonic Sketches." Upon his first appearance before the orchestra Dr Koussevitzky bade the players rise; for a few moments they stood in silence, then resumed their seats and began the "Noel."

Possibly the reasons for the unexpected handclapping which occurred at the conclusion of the work was wholehearted admiration for Dr Koussevitzky's sympathetic and delicately beautiful reading, and for the exquisite, fine-textured scoring of the piece.

Schumann's first symphony, in B-flat major; Stravinsky's "Capriccio," in which Jesus Maria Sanroma played the piano solo, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," occupied the remainder of the program.

It truly seems as if Schumann unwittingly displayed, in this effervescent symphony, nearly all the weaknesses of his other music. The matter of the turgid, coarse-grained instrumentation aside, there remains Schumann's "long-windedness," his hysterical yet dull melodic material, his unrestrained romanticism that gushes outward and onward without reason or point.

Stravinsky's "Caprice," to judge from applause, is at least losing no favor. Yet on second thought, much of the handclapping yesterday undoubtedly was proffered in recognition of Mr Sanroma's excellent performance of the piano part. He plays with brilliance, of course, yet brilliance alone does not seem to account for his notable success with this piece. He recreates in his playing a spirit of jocularity and drollery with which the piano part, more than any other, is invested. And he has the gift of transmitting his musical feelings to his audience.

With the exception of the introductory chords, the first movement of the "Caprice" seems, to one listener, labored in treatment and sterile in thematic material. The second movement is as uninspired and dull. The concluding "Allegro capriccioso," however, is much better. There the manipulation of the material is interesting, the orchestral statements and answers are spontaneous. It is singular, however, that only the part allotted to the piano is consistently zestful and stimulating.

Strauss' tone poem, on the other hand, has all that the "Caprice" lacks. "Till" melodies have substance; there is variety of material and treatment; the work appears inspired from start to finish.

If Strauss used a system of instrumentation that is positively Gargantaun in scope and now out of fashion among composers, it nevertheless has merits that will endure, and "Till" remains a work of infinite beauty. Dr Koussevitzky's reading was, as usual in this work, a marvel of orchestral eloquence.

FINE ARTS MUSEUM
Symphonic Concert

The first of two concerts given annually in the Museum of Fine Arts was played last evening my a small orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. The players, according to advance notice, were 45 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The entire museum was open from 7 until 11. The orchestra played in the rotunda just at the head of the grand staircase on the Huntington-av side. Eager listeners quickly filled all available seats in the galleries leading off the rotunda, and many were obliged to stand throughout the concert. Late comers found it difficult to get anywhere near the orchestra.

The program, apparently designed to suit varied tastes, comprised the overture to Mendelssohn's "Midsum-

PLAY LAST OF TUESDAY CONCERTS

Pat Apr. 22

Symphony Pays Tribute to Chadwick at Opening

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The final Tuesday Symphony concert of the season, which took place yesterday, was taken by Dr. Koussevitzky as the occasion on which to pay tribute to the memory of the late George W. Chadwick. At the head of the programme stood a single movement, the second, by title "Noel," from Mr. Chadwick's most characteristic orchestral composition, the "Symphonic Sketches." Before the performance the men of the orchestra, at a signal from the conductor, rose and stood for a moment with bowed heads.

REVERENTLY PLAYED

It had been Dr. Koussevitzky's original intention to play the Symphonic Sketches as whole at yesterday's concert, and by such performance the composer would have been more fittingly remembered. "Noel" is far from the strongest movement of the suite. But its frank sentimentality, its nostalgic mood, that suggest a little the Largo of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, though there is no thematic resemblance, were by no means unappropriate to the occasion. For most in the audience this music must have proved deeply affecting, and it was played with a reverent expressiveness.

These memorial rites accomplished, conductor and orchestra turned their attention to the First Symphony of Schumann, so notably performed at the regular concerts of last week and afterwards to Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist, and to Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." The Capriccio, which has now made the rounds of each of the series of concerts and has been played at a Pension Fund Concert as well, was received yesterday with the enthusiasm that it has unfailingly provoked. Whether or not the piece is to be dismissed as mere contrivance, Stravinsky has here scored an unmistakable hit. In its turn, the brilliant performance of Strauss' tone poem was warmly received.

Trans Apr. 21

The just fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stretched as far as Japan. When the Prince and the Princess Takamatsu were planning their present American tour and including Boston in their itinerary, they resolved to hear one of its concerts. The Princess is a practised musician, fond of symphonic pieces. The Prince hears them contentedly.

Next Friday afternoon, they and their suite will be guests of the Trustees of the Orchestra at Symphony Hall. Normally the audience fills the house; but by the courtesy of various subscribers, eleven seats together have been found for them. Originally Dr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program for chorus and orchestra. Informed of the coming of musically minded guests, he rightly inferred that they would prefer to hear the orchestra unassisted. Accordingly, he remade the program to include Schubert's Symphony in C major; Griffes's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," for a piece from an American composer; the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." . . .

To cultivated Europeans Boston is better known by its orchestra of the first rank than by any other thing within it. To these Europeans add now the corresponding Japanese.

MU

HERALD
apr 22

MUSIC AT THE MUSEUM

A contingent of 45 men from the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler, gave a concert last night at the Museum of Fine Arts. Seated in the Rotunda, it played for a vast audience disposed in various galleries and rooms throughout the adjacent portions of the museum, amid pictures, statuary, tapestries, oriental screens and so forth. It was an audience of which probably the greater part could neither see the orchestra nor be seen by it, but heard the music filtering through corridors and down stairways and echoing in distant arches. The reviewer listened in a room tenanted largely by plaster casts of Greek statues. A dancing satyr, the discus-thrower, the small boy eternally extracting a thorn from his foot, Apollo and Minerva, a host of their companions stood or crouched or sat frozen into absorbed attention. They rustled no programs, neither did they cough or sneeze or chatter.

The program that Mr. Fiedler had compiled for this concert comprised Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mozart's G minor symphony, the March to the Scaffold from Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," two of Brahms's Hungarian dances and Johann Strauss's "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz. The shimmering fairy music of Mendelssohn's overture took on a new glamor and a new mystery, diffused through marble balustrades and gently veiled in faintly echoing distance. The silver sheen of the prelude to "Lohengrin" was also rendered still more enchanting by the circumstances of its setting and the accoustic properties of the place. The imperishable charm of the "Blue Danube" was felt yet more strongly than in the concert hall.

Of Mozart's G minor symphony it was the slower portions, particularly the lovely andante, that reached the ear most gratefully in this place. The faster movements—though Mr. Fiedler was discreet in his avoidance of excesses of speed—suffered from the blending and blurring induced by the museum's echoing halls; fine details, the softly curved ends of phrases, were often lost to those hearers who were not in the immediate vicinity of the players. The March to the Scaffold—so lugubriously effective when heard in its due place in Berlioz' symphony, seemed here ineffectual, somehow deprived of its characteristic dry grotesquerie. Brahms's Hungarian dances, played vivaciously, were as enjoyable as ever.

The abundant applause made the scattered audience's reaction to the concert unmistakeable. Next year's concert—for this appears to be an annual occurrence that is becoming as indispensable as the Pops themselves—will be anticipated with pleasure.

It is announced that a free concert by the Harvard Glee Club will be given in the museum on the evening of Tuesday, May 12, at 8 o'clock. S. S.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sixth and last concert of the Tuesday afternoon series, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: George W. Chadwick, "Noel," from the Symphonic Sketches. Schumann, Symphony in B flat major, op. 38. Stravinsky, Capriccio for piano and orchestra. Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the old-fashioned, roguish manner, in rondo form, Op. 28.

"Noel," from the Symphonic Sketches, was played in memory of the composer. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it left none of its loveliness wanting. The exquisite pianissimo with which it opened grew by a sequence of delicate gradation into the tranquil climax, then was hushed—a marvel in tonal balance. The calm tempo was singularly appropriate.

Pehhaps because it came right after this serene nocturne the Schumann Symphony seemed even more delightful than usual in its exuberance and the freshness and variety of its many themes.

Mr. Sanroma played Stravinsky's Capriccio with fine understanding of the content. No touch of humor escaped him; no sardonic thrust missed the mark. Clear cut phrases, snapped out in tones that were never harsh. Dr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment was brilliant repartee to the pianist's incisive and rhythmic playing.

If he had not already got it in Stravinsky's Capriccio, the devil was certainly given his due. Till Eulenspiegel's marked resemblance cannot be gainsaid—in Strauss's tone-poem. The gorgeousness of Strauss's orchestration—that glitters no less in wit than in heroic outpourings—Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation made no less than dazzling bringing out in sharp relief the quirks and curious turns of Till's character portrayed so graphically in the score.

Though too inert to follow the orchestra's example in rising to pay tribute to the memory of Mr. Chadwick, the large audience applauded enthusiastically both Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Sanroma. L. B. D.

Dr. Koussevitzky has enlarged the program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday to include "The Rio Grande," tone-poem for orchestra, chorus and piano solo, by the young Londoner, Constant Lambert. The Cecilia will provide the choir. Mr. Sanromá will play the piano-part. The piece has been much praised for the skill and imagination of its "symphonic jazz." Behind it is a poem by Sacheverell Sitwell.

N. B. The Rio Grande is the Brazilian, not the Texan, river.

Next autumn Miss Garden will cultivate the concert-hall. She is taking cue from her successful concert in New York last October when she sang many songs of Debussy. Now she proposes to do likewise with the symphony orchestras. Already she is booked for a pair of Symphony Concerts at Boston early in December—with a Debussyan program. His setting of Rossetti's "Blessed Damozel" will be the chief item.

With a Bit of His Music for Memory

A Bow to George W. Chadwick As a Symphonic Series Reaches End

THE last concert of the Tuesday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—held yesterday—was also the occasion of honoring the memory of the late George W. Chadwick. First upon the program stood the "Noel" from his Symphonic Sketches. When Dr. Koussevitzky reached his podium, the men rose to their feet, remained standing a moment in reverent attitude, were seated, after which came "Noel." For the rest the program contained Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B-flat, known also as the Spring Symphony, and played at the concerts of the last week-end; Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Sanroma as soloist; Strauss's rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Mr. Chadwick's "Noel"—Andante con tenerezza—deals not with the exuberant joy so often associated with Christmas but has for its motto a poem of the "dreamless slumber" of the Holy Child, "while angel hosts were listening." The program-book described it as a nocturne. It is a simple melody, direct and straightforward, but very expressive, that is developed, rises to an ecstatic climax. Oboe and English horn, occasionally a solo violin, in the climax a trumpet, carry the burden of the melody. Very expressively, "con amore" Dr. Koussevitzky and his men played it yesterday.

The symphony of the Spring is one of the conductor's rarest achievements. It is also Schumann in his most characteristic manner—or perhaps better, his most characteristic manners. Schumann, the naïve builder of forms and maker of even more naive introductions and interludes: Schumann, the composer of heartfelt melodies that can only be described by those two untranslatable German words, "schwärmerisch" and "innig"; Schumann, the inventor of rhythms both buoyant and ardent, rhythms light but propulsive, rhythms which in this case are perfect expression for the joy and the thrill and the exuberance of spring. One is also told by those who have profound wisdom in such matters, that Schumann's orchestration is faulty. Of such faults Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting leaves scarcely a trace. One hears no muddiness of effect, no turgidity of utterance, no hidden or obscured significant matter. Schumann's faults Dr. Koussevitzky puts aside. Schumann's naivetes under the conductor's hand become virtues; Schumann's virtues become marvels of musical and expressive effect. How Dr. Koussevitzky delights in those simple melodies and how they sing for him! How he works magic with the rhythms of a scherzo, even more those of a finale!

With Stravinsky's Capriccio further hearing tends only to further clarify its lines. One is aware first of all (save possibly in the rhapsodic Andante) of Stravinsky as flawless formalist. He builds not according to tradition, but the sense of proportion and of pleasant balancing of the several parts is strong upon one as one listens to the Capriccio. The most frequent objections made to it, that its material is "insignificant," is (terrible thought!) "frivolous," or (worse still!) that it "smacks of music-halls," may very possibly be taken by Stravinsky and his admirers for positive virtues of the work. Indeed why should they not? Since when is it necessary that "frivolity" (let us say) be musically damned? It is not what an artist expresses, but the way in which he does his job, that counts for or against him. If it were not so, most operas, a large part of Shakspeare, would have to go by the board. The æsthetic fallacy of a hierachy of ideas, of assorted ideas of graded values has been exploded too thoroughly to require renewed rebuttal. The Stravinsky who suggests light modern hearts at light modern play can hardly be considered the less an artist for his pains. Indeed, some of those who dabble in composition would be quick to assert that it is more of an achievement to paint a musical picture of fun—just fun—than to evoke soul plumbing tragedies. Some such conclusions yesterday's audience must also have reached. For the applause was tremendous and subsided not until conductor and pianist, individually and together, and finally the whole orchestra had made bowing acknowledgment.

The performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" exceedingly graphic, exceedingly brilliant, was fitting close to one of the happiest of the several series of concerts which the orchestra annually gives. A. H. M.

Y, APRIL 22, 1931

M DEBUT

Symphony in Brilliant Concert

By MOSES SMITH

ORCHESTRAL playing of almost surpassing brilliance featured the last concert of the Tuesday matinee series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky. The program began with "Noel," from George W. Chadwick's Symphonic Sketches. The performance was in the nature of a memorial to one of the few great American composers, who died two weeks ago. This charming Christmas song was delightfully played.

Schumann's first symphony, Stravinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" were the other numbers on the program. The Symphony was performed even more beautifully than it had been at last week's subscription concerts. In the Capriccio, the most successful novelty of the year—it has appeared on four programs—the pianist was as usual the capable, self-effacing Jesus Maria Sanroma. The colorful performance of the Strauss work was the more remarkable in that it had received (we were told) no rehearsal.

* * *

A program of orchestral music was given at the Museum of Fine Arts last evening by a group of players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Arthur Fiedler. Thousands thronged the various galleries surrounding the rotunda where the players were seated. Mozart's G minor symphony was the principal number of the well played list. The slowly-advancing sonorities of Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin" seemed to us the most favored by the tricky acoustics of the Museum. In the other works the echoes of the wind tones tended to muffle succeeding string tones though not violently.

Music

APR. 22

Tuesday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its final Tuesday concert of the season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program opened with the "Noël" from the "Symphonic Sketches" of George W. Chadwick, played in memory of the composer, after the orchestra had stood for a moment in silent tribute. Though described by its author as "a little Christmas song," this piece proved to be singularly appropriate for the occasion. Built on a lovely theme for the English horn, it is a work of nostalgic beauty. It was conducted and performed with devoted attention.

Otherwise the program consisted of compositions which have become part of the familiar repertory of the Koussevitzkyan concerts—Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." The current interpretations of all these pieces have been commented on in these columns at no remote date. It was interesting to observe that not only the Schumann and the Strauss items, but Stravinsky's trivial but amusing piece caught the fancy of the Tuesday subscribers. The accomplished Mr. Sanromá was recalled until Dr. Koussevitzky came out with him to bring the orchestra to its feet. We have a notion, though, that Stravinsky's little musical pleasantry is going to pall as quickly as Ravel's notorious "Bolero."

The more enduring musical pranks of Strauss brought to a close a notably successful series. L. A. S.

ROYAL PAIR WILL AVOID FORMALITY

Prince and Princess Takamatsu to Roam City at Will

TO ATTEND CONCERT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Guests of Mayor at Dinner Tomorrow Night

POST
apr 23

Itinerary of Prince and Princess Today

7:00 p. m.—Arrive South Station. Reception at terminal. Photographs at station.

7:25 p. m.—Arrive Copley-Plaza Hotel.

7:40 p. m.—Interview with newspapermen.

7:50 p. m.—Photographs, silent movies only.

Remainder of vening private to royal guests.

That they may roam incognito through Boston stores, slip into the "talkies" and visit at random some of the curious sights of the city, Prince and Princess Takamatsu of Japan, who arrive in Boston tonight, have had their five-day programme here well interspersed with "no engagements." More so than most distinguished visitors to the city they will be given ample time to roam about unmolested.

Takamatsu today.

Continued From First Page

Upon their arrival at 7 o'clock tonight they will be met at South Station by a reception committee headed by Courtenay Crocker, honorary consul of Japan at Boston. Representatives of city and State, the army and navy and prominent Japanese residents of the city will be present. Miss Mary Curley, daughter of Mayor Curley, will present the distinguished guests with a bouquet of flowers.

Following a short exchange of official greetings, the royal pair will be escorted to the Copley-Plaza Hotel where they will occupy the Presidential suite.

With a visit to Governor Ely, at the State House, and Mayor Curley at City Hall tomorrow morning, the five-day programme for the Prince and Princess will be launched. In the afternoon they will attend the Symphony Concert in Symphony Hall. Tomorrow night Mayor Curley is tendering the imperial couple a dinner at the Copley-Plaza at which the Prince will make his first official address.

The rest of the programme consists of a round of visits to historical points of interest, a luncheon at Harvard University, dinners and a highly formal reception at the Gardner Museum Saturday night.

Concert-Chronicle

apr 24 Trans.

Boston vs. Philadelphia

WE Bostonians may rest content with Stravinsky's "Œdipus Rex" as oratorio, in the concert-hall. (It is said that Dr. Koussevitzky will bring to pass next season his long-promised repetition.) We may also renew a proper pride in the Harvard Glee Club as men's chorus to the Symphony Orchestra. . . . Last Tuesday and Wednesday evenings in the Metropolitan Opera House at New York Mr. Stokowski repeated his stage-performances of "Œdipus Rex" and of Prokofiev's ballet, "The Rhythm of Steel." As seen and heard in Philadelphia they have already been described in this place. A paragraph or two from the reviewers in New York is still in place. They were not kind and they were frank. Said Mr. Gilmon in The Herald Tribune:

"Stravinsky's 'Œdipus Rex' was not new to this capital. Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, aided by Dr. Davison's celebrated Harvard choristers and at least one of the soloists who sang Tuesday night, performed the music of the 'opera-oratorio' at Carnegie Hall a little over three years ago. For the sake of those who are in a hurry and wish to be brought expeditiously to the point, let it be said that the imaginative impact of Stravinsky's music, its power of evocation and suggestion, its power to release the emotions, was far greater in the concert performance of March 8, 1928, with Œdipus in a tailcoat, Jocasta in a Paris gown, and the chorus of Theban Elders immaculate in Cantabrigian boiled shirts, than it was in last night's stage productoin.

"Stravinsky's music has been discussed at length in these columns, and may be permitted to rest in peace so far as this commentator is concerned. It remains only to be said that the next time we listen to Stravinsky's remarkable score we hope that it will be without benefit of heroic marionettes, costumed choristers, and a darkened stage. Better a dinner of concert-herbs where imagination is than a stalled dramatic ox and futility therewith."

And Mr. Henderson in The Sun: "Stravinsky's long and lugubrious treatment of one of the most powerful stories of the ancient Greek stage has been discussed before and may be again, but not today. It was not as compelling last evening as it was when done in concert-form in Carnegie Hall. The fifteen-foot puppets were skilfully constructed and handled with discretion, but they added nothing to the value of the music. The solo voices did not sound as well as they did in the concert. The vocal star of the performance was the Harvard Glee Club, which sang the choruses superbly. The audience made no imposing display of emotion after the impressive finale, the strongest page in the score. In fact, the production seemed to fall flat."

To conclude from the Times: "The performance? It had high and distinguishing features, one of which was the singing of the Harvard Club, so admirably trained by Dr. Davison, and, while confessedly an amateur organization, eloquent for Stravinsky's and for Mr. Stokowski's purposes. His performance was theatrical in a high degree, as it was also, in many pages, a free departure from the letter and various indications of the score. It had its justification in its salient dramatic effect and its shortcomings where it demanded a more reposeful style and classic line. All the parts were well co-ordinated, even when they were not brilliantly executed. But when all is said and done, the concert performance of 'Œdipus' was the true interpretation of the piece."

New: First Time

A. H. M. hands the department a brief note about the Suite, "Borodine," to be played for the first time hereabouts at the supplementary Symphony Concert next Monday. "Little information is discoverable. The concert-piece is drawn from a work entitled 'Ballet Borodine' by the Russian composer Nicolai Cherepnin, best known to Americans for his part in the revision of Musorgsky's 'Fair at Sorotchinzy.' The suite runs through these seven numbers: 1. Introduction—Revery; 2. Scherzo—First General Dance, and Trio 'for the Ballerina'; 3. Comic Serenade (to be omitted); 4. Entrance of Leander—'The Serenade,' with viola solo; 5. Scene of the Phantom of the Ballerina; 6. Scherzo and Second General Dance (also to be omitted); 7. Farewell Scene, in which a bass clarinet has a prominent part. The music is in light ballet style. The orchestra is of moderate size. There are parts for chorus. As in "The Rio Grande," the chorus of The Cecilia will assist."

Incidents and Prog

PRINCE LAUDS CITY FOR GIFTS TO COUNTRYMEN

Takamatsu, Honored at Brilliant Dinner, Stresses Cultural Aid

ROYAL PAIR SPEND STRENUOUS DAY

Received by Governor and Mayor—Attend Symphony Concert

Their imperial highnesses, the Prince and Princess Takamatsu of Japan, yesterday fulfilled a major part of their announced determination to see all phases of American life by rushing through a round of the official, musical and social life of Boston.

They were bustled through crowds at the State House and City Hall in the morning, during the afternoon listened to the strains of a Boston symphony concert, and last night were guests of honor at a banquet given by Mayor Curley and attended by 500 distinguished leaders in the social and political life of the city.

PRINCE'S ONLY ADDRESS

The elaborate dinner, for which the ballroom of the Copley-Plaza Hotel was brilliant with the colors of the United States and Japan and decorated with a profusion of spring flowers, brought forth the first public address—and probably the only one—to be made by the younger brother of Japan's Emperor during his Boston visit.

He exhibited a thorough knowledge of the traditions of Boston and the associations of New England with his native country. He mentioned Emerson and Longfellow, the Museum of Fine Arts and the courageous New England pioneers who sailed from this coast to open trade with the then dimly-known Orient.

"Few Japanese think of Boston without thinking of the great institutions of learning and education which made this centre of culture justly famous, and to which Japan owes much for her progress, especially in the early stages of her new regime," he declared. "Many of the Japanese who studied in one or another of these institutions have come to occupy high places in our councils of state and in various other fields of activity."

He spoke warmly of the welcome which has been accorded him here, and declared he and the princess would carry back to Japan "the most pleasant memories of our sojourn."

SPEAKS IN JAPANESE

Prince Takamatsu read his prepared speech in Japanese. His voice was full and easily heard in all parts of the ballroom. When he had completed the address, it was translated by Takeo Yamagata, master of ceremonies

Expressions of the happy relations between the United States and Japan, with particular reference to the forwarding of this spirit through the visit of the young prince and his bride, were the central points of addresses by Mayor Curley, Gov. Ely and Courtenay Crocker, honorary consul for Japan and president of the Japan Society of Boston.

The princess, fashionably gowned and wearing a necklace of exquisitely cut large diamonds, heard herself described

(Continued on Page Six)

JAPANESE ROYAL COUPLE "RUSHED" BY SYMPHONY CONCERT AUDIENCE

Princess Acclaimed as "Cute" and "A Knockout" by Thousands —Visitors Enjoy Program—Would Like to Attend Tonight

The Symphony audience yesterday afternoon "rushed" the royal party, in its Boston enthusiasm to see Prince and Princess Takamatsu, particularly the Princess, whom everyone remarked is either "cute" or, "a knockout." The Symphony audience murmured "cute," while the equally demonstrative onlookers outside Symphony Hall favored "knockout" as the term of adulation which yesterday was inspired in the thousands who saw the Japanese Princess on her honeymoon.

Internationally prominent people have come and gone as guests at Symphony concerts and often tney were not noticed because it was not known they were there. It is something new for royalty to be among those present. Accordingly there was excitement and a veritable mob scene, nicely handled by Symphony Hall officials and attendants and police officers from Headquarters.

Director Serge Koussevitzky was introduced to Prince and Princess Takamatsu during the intermission. Director Koussevitzky kissed the Princess' hand. This European custom Director Koussevitzky usually observes, but this time he was more than usually eloquent.

The Princess is one of the most charming visitors Boston has ever had. She has American mannerisms, walks like a happy, energetic American girl instead of with mincing steps as one might possibly expect in a Japanese young woman. She blushes and smiles, letting her big brown eyes play over the new scenes before her, enjoying it all to the full.

Princess in Red

Her choice of apparel yesterday afternoon made her easily distinguishable in the large party which accompanied the Prince and Princess. Her little red straw hat could be seen beyond the myriads of heads looking in her direction. It marked her in the geographic center of the royal party in the improvised box on the right first balcony at Symphony Hall, but more than that it was wonderfully becoming. The hat perfectly matched a long cherry red flat crepe dress figured in flecks of white and blue for all the world as if confetti had been showered over it.

It might seem a hardship for an American bride and groom on a honeymoon to be followed everywhere by a large party of attendants and dignitaries, added to in every country by more escorts and guards for courtesy's and safety's sake.

The Prince and Princess with their suite occupy nearly the entire fourth floor of the Copley Plaza. There are ladies in waiting, valets, secretaries, the official doctor, a comptroller a master of ceremonies, consuls, so that when the royal party is about to go anywhere Japanese and a few American escorts emerge from doors in every direction to accompany the royal couple. The ladies in waiting are very attractive also. They wear either black or black, white and gray.

Neither the Prince nor Princess seem the least bit disturbed by the perpetual round of festivities which attend their wedding tour. They can both speak English, so that they carry on an animated conversation with hosts and hostesses, avoiding any awkward dead silence in formal moments. Otherwise they are rather quiet.

Talks With Koussevitsky

Prince Takamatsu discussed music with Director Koussevitzky while Princess Takamatsu, Mrs Koussevitzky and Mrs N. Penrose Hallowell were conversing. The Prince said he enjoyed the symphony so well he should like to attend the concert "tomorrow night," meaning this (Saturday) evening. It is doubtful if the royal party will attend as there is a formal reception at Gardner Museum at the same time. Few spare moments have been left on the program during the visit of the democratic Japanese couple in this city.

The bride and groom had been escorted to Symphony Hall from the [illegible] by [illegible] of Mr [illegible] and M. [illegible] led [illegible] mits her box [illegible] ed and [illegible] ly to [illegible] co- [illegible] an,

Japanese quince bushes in pots are used profusely in the suite at the hotel to make the couple feel more at home, and, while they were away attending the concert, dozens of men were busy twining wisterias, cherry blossoms and quince blossoms into a floral setting appropriate for the formal dinner last evening.

In connection with that event the Japanese visitors were much like anybody in one respect certainly. They were talking yesterday morning about what they would wear to it.

The Prince dislikes ostentatious progress in American traffic. He wishes the chauffeurs to obey traffic signals—insists upon it. Making them stop at the Tremont and Boylston-st intersections was a notable incident, and after that the custom of halting where lights turned red was observed to the letter. Guards do not ride on the running board either. The guards are on hand, surrounding the party, but in other cars. Anything that savors of undue pomp and circumstance is not in keeping with the simple tastes of the small, smiling pair.

They like simple food also. Dishes of ever so complicated delicacies are passed by on the menu in favor of plain roasts, slices of chicken, steak, lamb. Strawberries and cream are more to their liking than ice cream.

They say "good morning" to the elevator boy, or "good evening," as it happens, and the white painted wheel which controls the elevator cables is cause for their conjecture. Their conversation about it is in Japanese, but the inference is that the Princess has dared the Prince to persuade the elevator boy into letting the Prince experiment with the large wheel and see what happens.

In order to make the entrance and exit of the party as untroubled by throngs as possible, a special exit at the rear of Symphony Hall was opened for the party yesterday. Crowds awaited in the street and upstairs there were throngs of the regular Friday afternoon symphony-goers agog for a glimpse of royalty.

A spontaneous reception was accorded them as they stepped down into the "box." The audience applauded, the orchestra stood in their honor. The couple were on time to the dot.

During the entire concert the Prince and Princess were alert, sitting erect Brilliance in Program by Symphony

By MOSES SMITH

The performance of this week's Boston Symphony program at yesterday's matinee was one of the most brilliant of the season. Rarely has Serge Koussevitzky seemed more on his mettle—and he is not inclined to let his attention wander from the matter at hand. And rarely have the men of the orchestra responded with such sureness, such electrifying precision.

The program was such as to display the orchestra at its best, and in its many virtues for the benefit of the Royal Japanese visitors—and for the 2500 other members of the audience who come to a symphony concert as to a rite. Schubert's Symphony in C major, No. 7, which has been called the "symphony of heavenly lengths," made up the first half of a very long program. There are scoffers who profess to be bored with these lengths; who grudgingly admit the beauty of a movement or two, and dismiss the rest as a dyspeptic shoves away food served him at a banquet. We are not of this surfeited class. Nor, judging from his enthusiasm, is Dr. Koussevitzky, though he did take the first movement at a pace far more rapid than indicated clearly by the composer. Perhaps the conductor was thinking of the length of the program.

"The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," finely-wrought score of Charles T. Griffes, American composer nipped as his art was relatively beginning; "The Rio Grande" by Constant Lambert, young English talent; and Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" were the other works. Each of them was given characteristic voice and was rendered with consummate virtuosity.

Lambert's score, heard for the first time, with the Cecilia [illegible] aria an [illegible] ymkind the say, lan- nd— he As the llent ll the ll ap- audi-

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Symphony, C major, No. 7. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." Lambert, "The Rio Grande," for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte (Mr. Sanroma, pianist; first time in Boston). Stravinsky, suite from the ballet "The Fire-Bird." The Japanese visitors sat in an improvised box in the first balcony on the right-hand side, facing the stage. As they entered the orchestra and audience rose in respectful greeting.

Dr. Koussevitzky is to be thanked heartily for introducing Lambert's "Rio Grande," and with the assistance of the valiant Cecilia Society that had been thoroughly trained by Mr. Fiedler, and with the brilliant Mr. Sanroma, giving a performance that must be reckoned as one of this season's chief events. Not that "The Rio Grande" is "a chef d'oeuvre for the highest"; not that it is "epoch-making," a term that is applied to almost every new and unusual composition that excites the rhetorical flow of our young friends writing for the New York newspapers; but this music is first of all joyous and exhilarating. We all have been taught to take music too seriously. We have listened this season to some composers who "sitting in doleful dumps, have wailed lugubriously and discordantly; to others who have endeavored to give rhythmical expression to the inexpressible, or sought the perfect flower of beauty on the muck-heap of atonality. It is so easy to be "original" in saying nothing. Too many heathen have furiously raged; too many of the people, makers of music and hearers of the younger generation, have imagined a vain thing.

But here comes young Mr. Lambert who, taking a charming poem by Sacheverell Sitwell as a source of inspiration, does not attempt to give an interlinear translation into tones. The words, the scenes evoked by the poet feed the composer's fancy, quicken his imagination, which is not sluggish, much less, lacking. Mr. Lambert has both fancy and imagination to which he gives free rein for his orchestra and for the pianist's cadenza. It is true there are words for the chorus to sing, and the singers are neither ignored nor slighted, but the effect of the whole, the one constant impact—that's the thing. Mr. Lambert is delightfully extravagant, but not as Thomas Heywood's madman beating a drum. He is an appreciator and a utilizer of the finer qualities of jazz, but not a slave to it—not finding it a strength and refuge in time of doubt and trouble. His extravagance and recklessness are more to be applauded than the smug, academic conservatism of the timid, the sticklers for approved form, the writing for safety and the approbation of any owlish professor.

Mr. Lambert's "Rio Grande" is not only full of life that is contagious; it brings near far-off scenes, and this without the borrowing of real or spurious "folk-songs". No one knows what "isle joyeuse" Debussy had in mind when he wrote his piano piece. This "Rio Grande" flows through a country as undefined, and empties into a harbor unsounded, unknown to any pilot. Therefore the audacity of Mr. Lambert's fancy makes captive the hearer. Seldom in Symphony hall has there been so instant, spontaneous, so prolonged, so tumultuous recognition of an unfamiliar composition signed with an unfamiliar name.

The interpretation of the symphony was eloquently musical. It would be interesting to know just what that excellent musician, Mr. Stock, did to the orchestration of "Kubla Kahn"—the impression made yesterday was not so vivid as that made by the first performance a dozen years ago. Are the wings of the "Fire-Bird" drooping? Are its feathers no longer of dazzling gold? Is there too much of Rimsky-Korsakov in the suite and not enough of the Stravinsky of "Patrouchka" and other later works? The Princesses still disport themselves in a charming manner, but Katschei's subjects are only "infernal" in their dance by courtesy of the composer.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, the last of the 50th season, will be as follo[illegible] ters[illegible] Afte[illegible] Eule[illegible] ven[illegible]

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The presence of Prince Takamatsu and Princess Kikuko of Japan roused much interest in the audience at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert. The visiting royalties and their entourage sat in the first balcony on the right of the stage. A section of seats midway down the balcony had been removed, and a kind of royal box improvised.

When the Prince and the Princess entered, just before the concert began, the entire audience rose and applauded them. They listened to a program which included Schubert's C major Symphony, Griffes' "Khubla Khan," Constant Lambert's "Rio Grande," and excerpts from Stravinsky's "Firebird" with close attention. Dr Koussevitzky, acknowledging the applause, made each time a special low bow in the direction of the imperial visitors.

The novelty on yesterday's program, Constant Lambert's setting for chorus and orchestra of verses by Sacheverell Sitwell about the Brazilian Rio Grande, is the attempt of a young Englishman to employ the idiom and the procedures of present-day American jazz. Poet and composer are known by repute as modernists. But verses and music seemed yesterday rather tame and conventional.

Has Marked Talent

That young Mr Lambert has marked talent was obvious. The tunefulness of his music, and its rather banal harmonization contributed not a little to its popular appeal. But one could not see why this piece should have been so highly praised in London. The Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; and a contralto member of the chorus, not, by some oversight, named in the programs, took part in Lambert's composition. The contralto solo was unusually well sung, by a fine voice skillfully used. Mr Sanroma, alone of the interpreters, commands to the full the type of rhythm demanded by this music. He again distinguished himself.

Far more significant musically was the revival, after 10 years of inexplicable neglect, of "The Pleasure Dome of Khubla Khan," by the late Charles T. Griffes. This tone poem is in some ways the finest pieces of orchestral music yet written by an American. It was hailed as a masterpiece at the first performance, by the Boston Symphony in 1919. The program notes yesterday stated that the fatal illness of the composer was in part due to overwork in copying the orchestral parts for that performance. It is a regrettable fact that neither the Boston Symphony nor the other leading American orchestras bear the expense of this necessary copying when a new work is played from manuscript. Griffes, a teacher in a boys' school, sat up nights copying. He caught pneumonia, and developed tuberculosis.

The scoring for orchestra has been revised by Frederick Stock, who claims to have done nothing that Griffes did not sanction before his death. One doubted the wisdom of this procedure, remembering the effectiveness of the performances in 1919 and 1920 of the tone poem in its original form. Hearing "Khubla Khan" again yesterday, one was impressed by the imaginative power of the music. Griffes' death was a tragic loss to the art of music. His works, which reveal a talent not quite matured, but none the less compelling, are beautiful enough to retain a place in the orchestral repertory.

Another Genius

Schubert's C major Symphony, the work of another genius who died young and left masterpieces too long neglected by his contemporaries, began the concert. [illegible] Koussevitzky stressed the dramatic [illegible]er than the lyric qualities of the r[illegible]. His reading was eloquent an[illegible]ersonal, but not quite the Schubert [illegible]one's dreams, or the Schubert once [illegible]vealed here by Dr Muck.

The remaining number, five fragments selected by Dr Koussevitzky from Stravinsky's "Firebird," is also the work of a young man of genius. The "Dance of the Princesses," with its beautiful flowing melody, ought to refute the common conservative objection that Stravinsky is a mere juggler with rhythms and timbres. The whole suite is delightful music, and yesterday's performance was a brilliant one.

P. R.

SYMPHONY DISPLAYS SCHUBERT

Lambert's "The Rio Grande" Heard for First Time Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The presence of the visiting Japanese royalty served to make of the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon something of an occasion. And occasions are good for the Symphony Concerts, they put audiences on edge and conductor and orchestra on their mettle.

SCHUBERT'S C MAJOR

There was, for the matter of that, more than usual interest in the programme itself. If the suite from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," music that is more surface than substance, and wearing thin with the years, seemed superfluous at the end of a concert already long, it at least served further to dis- [illegible] n," un- [illegible] ussevit- [illegible] ussevit- [illegible]'s pro- The Rio [illegible] chestra, [illegible]ton pre- [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

PRINCE LAUDS CITY FOR GIFTS TO COUNTRYMEN

Takamatsu, Honored at Brilliant Dinner, Stresses Cultural Aid

ROYAL PAIR SPEND STRENUOUS DAY

Received by Governor and Mayor—Attend Symphony Concert

Their imperial highnesses, the Prince and Princess Takamatsu of Japan, yesterday fulfilled a major part of their announced determination to see all phases of American life by rushing through a round of the official, musical and social life of Boston.

They were bustled through crowds at the State House and City Hall in the morning, during the afternoon listened to the strains of a Boston symphony concert, and last night were guests of honor at a banquet given by Mayor Curley and attended by 500 distinguished leaders in the social and political life of the city.

PRINCE'S ONLY ADDRESS

The elaborate dinner, for which the ballroom of the Copley-Plaza Hotel was brilliant with the colors of the United States and Japan and decorated with a profusion of spring flowers, brought forth the first public address—and probably the only one—to be made by the younger brother of Japan's Emperor during his Boston visit.

He exhibited a thorough knowledge of the traditions of Boston and the associations of New England with his native country. He mentioned Emerson and Longfellow, the Museum of Fine Arts and the courageous New England pioneers who sailed from this coast to open trade with the then dimly-known Orient.

"Few Japanese think of Boston without thinking of the great institutions of learning and education which made this centre of culture justly famous, and to which Japan owes much for her progress, especially in the early stages of her new regime," he declared. "Many of the Japanese who studied in one or another of these institutions have come to occupy high places in our councils of state and in various other fields of activity."

He spoke warmly of the welcome which has been accorded him here, and declared he and the princess would carry back to Japan "the most pleasant memories of our sojourn."

SPEAKS IN JAPANESE

Prince Takamatsu read his prepared speech in Japanese. His voice was full and easily heard in all parts of the ballroom. When he had completed the address, it was translated by Takeo Yamagata, master of ceremonies

Expressions of the happy relations between the United States and Japan, with particular reference to the forwarding of this spirit through the visit of the young prince and his bride, were the central points of addresses by Mayor Curley, Gov. Ely and Courtenay Crocker, honorary consul for Japan and president of the Japan Society of Boston.

The princess, fashionably gowned and wearing a necklace of exquisitely cut large diamonds, heard herself described

(Continued on Page Six)

W. P. Long to Head Park Commission Till 1934—Others Named

Reappointment of seven members of municipal boards and commissions was announced by Mayor Curley yesterday as follows:

William P. Long, chairman of the park commission until April 30, 1934; Gordon Abbott, trustee of the Public Library until April 30, 1934; Frederick W. Rugg of Cambridge, trustee of the statistics department until April 30, 1935; Walter S. Gerry, member of the board of appeal until April 30, 1936; James R. Gibson, member of the board of zoning adjustment until April 30, 1936; Joseph P. Manning, trustee of the City Hospital until April 30, 1936, and James P. Balfe, trustee of the statistics department until April 30, 1936.

SUBMERGED MAST SEEN

A mast attached to a submerged wreck was sighted April 21 near Diamond shoals, Va., by steamer City of Chattanooga, in yesterday from Savannah, the spar standing 4 feet out of water and with white-painted cross trees. Indications pointed to a recent disaster but there was nothing to reveal identity of the vessel, although Capt Borum scrutinized the spar close aboard.

JAPANESE ROYAL COUPLE "RUSHED" BY SYMPHONY CONCERT AUDIENCE

Princess Acclaimed as "Cute" and "A Knockout" by Thousands

—Visitors Enjoy Program—Would Like to Attend Tonight

The Symphony audience yesterday afternoon "rushed" the royal party, in its Boston enthusiasm to see Prince and Princess Takamatsu, particularly the Princess, whom everyone remarked is either "cute" or, "a knockout." The Symphony audience murmured "cute," while the equally demonstrative onlookers outside Symphony Hall favored "knockout" as the term of adulation which yesterday was inspired in the thousands who saw the Japanese Princess on her honeymoon.

Internationally prominent people have come and gone as guests at Symphony concerts and often tney were not noticed because it was not known they were there. It is something new for royalty to be among those present. Accordingly there was excitement and a veritable mob scene, nicely handled by Symphony Hall officials and attendants and police officers from Headquarters.

Director Serge Koussevitzky was introduced to Prince and Princess Takamatsu during the intermission. Director Koussevitzky kissed the Princess' hand. This European custom Director Koussevitzky usually observes, but this time he was more than usually eloquent.

The Princess is one of the most charming visitors Boston has ever had. She has American mannerisms, walks like a happy, energetic American girl instead of with mincing steps as one might possibly expect in a Japanese young woman. She blushes and smiles, letting her big brown eyes play over the new scenes before her, enjoying it all to the full.

Princess in Red

Her choice of apparel yesterday afternoon made her easily distinguishable in the large party which accompanied the Prince and Princess. Her little red straw hat could be seen beyond the myriads of heads looking in her direction. It marked her in the geographic center of the royal party in the improvised box on the right first balcony at Symphony Hall, but more than that it was wonderfully becoming. The hat perfectly matched a long cherry red flat crepe dress figured in flecks of white and blue for all the world as if confetti had been showered over it.

It might seem a hardship for an American bride and groom on a honeymoon to be followed everywhere by a large party of attendants and dignitaries, added to in every country by more escorts and guards for courtesy's and safety's sake.

The Prince and Princess with their suite occupy nearly the entire fourth floor of the Copley Plaza. There are ladies in waiting, valets, secretaries, the official doctor, a comptroller a master of ceremonies, consuls, so that when the royal party is about to go anywhere Japanese and a few American escorts emerge from doors in every direction to accompany the royal couple. The ladies in waiting are very attractive also. They wear either black or black, white and gray.

Neither the Prince nor Princess seem the least bit disturbed by the perpetual round of festivities which attend their wedding tour. They can both speak English, so that they carry on an animated conversation with hosts and hostesses, avoiding any awkward dead silence in formal moments. Otherwise they are rather quiet.

Talks With Koussevitsky

Prince Takamatsu discussed music with Director Koussevitzky while Princess Takamatsu, Mrs Koussevitzky and Mrs N. Penrose Hallowell were conversing. The Prince said he enjoyed the symphony so well he should like to attend the concert "tomorrow night," meaning this (Saturday) evening. It is doubtful if the royal party will attend as there is a formal reception at Gardner Museum at the same time. Few spare moments have been left on the program during the visit of the democratic Japanese couple in this city.

The bride and groom had been escorted to Symphony Hall from the Copley-Plaza by Courtenay Crocker of the Japanese Society, and met by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mr and Mrs N. Penrose Hallowell, Mr and Mrs William Phillips and Edward M. Pickman of the trustees, who greeted them and went with them to the improvised box, where the ordinary seats had been removed and blue leather upholstered chairs placed. The box arrangement was marked by a gilded railing, maroon velvet draperies and oriental rugs.

An office on the same floor, directly across the corridor from the door to the "box" was furnished for the occasion in Colonial antiques and decorated with Spring flowers and Japanese cherry blossoms.

Japanese cherry trees in bloom, Japanese quince bushes in pots are used profusely in the suite at the hotel to make the couple feel more at home, and, while they were away attending the concert, dozens of men were busy twining wisterias, cherry blossoms and quince blossoms into a floral setting appropriate for the formal dinner last evening.

In connection with that event the Japanese visitors were much like anybody in one respect certainly. They were talking yesterday morning about what they would wear to it.

The Prince dislikes ostentatious progress in American traffic. He wishes the chauffeurs to obey traffic signals—insists upon it. Making them stop at the Tremont and Boylston-st intersections was a notable incident, and after that the custom of halting where lights turned red was observed to the letter. Guards do not ride on the running board either. The guards are on hand, surrounding the party, but in other cars. Anything that savors of undue pomp and circumstance is not in keeping with the simple tastes of the small, smiling pair.

They like simple food also. Dishes of ever so complicated delicacies are passed by on the menu in favor of plain roasts, slices of chicken, steak, lamb. Strawberries and cream are more to their liking than ice cream.

They say "good morning" to the elevator boy, or "good evening," as it happens, and the white painted wheel which controls the elevator cables is cause for their conjecture. Their conversation about it is in Japanese, but the inference is that the Princess has dared the Prince to persuade the elevator boy into letting the Prince experiment with the large wheel and see what happens.

In order to make the entrance and exit of the party as untroubled by throngs as possible, a special exit at the rear of Symphony Hall was opened for the party yesterday. Crowds awaited in the street and upstairs there were throngs of the regular Friday afternoon symphony-goers agog for a glimpse of royalty.

A spontaneous reception was accorded them as they stepped down into the "box." The audience applauded, the orchestra stood in their honor. The couple were on time to the dot.

During the entire concert the Prince and Princess were alert, sitting erect and visibly attentive. The Princess clapped approval. She held in her lap a bouquet of rare orchids, presented her from Mr and Mrs Ernest B. Dane, who have exceptionally fine private conservatories. Mr Dane is treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Symphony, C major, No. 7. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." Lambert, "The Rio Grande," for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte (Mr. Sanroma, pianist; first time in Boston). Stravinsky, suite from the ballet "The Fire-Bird." The Japanese visitors sat in an improvised box in the first balcony on the right-hand side, facing the stage. As they entered the orchestra and audience rose in respectful greeting.

Dr. Koussevitzky is to be thanked heartily for introducing Lambert's "Rio Grande," and with the assistance of the valiant Cecilia Society that had been thoroughly trained by Mr. Fiedler, and with the brilliant Mr. Sanroma, giving a performance that must be reckoned as one of this season's chief events. Not that "The Rio Grande" is "a chef d'oeuvre for the highest"; not that it is "epoch-making," a term that is applied to almost every new and unusual composition that excites the rhetorical flow of our young friends writing for the New York newspapers; but this music is first of all joyous and exhilarating. We all have been taught to take music too seriously. We have listened this season to some composers who "sitting in doleful dumps, have wailed lugubriously and discordantly; to others who have endeavored to give rhythmical expression to the inexpressible, or sought the perfect flower of beauty on the muck-heap of atonality. It is so easy to be "original" in saying nothing. Too many heathen have furiously raged; too many of the people, makers of music and hearers of the younger generation, have imagined a vain thing.

But here comes young Mr. Lambert who, taking a charming poem by Sacheverell Sitwell as a source of inspiration, does not attempt to give an interlinear translation into tones. The words, the scenes evoked by the poet feed the composer's fancy, quicken his imagination, which is not sluggish, much less, lacking. Mr. Lambert has both fancy and imagination to which he gives free rein for his orchestra and for the pianist's cadenza. It is true there are words for the chorus to sing, and the singers are neither ignored nor slighted, but the effect of the whole, the one constant impact—that's the thing. Mr. Lambert is delightfully extravagant, but not as Thomas Heywood's madman beating a drum. He is an appreciator and a utilizer of the finer qualities of jazz, but not a slave to it—not finding it a strength and refuge in time of doubt and trouble. His extravagance and recklessness are more to be applauded than the smug, academic conservatism of the timid, the sticklers for approved form, the writing for safety and the approbation of any owlish professor.

Mr. Lambert's "Rio Grande" is not only full of life that is contagious; it brings near far-off scenes, and this without the borrowing of real or spurious "folk-songs". No one knows what "isle joyeuse" Debussy had in mind when he wrote his piano piece. This "Rio Grande" flows through a country as undefined, and empties into a harbor unsounded, unknown to any pilot. Therefore the audacity of Mr. Lambert's fancy makes captive the hearer. Seldom in Symphony hall has there been so instant, spontaneous, so prolonged, so tumultuous recognition of an unfamiliar composition signed with an unfamiliar name.

The interpretation of the symphony was eloquently musical. It would be interesting to know just what that excellent musician, Mr. Stock, did to the orchestration of "Kubla Kahn"—the impression made yesterday was not so vivid as that made by the first performance a dozen years ago. Are the wings of the "Fire-Bird" drooping? Are its feathers no longer of dazzling gold? Is there too much of Rimsky-Korsakov in the suite and not enough of the Stravinsky of "Patrouchka" and other later works? The Princesses still disport themselves in a charming manner, but Katschei's subjects are only "infernal" in their dance by courtesy of the composer.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, the last of the 50th season, will be as follows: Wednesday afternoon, April 25, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique"; Friday afternoon, April 27, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, Eule[illegible] ven

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The presence of Prince Takamatsu and Princess Kikuko of Japan roused much interest in the audience at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert. The visiting royalties and their entourage sat in the first balcony on the right of the stage. A section of seats midway down the balcony had been removed, and a kind of royal box improvised.

When the Prince and the Princess entered, just before the concert began, the entire audience rose and applauded them. They listened to a program which included Schubert's C major Symphony, Griffes' "Khubla Khan," Constant Lambert's "Rio Grande," and excerpts from Stravinsky's "Firebird" with close attention. Dr Koussevitzky, acknowledging the applause. made each time a special low bow in the direction of the imperial visitors.

The novelty on yesterday's program, Constant Lambert's setting for chorus and orchestra of verses by Sacheverell Sitwell about the Brazilian Rio Grande, is the attempt of a young Englishman to employ the idiom and the procedures of present-day American jazz. Poet and composer are known by repute as modernists. But verses and music seemed yesterday rather tame and conventional.

Has Marked Talent

That young Mr Lambert has marked talent was obvious. The tunefulness of his music, and its rather banal harmonies, contributed not a little to neglect- appeal. But one could his piece should have ing the period of the World War, have been carefully tended during the intervening years by the courtly and gracious diplomat, Consul General Suada, and the more recent visit with a good will offering of cherry trees by a group of Japan's fairest daughters. The visit at this time of our illustrious guests adds a fragrance and beauty to the flower of friendship which Japan has caused to grow in America.

FILL

"America has likewise made her contribution and no Nation contributed more whole-heartedly during earthquake, fire and flood than the United States.

"Friendships born of adversity are enduring in character and are a more potent guarantee for the promotion of peace and brotherhood than armi[illegible]

SYMPHONY DISPLAYS SCHUBERT

Lambert's "The Rio Grande" Heard for First Time Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The presence of the visiting Japanese royalty served to make of the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon something of an occasion. And occasions are good for the Symphony Concerts, they put audiences on edge and conductor and orchestra on their mettle.

SCHUBERT'S C MAJOR

There was, for the matter of that, more than usual interest in the programme itself. If the suite from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," music that is more surface than substance, and wearing thin with the years, seemed superfluous at the end of a concert already long, it at least served further to display the orchestra's silken sheen of tone, its remarkable virtuosity.

Never before, on Friday afternoon, had Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the C major Symphony of Schubert; a single performance had come on a Saturday evening when the orchestra was marking the 100th anniversary of the composer's death. One of the few symphonies since Beethoven to deserve unqualifiedly the title of masterpiece, it is nevertheless, by reason of its length and repetitiousness, a searching test of a conductor's skill. Yesterday the listener's interest never flagged; the music was continuously engrossing, and it had the sweep and spaciousness, the rhythmic drive that set this symphony apart from other works of its kind.

Griffes' Tone Poem

In reviving Griffes' tone-poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," unheard here for 11 years, Dr. Koussevitzky was well-advised

Well-advised, too, was Dr. Koussevitzky in placing on yesterday's programme, Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande," for chorus and orchestra, which was to have had its Boston premiere next Monday evening.

This setting, by one of the most promising of the younger English composers of a fantastic poem of Sacheverell Sitwell, is on the whole uneven. Pages that are brilliant, tremendously vital or insinuatingly seductive, are offset by some that are flat and commonplace. Some of Mr. Lambert's jazz, of which the English reviewers made so much, seems to American ears merely tawdry. He is happier with his Spanish rhythms, though the long and difficult cadenza for piano and percussion instruments is a noteworthy achievement. It was notably played yesterday by Mr. Sanroma, and the chorus of the Cecilia Society sang with a dash and fire as well as with a sensuousness of tone that bore testimony to the progress that it is making under the guidance of Arthur Fiedler. Yesterday's audience received the new work with enthusiasm and lavished applause upon the performers.

Love's Dog

bunito and Princess Kikuko each a white gold wrist watch. He called on the princess to address a few words to the audience, but she motioned to her husband, indicating that he would do all the talking for both.

Maj.-Gen. Fox Conner, head of the 1st corps area and representing the army, told of a visit made to Honolulu by Prince Takamatsu while he was stationed there. The prince, an officer of the Japanese navy, was in charge of the coaling detail when Gen. Conner visited the Japanese flagship. "He looked the part," said Gen. Conner, "and I thought at that time that his outstanding trait was devotion to duty, something we Americans admire. Now," he added, with a glance at the princess, "I feel that his outstanding trait is taste and good judgment"

Admr. Louis M. Nulton, head of the first naval district and representing the navy, told the royal couple that in visiting Boston they had entered a community whose members had entered every phase of American life from the beginning of the nation. Visits of the type being made by the royal pair held to promote goodwill he said. He closed with the naval remark, "Glad to see you on board."

ATTEND CONCERT

Attendance of the young members of royalty at the symphony concert created more interest among the audience than the appearance of any of the many celebrities at the concerts in several years. Hundreds of concert listeners left their seats during the intermission and milled about the narrow corridor by the royal party's box to catch a glimpse of the couple.

It was clearly the princess who was and William Condon remained with the couple throughout the concert, and Inspectors John Dever and John McGovern kept close watch of the corridors leading to the royal box.

The first appearance of the couple yesterday morning, when they left their suite at the Copley-Plaza for the State House, found their greetings to the small crowd the same as the previous night's. The prince was solemn and unbending, while the princess flashed smiles at everybody.

Gov. Ely presented the prince with a solid gold paper cutter, bearing the seal of the commonwealth, and a shining new penny. The Governor drew one of the infrequent smiles which occasionally lightens the prince's face when he explained that a sharp article must be presented only with a penny as guarantee that friendship will not be cut.

In both the House of Representatives and the Senate, the prince was invited to say a few words, but declined. Leverett Saltonstall, speaker of the House, and President Gaspar G. Bacon of the Senate spoke briefly.

From the State House, the royal honeymooners went directly to City Hall, where Mayor Curley greeted them and presented the prince a key to the city and the princess an autographed picture of the group taken on their ar-

Musicians --- Plays and Players --- The Screen

News of Music

Here in Boston

The fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts will end on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, May 1 and 2, with this program of established and favorite classics:

Prelude to the Opera, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun" ..... Debussy
Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" ..... Strauss Symphony, No. 5, in C minor ..... Beethoven

The series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theater in Cambridge will end on Thursday evening next with this program:

Suite for Orchestra, No. 3, in D Major ..... Bach
Suite from the Ballet, "The Fire-Bird" ..... Stravinsky
Symphony, No. 1, in C minor ..... Brahms

Introduced

Constant Lambert (Brown Music Library)

Whose Tone-Poem, "The Rio Grande," Will be Heard for the First Times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. . . . "Here Is an Unusually Good and Genuinely Musical Mind with a Remarkably Clear Sense of What It Wants to Say and of the One Right Way of Saying It."

Lines in Coleridge's magoria touched Griffes's musical imagination. He visioned the caverns of ice, the sunless sea; the pleasure-house, lordly and smiling. He heard the revelries within. He felt the chill mockery of the river-caves. He wrought these visions and sensations into a music rich and potent with suggestion. The susceptible listener knows and feels the imaginings of the word-poet and the tone-poet. He also bathes in their atmosphere of phantasmagoria. And first and last a performance as finely sensitized as the music deepened or rarefied his every impression.

No less Griffes has written a piece of music that sustains itself as such. The germinating motivs are arresting and significant. From them the music expands itself, flexible and firm. Propulsive rhythm gives it movement and vitality. Over it harmonic and instrumental color plays incessantly, shadowed or transparent. The musical progress, the poetized suggestion, go hand in hand. There is no rent in the web of atmosphere. It is quite true that Griffes writes in the Debussyan idiom; but as one who has absorbed it; who gives it forth in his own speech; who does not merely imitate. A clear design proceeds to completion. A phantasmagoria in tones lays its spell. Nothing common mars; nothing trite weakens. Imagery, means, expression are equally sensitive and harmonious. The presence of an individual beauty is pervasive and unmistakable. One orchestral work, and Griffes had enriched American music with the tone-poesy in which it is meager.

Dr. Koussevitzky is also the friend of youthful composers, the seeker for new abilities, the cultivator of his own musical time. Whatever their race or their city, he watches for them, spies them out, gives them opportunity, would have his audiences as eager as he. For him the conductor's obligation is not only as perfect performance as he may compass of the old, the tested, the familiar. The conductor is also bound to make room for what is new, untried, experimental, for individual adventure in the immediate hour. And to such music, again, he would have his audience as alert as he. When Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande" made stir in London a year ago, Dr. Koussevitzky was sure to bring it to Boston and yesterday he did.

By title Mr. Lambert "sets" a poem by Sacheverell Sitwell. In the setting he writes an exacting and pungent piano-part that twice over is displayful solo. With it, Mr. Sanromá, modernist by instinct, faith and practice, distinguished himself. Mr. Lambert asks the voices of not too large a chorus. The Cecilia supplied them, thanks to Mr. Fiedler's training and an inspiriting music, with newfound precision, certainty, freedom and flavor. Miss Mae Murray sang incidental measures. Her alto tones set them glowing. Adapting his orchestra to his design, Mr. Lambert discards woodwinds and horns; adds cornets to trumpets, trombones and tuba; assembles the usual strings; crowds the percussion-corner. There the virtuosi he would have did not yesterday fail him. In turn, the whole orchestra was on its mettle. After his habit Dr. Koussevitzky led as one who has found a brave new thing. Last January in New York, from the Schola Cantorum, "The Rio Grande" was a failure with the audience. Yesterday, as in London and in Manchester, it won many ears and many hands. Within belief there was a difference in performance.

"The Rio Grande" is a brave new thing. In the beginning is Mr. Sitwell's poem. Of course it is in free verse, and also mannered. Otherwise no Sitwell—of the modernist three—Osbert, Sacheverell, and their sister—would have signed it. There are broken lengths; a curious rhythm winding and voluptuous; gentle rhymes in near or distant impact; copious verbiage; unexpected adjectives. Underneath this vesture and procedure is unmistakable romantic mood, in the temper of the present day. Lines droop with sensuous languor; sound full or sharp; teem with high-colored images; sink again into sensuous haze. Mr. Lambert has not treated these verses as a text to be followed delineatively. No more has he regarded them as so many words for the chorus and the solo-voice to sing, though they usefully meet that need. Rather he has sought the musical equivalent for the images, the moods, the atmosphere—a decanting from one medium into another.

Mr. Lambert works out his design as a child of his time and surroundings. To him jazz is a natural and congenial speech. He has heard the light music of the theater and not always found it insipid, sterile or cheap. He has listened compassionately to jazz-songs. Brilliant mechanics, the technical mastery and flare of virtuosity, stir him. He is also a composer of skill, resource, imagination and invention, to whom the thing to be expressed and the expressive tones may become as one. There are sensuous languors in Mr. Sitwell's word-picturing, and the winding, voluptuous rhythm. There

Bach with Dr. Koussevitzky and from Stravinsky with Mr. Stokowski, will be heard in a concert of its own at the Museum of Fine Arts on Tuesday evening, May 12.

A final effort is in progress in Paris to complete the fund for a monument to Debussy to which, at Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion, Bostonians contributed two years ago. It still lacks $16,000, now to be asked of all Europe. Present plans contemplate a statue of Debussy to be set up on the edge of the Bois de Boulogne and the marking of his birthplace at Saint-Germain in the suburbs.

stage and in the sifting of time the music becomes concert-piece. Who now thinks of the ballet that the Russians used to dance and even Boston once saw?

H. T. P.

The BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
1881-1931
by M. A. DeWolfe Howe
This Semi-Centennial Edition combines the early narrative of Mr. Higginson's orchestra with new chapters describing its last seventeen seasons. The complete repertory, personnel, and soloists of fifty years are listed.
$2.50
Houghton Mifflin Co.

READ THE HERALD BOOK PAGES FOR THE LATEST BOOK NEWS AND ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Risen Figure Of English Music

Dr. Koussevitzky Presents Constant Lambert in "The Rio Grande"

THE week-end at Symphony Hall brings to performance, in addition to Griffes's "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," also one of the most talked-of essays into the problem of writing symphonic jazz, Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande" for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte. The river in question is not the North American river (it has been pointed out, and cannot be repeated too often), but the majestic river of our South American neighbor, Brazil.

Mr. Lambert's piece is a setting of a poem by Sacheverell Sitwell:

By the Rio Grande
They dance no sarabande
On level banks like leaves above the glassy, lolling tide;
Nor sing they forlorn madrigals
Whose sad note stirs the sleeping gales
Till they wake among the trees and shake the boughs,
And fright the nightingales;
But they dance in the city, down the public squares,
On the marble pavers with each color laid in shares,
At the open church doors loud with light within,
At the bell's huge tolling.
By the river music, gurgling, thin
Through the soft Brazilian air.
The Comendador and Alguacil are there
On horseback, hid with feathers, loud and shrill
Blowing orders on their trumpets like a bird's sharp bill
Through boughs, like a bitter wind, calling
They shine like steady starlight while those other sparks are falling
In burnished armour, with their plumes of fire.
Tireless while all others tire.

The noisy streets are empty and hushed is the town
To where, in the square, they dance and the band is playing;
Such a space of silence through the town to the river
That the water murmurs loud above the band and crowd together;
And the strains of the sarabande,
More lively than a madrigal,
Go hand in hand
Like the river and its waterfall
As the great Rio Grande rolls down to the sea.

Loud is the marimba's note
Above the half-salt waves,
And louder still the tympanon,
The plectrum, and the kettle-drum.
Sullen and menacing
Do these brazen voices ring.
They ride outside,
Above the salt-sea's tide
By the Rio Grande.

Till the ships at anchor there
Hear this enchantment of the soft Brazilian air,
By those Southern winds wafted,
Now and gentle,
Their fierceness tempered
By the air that flows between.

Mr. Lambert's forces include besides his chorus (in Boston Arthur Fiedler's Cecilia Society) and his pianist (Mr. Sanromá) also an orchestra of strings, heavy brass (excluding French horns) and percussion. An alto solo voice (Marie Murray) also has prominence. In his brass section Mr. Lambert calls for both trumpets and cornets in addition to trombones. For his percussion section he requires five players for the following assortment of noise-makers: Three kettle-drums, side drum, tenor drum, bass drum, cymbals, Turkish crash (a cymbal hanging suspended), tam-tam, tambourine, castanets, triangle, Chinese tom-tom, cowbell, Chinese block, xylophone, "Jeu de timbres," which is supposedly a glockenspiel with keyboard. The composer directs also that the "chorus is only a part of the work and no more important than, say, the piano part, and it is essential that the singers should have absolute rhythmic precision as the least lagging behind will ruin the ensemble. The chorus should aim at a rather more theatrical and pungent style of singing than is usual with most choral societies." Mr. Lambert is unusually particular also about his percussion effects, for he writes in the score, "All instructions concerning the method of playing the percussion instruments should be meticulously followed and a separate rehearsal of the cadenza is recommended:"

Mr. Sitwell's somewhat impressionistic poem Mr. Lambert has set in a sort of modern romanticism. His music by no means slavishly follows the words, in fact one sometimes suspects that at times the words do no more than give the singers consonants and vowels to which to sing their notes. And yet the broad principal divisions of Mr. Lambert's music follow the broad implications of the several portions of Mr. Sitwell's poem. The introduction begins with orchestra and piano alternating with several impetuous and intriguingly syncopated rag-time or jazz motives. The chorus soon enters, also with its own syncopation. After this a melee of energetic, breath-taking rhythmical developments. One predicts a "hot" jazz, perhaps at its hottest. A point of division is reached with the line, "Tireless while all others tire."

Then follows the cadenza about which Mr. Lambert is so anxious in his instructions. It is a long and complicated and brilliant cadenza for piano solo with certain rhythmic interpolations from the battery of percussion instruments. One hears the typical technically expert jazz pianist with his own type of inspiration improvising his own "stuff." With the following lines the noisy type of jazz is laid aside. Trumpets begin pianissimo. The music becomes lyrical and songful. But popular idioms are not for a moment put by. The more sustained "lyrics" of operetta or comic opera or review are suggested.

And these "lyrics" at their best no "serious" composer can afford to treat with condescension. Mr. Lambert incorporates the effect into his work. The gentle rhythms and the gentle sonorities are excellent contrast. Then there is ascent to another wild climax as the poet describes the various instruments that join in the din of the South American dance. Once more, after the lines, "Above the salt-sea's tide by the Rio Grande," there is a second, shorter, perhaps more full-voiced piano cadenza to mark another division point. The remaining division is for the most part quiet, given over in large part to an alto solo with chorus in humming accompaniment.

Constant Lambert was born in London Aug. 23, 1905. He studied at the Royal College of Music, composition under Vaughan Williams and counterpoint under R. O. Morris, who has had a profound effect on many of the younger English composers. In an interview in The Star (London) he has been thus quoted: "Noise and not quiet, is my great stimulant to creative work. When I want to get the plan of a work in my head I don't go into Shropshire or on to Hampstead Heath. I take a walk down Shadwell or Wapping [two rather squalid East End neighborhoods near the docks]. Apart from Mr. Sitwell's poem, I drew inspiration for this piece from the two reviews, "Dover Street to Dixie" and "Blackbirds," and I worked it out wandering about the East End. In fact, most of my work has been done in the noisy places of the world. I don't believe I could write two bars in Florence or Nuremberg, or in any of the other centers of art and culture. But give me the crowded bar of a public house in Gravesend, or the cafes of Toulon and Marseilles, and the music just bubbles up. . . . The finale of my last piano sonata was written to the accompaniment of six automatic drills in a city street." One might add that the piano sonata and "Reo Grande" are the two most noteworthy of a rapidly increasing list of works from the pen of this twenty-six-year-old composer.

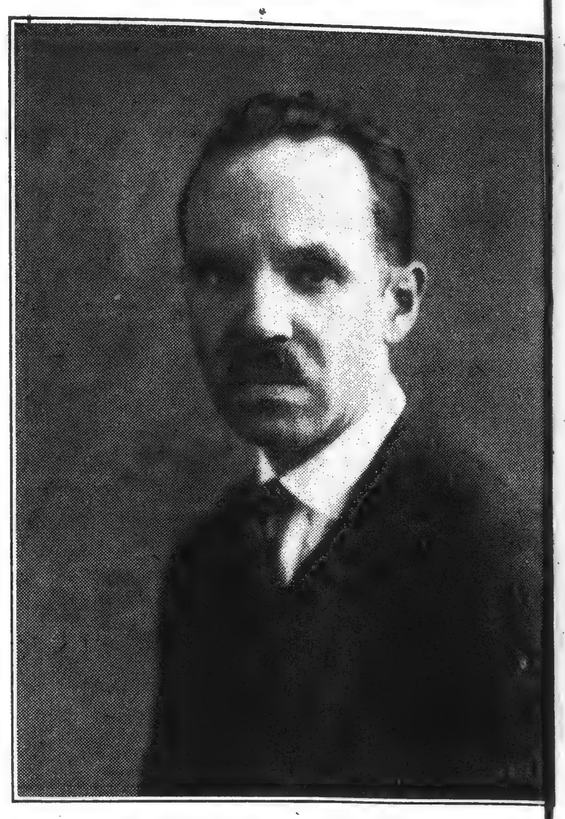
On jazz, he thus expressed himself in the same interview: "Jazz is becoming lowering and depressing in its effect. I have tried to make it stimulating and healthy. I have tried to make it genuinely vigorous and gay, and yet to express ideas which are perfectly serious. . . ."

"The Rio Grande" was written in 1927. The first performance took place in Manchester by the Hallé Orchestra and chorus Dec. 12, 1929. The same orchestra and chorus gave it a first London performance Dec. 17 (?) 1930, with Hamilton Harty, the conductor of the orchestra as pianist, and Mr. Lambert conducting. This performance received the unanimous approval of reviewers, some of which have already been printed in these columns. In addition, Ernest Newman wrote, "The essential thing is that here is a musical mind of a really fine order, an imagination that vivifies whatever it touches and instinctively finds the right expression for its personal vision. And Harvey Grace concluded a very informative letter to the New York Herald-Tribune with these proud words: "What really matters is that Mr. Lambert has given us one more proof of what some of us have maintained for a considerable time, namely, that in the writing of really up-to-date works which are both original and musical, we have in England at the present time a group of young men who can meet the Continental disciples of Stravinsky and Schoenberg at their own game and beat them all ends up." When the work was performed this winter in New York the reaction was less favorable. But whether the forces were entirely adequate it would be impossible at this distance to say.

A. H. M.

This Semi-Centennial Edition combines the early narrative of Mr. Higginson's orchestra with new chapters describing its last seventeen seasons. The complete repertory, personnel, and soloists of fifty years are listed.
$2.50
HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

American Remembered



(Colby—Transcript)

Charles Tomlinson Griffes (1884-1920)

Whose Tone-Poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" Will Be Revived at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. . . . "A Rare and Original Talent—One of the Finer, More Sensitive and Fastidious Musical Natures that the United States has Produced."

An American Who Deserves Revival

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns to Griffes's Tone-Poem of "Kubla Khan"

FOR the impending visit of distinguished Japanese guests Dr. Koussevitzky has placed upon the week's program at Symphony Hall Charles Tomlinson Griffes's symphonic poem "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan." It was composed in 1912, revised in 1916, came to first performance on Nov. 28-29, 1919 by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Monteux. Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra played it on Jan. 16-17, 1920. Other orchestras followed. Mr. Stock and Mr. Griffes talked together about certain changes in the score for better orchestral adjustment; but they had not been made when death overtook the composer in the following April. Mr. Stock subsequently inserted them, and they appear in a new edition of the tone-poem published in 1929, to be used by Dr. Koussevitzky on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. Stock's account of these changes is printed on a fly-leaf of the new score: "A few remarks concerning the revised edition of Griffes's 'The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan' might be both welcome and appropriate.

"I performed this work in Chicago in January, 1920. In the autumn of that year I had an opportunity of meeting Mr. Griffes during a festival of chamber music at Pittsfield, Massachusetts, when I suggested to him that the scoring of his work, in some places, could be improved upon. This he readily admitted, and we arranged to meet again in order to go over the score together.

"The results of this very careful scrutiny are faithfully embodied in this revised version. Nothing has been added that would not have been sanctioned by the composer. I have no doubt that with these changes and amplifications the orchestration will 'sound' more readily, and present this very fine work to its very best advantage.

"I hope that in the improved form it will soon become one of the most useful contributions in the regular working repertory of every Symphony Orchestra, in this country as well as abroad."

Mr. Stock's memory slips when he writes: "In the autumn of that year I had an opportunity of meeting Mr. Griffes," for "that year" was 1920, and Griffes died April 8 (an obituary account in Musical America says April 9) of 1920. One can only assume that the conversation took place the previous autumn (1919), which presents further difficulties. For the Berkshire Festival occurred in the last week in September, yet in the program books for neither the Boston performance in January is there any mention of revision. One may also reasonably ask whether Mr. Stock, four months before he first played the tone-poem, had examined it so carefully as to be able to suggest revision of minute details to the composer. Whatever may be the answer to these puzzling questions, certain it is that Mr. Stock did not talk with Griffes in the fall of 1920.

For the performances in Boston and Chicago Griffes wrote this program note: 'I have taken as a basis for my work those lines of Coleridge's poem describing the 'stately pleasure-dome,' the 'sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice,' the 'miracle of rare device.' Therefore I call the work 'The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan' rather than 'Kubla Khan.' . . .

"In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea.
So twice five miles of fertile ground
With walls and towers were girdled round:
And there were gardens bright with sinuous rills
Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree:
And here were forests ancient as the hills,
Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

* * * *

The shadows of the dome of pleasure
Floated midway on the waves;
Where was heard the mingled measure
From the fountain and the caves.
It was a miracle of rare device.
A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!"

"As to 'argument,' I have given my imagination free reign in the description of this strange place as well as of purely imaginary revelry which might take place there. The vague, foggy beginning suggests the sacred river, running 'through caverns measureless to man down to a soundless sea.' Then gradually rise the outlines of the palace, 'with walls and towns girdled round.' The gardens with fountains and 'sunny spots of greenery' are next suggested. From inside come sounds of dancing and revelry which increase to a wild climax, then suddenly break off. There is a return to the original mood suggesting the sacred river and the 'caves of ice,'"

To so definite an outline of the course of the music not much can be added. It may be said, however, that the sacred river moves sluggishly, in dark, brooding, mysterious chords for piano over harmonics of curious sonority in low strings; that the walls and towers rise to the accompaniment of stately brass chords; that the gardens with fountains and sunny spots of greenery enter with an enticing oboe-solo over a single sustained F-sharp, the whole with alluring Oriental cast; that ingenious waltz rhythms, at first alternating with the oboe-solo, then rising to a climax on their own account, suggest the dancing and the revelry; that Mr. Griffes's "return to the original mood" is exactly that, and not in any sense a slavish or careless repetition of the beginning—for which Mr. Griffes was far too sensitive an artist; that the tone-poem as a whole shows exquisite proportioning and exquisite general treatment.

Griffes's orchestra is the large orchestra of his day, with a liberal percussion section and a prominent piano (Mr. Sanromá), used, however, as a purely orchestral voice. Mr. Stock's revisions are sparingly and painstakingly made. They consist chiefly of doubling a melody here, or pointing an accent there, of filling out a sonority elsewhere, of assisting long-sustained string tones with the more pungent tremolo in a few measures, of adding a splash of color in an instance or two—all in all hardly anything more than the lending of an experienced conductorial hand to the young and orchestrally inexperienced composer.

Griffes's earlier works show the influence of his German training. Later he learned much from study of the music of Debussy and Ravel. It is sometimes assumed, that these composers, more than any others, influenced his style. For logic and intellectuality in his work, he is sometimes likened to the rigorous Schönberg. Yet in no sense was Griffes an echo of any European composer or "school" of composers. Debussy was the prevailing composer of the years in which he wrote. It is only natural that to his idiom Griffes's work is most closely related. But for sensitiveness and certainty in his music-making he was without peer among young American composers. And he was well on the way toward forging a speech all his own. "Kubla Khan" is his only symphonic work. But the excellent "Poem" for flute and orchestra amply deserves hearing. With a Laurent for the solo-part, it would be eagerly welcomed at the Symphony Concerts.

A. H. M.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Musicians --- Plays and Players --- The Screen

News of Music

Here in Boston

The fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts will end on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, May 1 and 2, with this program of established and favorite classics:

Prelude to the
of Nuremberg'
Prelude to Afternoon of Rondo, "Till Eul

Symphony, No. 5

The series o
bhony Orchestr
Cambridge will ning next with

Suite for Orchestra,
Suite from the Bel

Symphony, No. 1,

Favor State
of Gas, E

Favorable action
Department of

Briton Introduced

Constant Lambert (Brown Music Library)

Whose Tone-Poem, "The Rio Grande," Will be Heard for the First Times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. . . . "Here Is an Unusually Good and Genuinely Musical Mind with a Remarkably Clear Sense of What It Wants to Say and of the One Right Way of Saying It."

Lines in ... magoria touched Griffes's musical imagination. He visioned the caverns of ice, the sunless sea; the pleasure-house, lordly and smiling. He heard the revelries within. He felt the chill mockery of the river-caves. He wrought these visions and sensations into a music rich and potent with suggestion. The susceptible listener knows and feels the imaginings of the word-poet and the tone-poet. He also bathes in their atmosphere of phantasmagoria. And first and last a performance as finely sensitized as the music deepened or rarefied his every impression.

No less Griffes has written a piece of music that sustains itself as such. The germinating motivs are arresting and significant. From them the music expands itself, flexible and firm. Propulsive rhythm gives it movement and vitality. Over it harmonic and instrumental color plays incessantly, shadowed or transparent. The musical progress, the poet-ized suggestion, go hand in hand. There is no rent in the web of atmosphere. It is quite true that Griffes writes in the Debussyan idiom; but as one who has absorbed it; who gives it forth in his own speech; who does not merely imitate. A clear design proceeds to completion. A phantasmagoria in tones lays its spell. Nothing common mars; nothing trite weakens. Imagery, means, expression are equally sensitive and harmonious. The presence of an individual beauty is pervasive and unmistakable. One orchestral work, and Griffes had enriched American music with the tone-poesy in which it is meager.

Dr. Koussevitzky is also the friend of youthful composers, the seeker for new abilities, the cultivator of his own musical time. Whatever their race or their city, he watches for them, spies them out, gives them opportunity, would have his audiences as eager as he. For him the conductor's obligation is not only as perfect performance as he may compass of the old, the tested, the familiar. The conductor is also bound to make room for what is new, untried, experimental, for individual adventure in the immediate hour. And to such music, again, he would have his audience as alert as he. When Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande" made stir in London a year ago, Dr. Koussevitzky was sure to bring it to Boston and yesterday he did.

By title Mr. Lambert "sets" a poem by Sacheverell Sitwell. In the setting he writes an exacting and pungent piano-part that twice over is displayful solo. With it, Mr. Sanromá, modernist by instinct, faith and practice, distinguished himself. Mr. Lambert asks the voices of not too large a chorus. The Cecilia supplied them, thanks to Mr. Fiedler's training and an inspiriting music, with newfound precision, certainty, freedom and flavor. Miss Mae Murray sang incidental measures. Her alto tones set them glowing. Adapting his orchestra to his design, Mr. Lambert discards woodwinds and horns; adds cornets to trumpets, trombones and tuba; assembles the usual strings; crowds the percussion-corner. There the virtuosi he would have did not yesterday fail him. In turn, the whole orchestra was on its mettle. After his habit Dr. Koussevitzky led as one who has found a brave new thing. Last January in New York, from the Schola Cantorum, "The Rio Grande" was a failure with the audience. Yesterday, as in London and in Manchester, it won many ears and many hands. Within belief there was a difference in performance.

"The Rio Grande" is a brave new thing. In the beginning is Mr. Sitwell's poem. Of course it is in free verse, and also mannered. Otherwise no Sitwell—of the modernist three—Osbert, Sacheverell, and their sister—would have signed it. There are broken lengths; a curious rhythm winding and voluptuous; gentle rhymes in near or distant impact; copious verbiage; unexpected adjectives. Underneath this vesture and procedure is unmistakable romantic mood, in the temper of the present day. Lines droop with sensuous languor; sound full or sharp; teem with high-colored images; sink again into sensuous haze. Mr. Lambert has not treated these verses as a text to be followed delineatively. No more has he regarded them as so many words for the chorus and the solo-voice to sing, though they usefully meet that need. Rather he has sought the musical equivalent for the images, the moods, the atmosphere—a decanting from one medium into another.

Mr. Lambert works out his design as a child of his time and surroundings. To him jazz is a natural and congenial speech. He has heard the light music of the theater and not always found it insipid, sterile or cheap. He has listened compassionately to jazz-songs. Brilliant mechanics, the technical mastery and flare of virtuosity, stir him. He is also a composer of skill, resource, imagination and invention, to whom the thing to be expressed and the expressive tones may become as one. There are sensuous languors in Mr. Sitwell's word-picturing, and the winding, voluptuous rhythm. There

Bach with Dr. Koussevitzky and from Stravinsky with Mr. Stokowski, will be heard in a concert of its own at the Museum of Fine Arts on Tuesday evening, May 12.

A final effort is in progress in Paris to complete the fund for a monument to Debussy to which, at Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion, Bostonians contributed two years ago. It still lacks $16,000, now to be asked of all Europe. Present plans contemplate a statue of Debussy to be set up on the edge of the Bois de Boulogne and the marking of his birthplace at Saint-Germain in the suburbs.

stage and in the sifting of time the music becomes concert-piece. Who now thinks of the ballet that the Russians used to dance and even Boston once saw?

H. T. P.

The BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
1881-1931
by M. A. DeWolfe Howe
This Semi-Centennial Edition combines the early narrative of Mr. Higginson's orchestra with new chapters describing its last seventeen seasons. The complete repertory, personnel, and soloists of fifty years are listed.
$2.50
Houghton Mifflin Co.

READ THE HERALD BOOK PAGES FOR THE LATEST BOOK NEWS AND ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Risen Figure Of English Music

Dr. Koussevitzky Presents Constant Lambert in "The Rio Grande"

THE week-end at Symphony Hall brings to performance, in addition to Griffes's "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," also one of the most talked-of essays into the problem of writing symphonic jazz, Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande" for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte. The river in question is not the North American river (it has been pointed out, and cannot be repeated too often), but the majestic river of our South American neighbor, Brazil.

Mr. Lambert's piece is a setting of a poem by Sacheverell Sitwell:

By the Rio Grande
They dance no sarabande
On level banks like leaves above the glassy, lolling tide;
Nor sing they forlorn madrigals
Whose sad note stirs the sleeping gales
Till they wake among the trees and shake the boughs,
And fright the nightingales;
But they dance in the city, down the public squares,
On the marble pavers with each color laid in shares,
At the open church doors loud with light within.
At the bell's huge tolling.
By the river music, gurgling, thin
Through the soft Brazilian air.
The Comendador and Alguacil are there
On horseback, hid with feathers, loud and shrill
Blowing orders on their trumpets like a bird's sharp bill
Through boughs, like a bitter wind, calling
They shine like steady starlight while those other sparks are falling
In burnished armour, with their plumes of fire.
Fireless while all others tire.

The noisy streets are empty and hushed is the town
To where, in the square, they dance and the band is playing;
Such a space of silence through the town to the river
That the water murmurs loud above the band and crowd together;
And the strains of the sarabande,
More lively than a madrigal,
In hand in hand
Like the river and its waterfall
As the great Rio Grande rolls down to the sea.

Loud is the marimba's note
Above the half-salt waves,
And louder still the tympanon,
The plectrum, and the kettle-drum.
Sullen and menacing
Do these brazen voices ring.
They ride outside,
Above the salt-sea's tide
By the Rio Grande.

Till the ships at anchor there
Hear this enchantment of the soft Brazilian air,
By those Southern winds wafted,
Now and gentle,
Their fierceness tempered
By the air that flows between.

Mr. Lambert's forces include besides his chorus (in Boston Arthur Fiedler's Cecilia Society) and his pianist (Mr. Sanromá) also an orchestra of strings, heavy brass (excluding French horns) and percussion. An alto solo voice (Marie Murray) also has prominence. In his brass section Mr. Lambert calls for both trumpets and cornets in addition to trombones. For his percussion section he requires five players for the following assortment of noise-makers: Three kettle-drums, side drum, tenor drum, bass drum, cymbals, Turkish crash (a cymbal hanging suspended), tam-tam, tambourine, castanets, triangle, Chinese tom-tom, cowbell, Chinese block, xylophone, "Jeu de timbres," which is supposedly a glockenspiel with keyboard. The composer directs also that the "chorus is only a part of the work and no more important than, say, the piano part, and it is essential that the singers should have absolute rhythmic precision as the least lagging behind will ruin the ensemble. The chorus should aim at a rather more theatrical and pungent style of singing than is usual with most choral societies." Mr. Lambert is unusually particular also about his percussion effects, for he writes in the score, "All instructions concerning the method of playing the percussion instruments should be meticulously followed and a separate rehearsal of the cadenza is recommended."

Mr. Sitwell's somewhat impressionistic poem Mr. Lambert has set in a sort of modern romanticism. His music by no means slavishly follows the words, in fact one sometimes suspects that at times the words do no more than give the singers consonants and vowels to which to sing their notes. And yet the broad principal divisions of Mr. Lambert's music follow the broad implications of the several portions of Mr. Sitwell's poem. The introduction begins with orchestra and piano alternating with several impetuous and intriguingly syncopated rag-time or jazz motives. The chorus soon enters, also with its own syncopation. After this a melee of energetic, breath-taking rhythmical developments. One predicts a "hot" jazz, perhaps at its hottest. A point of division is reached with the line, "Tireless while all others tire."

Then follows the cadenza about which Mr. Lambert is so anxious in his instructions. It is a long and complicated and brilliant cadenza for piano solo with certain rhythmic interpolations from the battery of percussion instruments. One hears the typical technically expert jazz pianist with his own type of inspiration improvising his own "stuff." With the following lines the noisy type of jazz is laid aside. Trumpets begin pianissimo. The music becomes lyrical and songful. But popular idioms are not for a moment put by. The more sustained "lyrics" of operetta or comic opera or review are suggested.

And these "lyrics" at their best no "serious" composer can afford to treat with condescension. Mr. Lambert incorporates the effect into his work. The gentle rhythms and the gentle sonorities are excellent contrast. Then there is ascent to another wild climax as the poet describes the various instruments that join in the din of the South American dance. Once more, after the lines, "Above the salt-sea's tide by the Rio Grande," there is a second, shorter, perhaps more full-voiced piano cadenza to mark another division point. The remaining division is for the most part quiet, given over in large part to an alto solo with chorus in humming accompaniment.

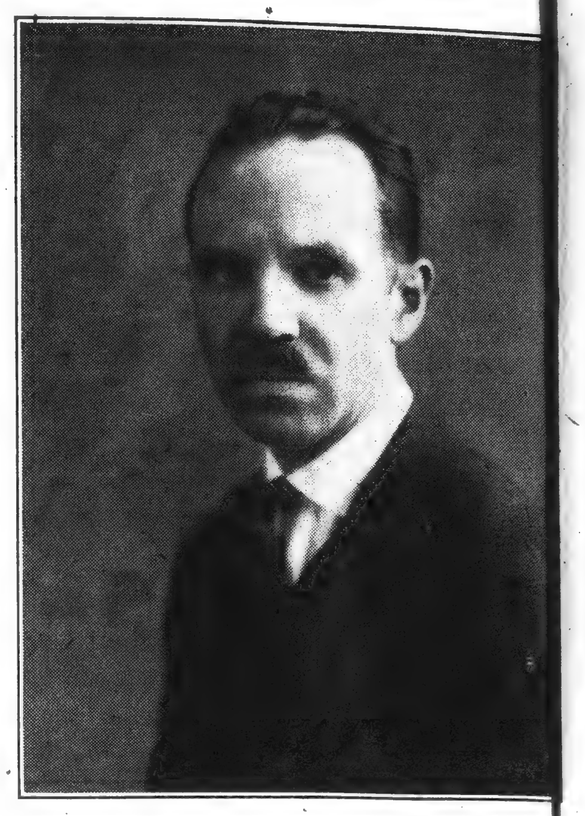
Constant Lambert was born in London Aug. 23, 1905. He studied at the Royal College of Music, composition under Vaughan Williams and counterpoint under R. O. Morris, who has had a profound effect on many of the younger English composers. In an interview in The Star (London) he has been thus quoted: "Noise and not quiet, is my great stimulant to creative work. When I want to get the plan of a work in my head I don't go into Shropshire or on to Hampstead Heath. I take a walk down Shadwell or Wapping [two rather squalid East End neighborhoods near the docks]. Apart from Mr. Sitwell's poem, I drew inspiration for this piece from the two reviews, "Dover Street to Dixie" and "Blackbirds," and I worked it out wandering about the East End. In fact, most of my work has been done in the noisy places of the world. I don't believe I could write two bars in Florence or Nuremberg, or in any of the other centers of art and culture. But give me the crowded bar of a public house in Gravesend, or the cafes of Toulon and Marseilles, and the music just bubbles up. . . . The finale of my last piano sonata was written to the accompaniment of six automatic drills in a city street." One might add that the piano sonata and "Reo Grande" are the two most noteworthy of a rapidly increasing list of works from the pen of this twenty-six-year-old composer.

On jazz, he thus expressed himself in the same interview: "Jazz is becoming lowering and depressing in its effect. I have tried to make it stimulating and healthy. I have tried to make it genuinely vigorous and gay, and yet to express ideas which are perfectly serious. . . ."

"The Rio Grande" was written in 1927. The first performance took place in Manchester by the Hallé Orchestra and chorus Dec. 12, 1929. The same orchestra and chorus gave it a first London performance Dec. 17 (?) 1930, with Hamilton Harty, the conductor of the orchestra as pianist, and Mr. Lambert conducting. This performance received the unanimous approval of reviewers, some of which have already been printed in these columns. In addition, Ernest Newman wrote, "The essential thing is that here is a musical mind of a really fine order, an imagination that vivifies whatever it touches and instinctively finds the right expression for its personal vision. And Harvey Grace concluded a very informative letter to the New York Herald-Tribune with these proud words: "What really matters is that Mr. Lambert has given us one more proof of what some of us have maintained for a considerable time, namely, that in the writing of really up-to-date works which are both original and musical, we have in England at the present time a group of young men who can meet the Continental disciples of Stravinsky and Schoenberg at their own game and beat them all ends up." When the work was performed this winter in New York the reaction was less favorable. But whether the forces were entirely adequate it would be impossible at this distance to say.

A. H. M.

American Remembered



(Colby—Transcript)

Charles Tomlinson Griffes (1884-1920)

Whose Tone-Poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" Will Be Revived at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. . . . "A Rare and Original Talent—One of the Finer, More Sensitive and Fastidious Musical Natures that the United States has Produced."

This Semi-Centennial Edition combines the early narrative of Mr. Higginson's orchestra with new chapters describing its last seventeen seasons. The complete repertory, personnel, and soloists of fifty years are listed.
$2.50
HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

An American Who Deserves Revival

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns to Griffes's Tone-Poem of "Kubla Khan"

FOR the impending visit of distinguished Japanese guests Dr. Koussevitzky has placed upon the week's program at Symphony Hall Charles Tomlinson Griffes's symphonic poem "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan." It was composed in 1912, revised in 1916, came to first performance on Nov. 28-29, 1919 by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Monteux. Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra played it on Jan. 16-17, 1920. Other orchestras followed. Mr. Stock and Mr. Griffes talked together about certain changes in the score for better orchestral adjustment; but they had not been made when death overtook the composer in the following April. Mr. Stock subsequently inserted them, and they appear in a new edition of the tone-poem published in 1929, to be used by Dr. Koussevitzky on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. Stock's account of these changes is printed on a fly-leaf of the new score: "A few remarks concerning the revised edition of Griffes's 'The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan' might be both welcome and appropriate.

"I performed this work in Chicago in January, 1920. In the autumn of that year I had an opportunity of meeting Mr. Griffes during a festival of chamber music at Pittsfield, Massachusetts, when I suggested to him that the scoring of his work, in some places, could be improved upon. This he readily admitted, and we arranged to meet again in order to go over the score together.

"The results of this very careful scrutiny are faithfully embodied in this revised version. Nothing has been added that would not have been sanctioned by the composer. I have no doubt that with these changes and amplifications the orchestration will 'sound' more readily, and present this very fine work to its very best advantage.

"I hope that in the improved form it will soon become one of the most useful compositions in the regular working repertory of every Symphony Orchestra, in this country as well as abroad."

Mr. Stock's memory slips when he writes: "In the autumn of that year I had an opportunity of meeting Mr. Griffes," for "that year" was 1920, and Griffes died April 8 (an obituary account in Musical America says April 9) of 1920. One can only assume that the conversation took place the previous autumn (1919), which presents further difficulties. For the Berkshire Festival occurred in the last week in September, yet in the program books for neither the Boston performance in January is there any mention of revision. One may also reasonably ask whether Mr. Stock, four months before he first played the tone-poem, had examined it so carefully as to be able to suggest revision of minute details to the composer. Whatever may be the answer to these puzzling questions, certain it is that Mr. Stock did not talk with Griffes in the fall of 1920.

For the performances in Boston and Chicago Griffes wrote this program note: "I have taken as a basis for my work those lines of Coleridge's poem describing the 'stately pleasure-dome,' the 'sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice,' the 'miracle of rare device.' Therefore I call the work 'The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan' rather than 'Kubla Khan.' . . .

"In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea.
So twice five miles of fertile ground
With walls and towers were girdled round:
And there were gardens bright with sinuous rills
Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree:
And here were forests ancient as the hills,
Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

* * * * *

The shadows of the dome of pleasure
Floated midway on the waves;
Where was heard the mingled measure
From the fountain and the caves.
It was a miracle of rare device,
A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!"

"As to 'argument,' I have given my imagination free reign in the description of this strange place as well as of purely imaginary revelry which might take place there. The vague, foggy beginning suggests the sacred river, 'running through caverns measureless to man down to a soundless sea.' Then gradually rise the outlines of the palace, 'with walls and towns girdled round.' The gardens with fountains and 'sunny spots of greenery' are next suggested. From inside come sounds of dancing and revelry which increase to a wild climax, then suddenly break off. There is a return to the original mood suggesting the sacred river and the 'caves of ice.'"

To so definite an outline of the course of the music not much can be added. It may be said, however, that the sacred river moves sluggishly, in dark, brooding, mysterious chords for piano over harmonics of curious sonority in low strings; that the walls and towers rise to the accompaniment of stately brass chords; that the gardens with fountains and sunny spots of greenery enter with an enticing oboe-solo over a single sustained F-sharp, the whole with alluring Oriental cast; that ingenious waltz rhythms, at first alternating with the oboe-solo, then rising to a climax on their own account, suggest the dancing and the revelry; that Mr. Griffes's "return to the original mood" is exactly that, and not in any sense a slavish or careless repetition of the beginning—for which Mr. Griffes was far too sensitive an artist; that the tone-poem as a whole shows exquisite proportioning and exquisite general treatment.

Griffes's orchestra is the large orchestra of his day, with a liberal percussion section and a prominent piano (Mr. Sanromá), used, however, as a purely orchestral voice. Mr. Stock's revisions are sparingly and painstakingly made. They consist chiefly of doubling a melody here, or pointing an accent there, of filling out a sonority elsewhere, of assisting long-sustained string tones with the more pungent tremolo in a few measures, of adding a splash of color in an instance or two—all in all hardly anything more than the lending of an experienced conductorial hand to the young and orchestrally inexperienced composer.

Griffes's earlier works show the influence of his German training. Later he learned much from study of the music of Debussy and Ravel. It is sometimes assumed that these composers, more than any others, influenced his style. For logic and intellectuality in his work, he is sometimes likened to the rigorous Schönberg. Yet in no sense was Griffes an echo of any European composer or "school" of composers. Debussy was the prevailing composer of the years in which he wrote. It is only natural that to his idiom Griffes's work is most closely related. But for sensitiveness and certainty in his music-making he was without peer among young American composers. And he was well on the way toward forging a speech all his own. "Kubla Khan" is his only symphonic work. But the excellent "Poem" for flute and orchestra amply deserves hearing. With a Laurent for the solo-part, it would be eagerly welcomed at the Symphony Concerts.

A. H. M.

Symphony === "Fron

An Afternoon Of Composers Caught Young

Lambert and Beatified Jazz, Griffes and His Visions, Schubert, Stravinsky

THERE is no better friend to the music of American composers than Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. He welcomes new matter from the elder and established men; brings it to thorough and sympathetic performance; meanwhile keeps their enduring work in the public ear and mind. He is as well disposed to youthful and little known Americans. He examines their manuscripts. If he finds on their staves promise, performance and reflections of their own time, he makes room for them at the Symphony Concerts, to present hearing adds encouragement for the future. Yesterday he found a new channel for these honorable offices. He revived the master-work of a dead American composer whose music in recent years has fallen into strange neglect. . . .

In the seasons of 1919 and 1920 Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra played for the first times, and four times over, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," tone-poem by C. T. Griffes. It disclosed, in music of fine texture and ample dimensions, a composer of individuality and imagination, skillful in his medium, following a logic of his own, into tones conjuring rare visions. Four months later, when conductors were hastening to discover and play his earlier pieces, hateful Death cut off Griffes in the young prime of the thirties. There was public and private lament. There were renewed performances. Yet in a few years all his work was put by and forgotten. Pressed by classics and conservatives on the one side, by "novelties" and innovators on the other, a lone man in an unabating flood, the conductor's perpetual problem is to remember, repeat and revive the music, lately new, that also deserves to endure. The fate of composers may hang on such returns.

Dr. Koussevitzky timely recollected, or timely discovered, Griffes and "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan." At the end of the performance yesterday, their place in the music of American composers was renewed and re-assured. Lines in Coleridge's poem of phantasmagoria touched Griffes's musical imagination. He visioned the caverns of ice, the sunless sea; the pleasure-house, lordly and smiling. He heard the revelries within. He felt the chill mockery of the river-caves. He wrought these visions and sensations into a music rich and potent with suggestion. The susceptible listener knows and feels the imaginings of the word-poet and the tone-poet. He also bathes in their atmosphere of phantasmagoria. And first and last a performance as finely sensitized as the music deepened or rarefied his every impression.

No less Griffes has written a piece of music that sustains itself as such. The germinating motivs are arresting and significant. From them the music expands itself, flexible and firm. Propulsive rhythm gives it movement and vitality. Over it harmonic and instrumental color plays incessantly, shadowed or transparent. The musical progress, the poetized suggestion, go hand in hand. There is no rent in the web of atmosphere. It is quite true that Griffes writes in the Debussyan idiom; but as one who has absorbed it; who gives it forth in his own speech; who does not merely imitate. A clear design proceeds to completion. A phantasmagoria in tones lays its spell. Nothing common mars; nothing trite weakens. Imagery, means, expression are equally sensitive and harmonious. The presence of an individual beauty is pervasive and unmistakable. One orchestral work, and Griffes had enriched American music with the tone-poesy in which it is meager.

Dr. Koussevitzky is also the friend of youthful composers, the seeker for new abilities, the cultivator of his own musical time. Whatever their race or their city, he watches for them, spies them out, gives them opportunity, would have his audiences as eager as he. For him the conductor's obligation is not only as perfect performance as he may compass of the old, the tested, the familiar. The conductor is also bound to make room for what is new, untried, experimental, for individual adventure in the immediate hour. And to such music, again, he would have his audience as alert as he. When Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande" made stir in London a year ago, Dr. Koussevitzky was sure to bring it to Boston and yesterday he did.

By title Mr. Lambert "sets" a poem by Sacheverell Sitwell. In the setting he writes an exacting and pungent piano-part that twice over is displayful solo. With it, Mr. Sanromá, modernist by instinct, faith and practice, distinguished himself. Mr. Lambert asks the voices of not too large a chorus. The Cecilia supplied them, thanks to Mr. Fiedler's training and an inspiriting music, with newfound precision, certainty, freedom and flavor. Miss Mae Murray sang incidental measures. Her alto tones set them glowing. Adapting his orchestra to his design, Mr. Lambert discards woodwinds and horns; adds cornets to trumpets, trombones and tuba; assembles the usual strings; crowds the percussion-corner. There the virtuosi he would have did not yesterday fail him. In turn, the whole orchestra was on its mettle. After his habit Dr. Koussevitzky led as one who has found a brave new thing. Last January in New York, from the Schola Cantorum, "The Rio Grande" was a failure with the audience. Yesterday, as in London and in Manchester, it won many ears and many hands. Within belief there was a difference in performance.

"The Rio Grande" is a brave new thing. In the beginning is Mr. Sitwell's poem. Of course it is in free verse, and also mannered. Otherwise no Sitwell—of the modernist three—Osbert, Sacheverell, and their sister—would have signed it. There are broken lengths; a curious rhythm winding and voluptuous; gentle rhymes in near or distant impact; copious verbiage; unexpected adjectives. Underneath this vesture and procedure is unmistakable romantic mood, in the temper of the present day. Lines droop with sensuous languor; sound full or sharp; teem with high-colored images; sink again into sensuous haze. Mr. Lambert has not treated these verses as a text to be followed delineatively. No more has he regarded them as so many words for the chorus and the solo-voice to sing, though they usefully meet that need. Rather he has sought the musical equivalent for the images, the moods, the atmosphere—a decanting from one medium into another.

Mr. Lambert works out his design as a child of his time and surroundings. To him jazz is a natural and congenial speech. He has heard the light music of the theater and not always found it insipid, sterile or cheap. He has listened compassionately to jazz-songs. Brilliant mechanics, the technical mastery and flare of virtuosity, stir him. He is also a composer of skill, resource, imagination and invention, to whom the thing to be expressed and the expressive tones may become as one. There are sensuous languors in Mr. Sitwell's word-picturing, and the winding, voluptuous rhythm. There is also sound that is not soft and rhythms that beat strong. Obviously jazz is the tonal equivalent; but since Mr. Lambert is a musician, a beatified jazz of musical texture and imaginative suggestion. A lyric sweetness makes occasional interlude in Mr. Sitwell's poem. Its equivalent is this light stuff of the theater, but again beatified, new-textured, imaginatively warmed. Mr. Sitwell's poem is a virtuoso-feat. Musicalizing it, as it were, give the pianist one elaborated, another lesser cadenza.

The musician in Mr. Lambert accomplishes this design. He plies jazz-rhythms but with a plastic freedom and a light vigor unknown to the ordinary practitioner. He remembers jazz-instrumentation and makes play with it in his brass choir and percussion group, but again with light hand, fine shading, quick darts and flashes of color. Such jazz becomes a music of suggestion and fancy. It sighs languorously; syncopates gaily; dins with wit; may carry hints of a newfound poetry and picture. . . . The cadenzas for the piano fill pauses. The course of the music halts; the pianist rhapsodizes. Mr. Lambert puts jazz at the back of his virtuoso-head, brilliance on the tips of his virtuoso-fingers. He is languorous and he is dazzling. The percussion-corner reminds him of his rhythms. . . . The songful interludes keep the prevailing lightness. Mr. Lambert writes in gentle fervors; with a sweetness that is not cloying. A musician is tempering and transfiguring the sentimental commonplaces of jazz-songs and of the musical plays. They begin to swim in Mr. Sitwell's nostalgic haze. The measures for solo voice are the final evocation of that mood. The Brazilian vista fades; the music stills. . . . The spell lingers until the applause rings.

This new and original music of Griffes and Lambert was sandwiched between a nineteenth and a twentieth-century classic. The forepiece was Schubert's Symphony in C major, played for the first time under Dr. Koussevitzky on a Friday afternoon. Possibly, the conductor tended to dramatize the first movement at the expense of the contentedly songful Schubert. Certainly he took the finale at a pace so brisk as to hint that "heavenly lengths" may bear a speedy end. First, last and through forty-five minutes, the flowing song of Schubert delighted most that heard. We dissenters, a beggarly and, no doubt, unmusical minority, hid our shame and repined inwardly for a symphony of more substance and less sweetness, of more shadow and less light, of orchestral skill as well as melodious fluency. But the woodwinds of the orchestra clothed the slow movement in a luscious beauty of sound; while the scherzo and the trio may pass for heaven-sent melodies. No doubt the Cambridge boy overdid the matter when he prattled about a "bird-song" symphony, but it is permissible to be soon sated with it.

The Suite from Stravinsky's first ballet, "The Fire Bird," brought up the rear. Under Dr. Koussevitzky it has become the delicate and adroit show-piece of a virtuoso orchestra. Those who shiver and shrink before the "rough stuff," as they call it, of "The Rite of Spring," "Noces," "Œdipus" and the "Psalms-Symphony," take their pleasure of the great Igor innocent of greatness, light, fanciful, glamorous, giving no more than two or three hints of the composer that is to be. But the fate that steadily pursues him has overtaken even this early "Fire-Bird." He writes for the stage and in the sifting of time the music becomes concert-piece. Who now thinks of the ballet that the Russians used to dance and even Boston once saw?

H. T. P.

The
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
1881-1931
by M. A. DeWolfe Howe
This Semi-Centennial Edition combines the early narrative of Mr. Higginson's orchestra with new chapters describing its last seventeen seasons. The complete repertory, personnel, and soloists of fifty years are listed.
$2.50
Houghton Mifflin Co.

READ THE HERALD BOOK PAGES FOR THE LATEST BOOK NEWS AND ANNOUNCEMENTS.

WEDNESDAY TRANSCRIPT
"The Anchor Watch"
News notes on Yachtsmen

Hannigan to Insist on Liquor Parley

Major Judson Hannigan, president of the Republican Club of Massachusetts, is determined that the conference he has called for April 30 of prominent party members for a frank discussion of the prohibition problem, will be held "even if we have only a corporal's guard." Major Hannigan has taken his stand in response to his suggestion.

Among those who have declined the invitation to attend the proposed parley is Robert M. Washburn, president of the Roosevelt Club, who takes the position that if any policy is to be shaved, President Hoover should lead and the loyal Republicans should follow. He has declared that the Roosevelt Club will support the policies of President Hoover in 1932 "whether he be parched or soused, whether he leads into a desert or a swamp."

The original Hannigan invitation list has been extended to include President Gaspar G. Bacon of the State Senate, Speaker Leverett Saltonstall of the House, former Governors Alvan T. Fuller and Channing H. Cox, Louis X. Leggett, member of the Republican National Committee from Massachusetts; Mrs. William Tilton, militant prohibition leader, and Mrs. Anna C. M. Tillinghast, immigration commissioner.

Reference on the part of certain of the party leaders to express their opinion is apparently due not so much to opposition to the proposal as to a desire to give the matter careful study.

There are many in the party who look upon the conference as unnecessary in view of the fact that, as they view the situation, the voters of the State clearly indicated their position on prohibition by emphatic repeal of the Baby Volstead Act in the November election, and in the senatorial district reference of 1928. Instructing the senator from the district to vote for a resolution requesting Congress to take action for repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment.

The present Legislature, it is further pointed out, also has passed a resolution calling upon Congress to call a constitutional convention of the States to amend itself propose such an amendment and or repeal the Eighteenth Amendment, or submit it for ratification by conventions in the several States.

That record, according to those who can visualize no good resulting from such a conference as Major Hannigan proposes, is ample guide to any party desiring to express response to the will of the Massachusetts electorate with relation to prohibition.

"The board of assessors, after a thorough examination of the petitions pending, have decided that in most instances they are without merit and propose to resist them, leaving the petitioners to their statutory remedy at law."

"The tax abatement, 'racket,' was responsible for the present financial condition of the city of Chicago and to a great extent was the cause of the financial plight of the city of Fall River as recently disclosed by James Jackson, finance commissioner for Fall River. I do not propose to allow this 'racket' to gain a foothold in the city of Boston.

"The tax abatement, 'racket,' was responsible for the present financial condition of the city of Chicago and to a great extent was the cause of the financial plight of the city of Fall River as recently disclosed by James Jackson, finance commissioner for Fall River. I do not propose to allow this 'racket' to gain a foothold in the city of Boston.

A New Book
"THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: 1881-1931"
Semi-Centennial Edition, combining a revision of M. A. De Wolfe Howe's book of 1914, with new chapters and appendices, carrying the narrative and record of the Orchestra through fifty years.
At leading bookstores, or by application to Symphony Hall, Boston

SYMPHONY RECORD

The new book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931," by M. A. de Wolfe Howe, will be issued this week, the last of the Symphony season, and will be available Wednesday. The book combines a revision of the narrative published in 1914, with new chapters carrying the fortunes of the orchestra through the 17 ensuing years. The complete lists of the works played, the soloists and the personnel through the 50th season are recorded. The book is published by Houghton Mifflin Company.

The
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
1881-1931
by M. A. De Wolfe Howe
This Semi-Centennial Edition combines the early narrative of Mr. Higginson's orchestra with new chapters describing its last seventeen seasons. The complete repertory, personnel, and soloists of fifty years are listed.
$2.50
HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

The Screen

Galileo C... embered

Perfector of the earl... the stars, hero of an... had written about... Edwin Francis Ed... The Transcript, w... his Talk About Bo... WNAC at 7.45

(Colby—Transcript)

11 States Have Enacted Congressional Redistricting

Washington, April 23 (A.P.)—Lines marking new areas for congressional campaigns will affect the membership of the House in the next decade. Eleven of the thirty-two States becoming of letter files and bank accounts prepar... tory to Senate committee hearing wit... world wide publicity.

Governor Confers

"I know from experience the tr... mendous nervous strain involved in suc... preparation and hearing. Senator Glas... who introduced the resolution which a... tempts to authorize a Senate committe... to investigate violations of the Federa... Corrupt Practices Act or any frauduler... conversion of campaign funds to privat... uses, was one of the outstanding Smit... supporters in Virginia in 1928 whe... Virginia voted against the former Gov... ernor of New York. The Virginia Stat... Democratic Committee handled twice a... much money as the Virginia anti-Smit... Democrats, but have never made an... never been asked by anyone to make an... such report as has been demanded of th... Virginia anti-Smith Democrats."

...fes (1884-1920)

...f Kubla Khan" Will Be Revived Saturday. . . . "A Rare and ...Sensitive and Fastidious Musical ...tes has Produced."

ong and depressing in its effect. I tried to make it stimulating and ...hy. I have tried to make it genuine... gorous and gay, and yet to express ... which are perfectly serious. . . ." ...he Rio Grande" was written in 1927. first performance took place in Man... er by the Hallé Orchestra and ...s Dec. 12, 1929. The same orches... nd chorus gave it a first London ...rmance Dec. 17 (?) 1930, with Ham... Harty, the conductor of the orches... s pianist, and Mr. Lambert conduct...

For the performances in Boston and ...hicago Griffes wrote this program note: 'I have taken as a basis for my work ...hose lines of Coleridge's poem describ... ng the 'stately pleasure-dome,' the 'sunny ...leasure-dome with caves of ice,' the ...miracle of rare device.' Therefore I ...all the work 'The Pleasure-Dome of ...Kubla Khan' rather than 'Kubla ...Khan.' . . .

"In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea.
So twice five miles of fertile ground
With walls and towers were girdled round:
And there were gardens bright with sinuous rills
Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree;
And here were forests ancient as the hills,
Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

* * * * *

Where the shadows of the dome of pleasure
Floated midway on the waves;
Where was heard the mingled measure
From the fountain and the caves.
It was a miracle of rare device.
A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!"

"As to 'argument,' I have given my imagination free reign in the description of this strange place as well as of purely imaginary revelry which might take place there. The vague, foggy beginning suggests the sacred river, running 'through caverns measureless to man down to a soundless sea.' Then gradually rise the outlines of the palace, 'with walls and towns girdled round.' The gardens with fountains and 'sunny spots of greenery' are next suggested. From inside come sounds of dancing and revelry which increase to a wild climax, then suddenly break off. There is a return to the original mood suggesting the sacred river and the 'caves of ice,'"

To so definite an outline of the course of the music not much can be added. It may be said, however, that the sacred river moves sluggishly, in dark, brooding, mysterious chords for piano over harmonics of curious sonority in low strings; that the walls and towers rise to the accompaniment of stately brass chords; that the gardens with fountains and sunny spots of greenery enter with an enticing oboe-solo over a single sustained F-sharp, the whole with alluring Oriental cast; that ingenious waltz rhythms, at first alternating with the oboe-solo, then rising to a climax on their own account, suggest the dancing and the revelry; that Mr. Griffes's "return to the original mood" is exactly that, and not in any sense a slavish or careless repetition of the beginning—for which Mr. Griffes was far too sensitive an artist—that the tone-poem as a whole shows exquisite proportioning and exquisite general treatment.

Griffes's orchestra is the large orchestra of his day, with a liberal percussion section and a prominent piano (Mr. Sanromá), used, however, as a purely orchestral voice. Mr. Stock's revisions are sparingly and painstakingly made. They consist chiefly of doubling a melody here, or pointing an accent there, of filling out a sonority elsewhere, of assisting long-sustained string tones with the more pungent tremolo in a few measures, of adding a splash of color in an instance or two—all in all hardly anything more than the lending of an experienced conductorial hand to the young and orchestrally inexperienced composer.

Griffes's earlier works show the influence of his German training. Later he learned much from study of the music of Debussy and Ravel. It is sometimes assumed that these composers, more than any others, influenced his style. For logic and intellectuality in his work, he is sometimes likened to the rigorous Schönberg. Yet in no sense was Griffes an echo of any European composer or "school" of composers. Debussy was the prevailing composer of the years in which he wrote. It is only natural that to his idiom Griffes's work is most closely related. But for sensitiveness and certainty in his music-making he was without peer among young American composers. And he was well on the way toward forging a speech all his own. "Kubla Khan" is his only symphonic work. But the excellent "Poem" for flute and orchestra amply deserves hearing. With a Laurent for the solo-part, it would be eagerly welcomed at the Symphony Concerts.

A. H. M.

An American Who Deserves Revival

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns to Griffes's Tone-Poem of "Kubla Khan"

FOR the impending visit of distinguished Japanese guests Dr. Koussevitzky has placed upon the week's program at Symphony Hall Charles Tomlinson Griffes's symphonic poem "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan." It was composed in 1912, revised in 1916, came to first performance on Nov. 28-29, 1919 by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Monteux. Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra played it on Jan. 16-17, 1920. Other orchestras followed. Mr. Stock and Mr. Griffes talked together about certain changes in the score for better orchestral adjustment; but they had not been made when death overtook the composer in the following April. Mr. Stock subsequently inserted them, and they appear in a new edition of the tone-poem published in 1929, to be used by Dr. Koussevitzky on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. Stock's account of these changes is printed on a fly-leaf of the new score: "A few remarks concerning the revised edition of Griffes's 'The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan' might be both welcome and appropriate.

"I performed this work in Chicago in January, 1920. In the autumn of that year I had an opportunity of meeting Mr. Griffes during a festival of chamber music at Pittsfield, Massachusetts, when I suggested to him that the scoring of his work, in some places, could be improved upon. This he readily admitted, and we arranged to meet again in order to go over the score together.

"The results of this very careful scrutiny are faithfully embodied in this revised version. Nothing has been added that would not have been sanctioned by the composer. I have no doubt that with these changes and amplifications the orchestration will 'sound' more readily, and present this very fine work to its very best advantage.

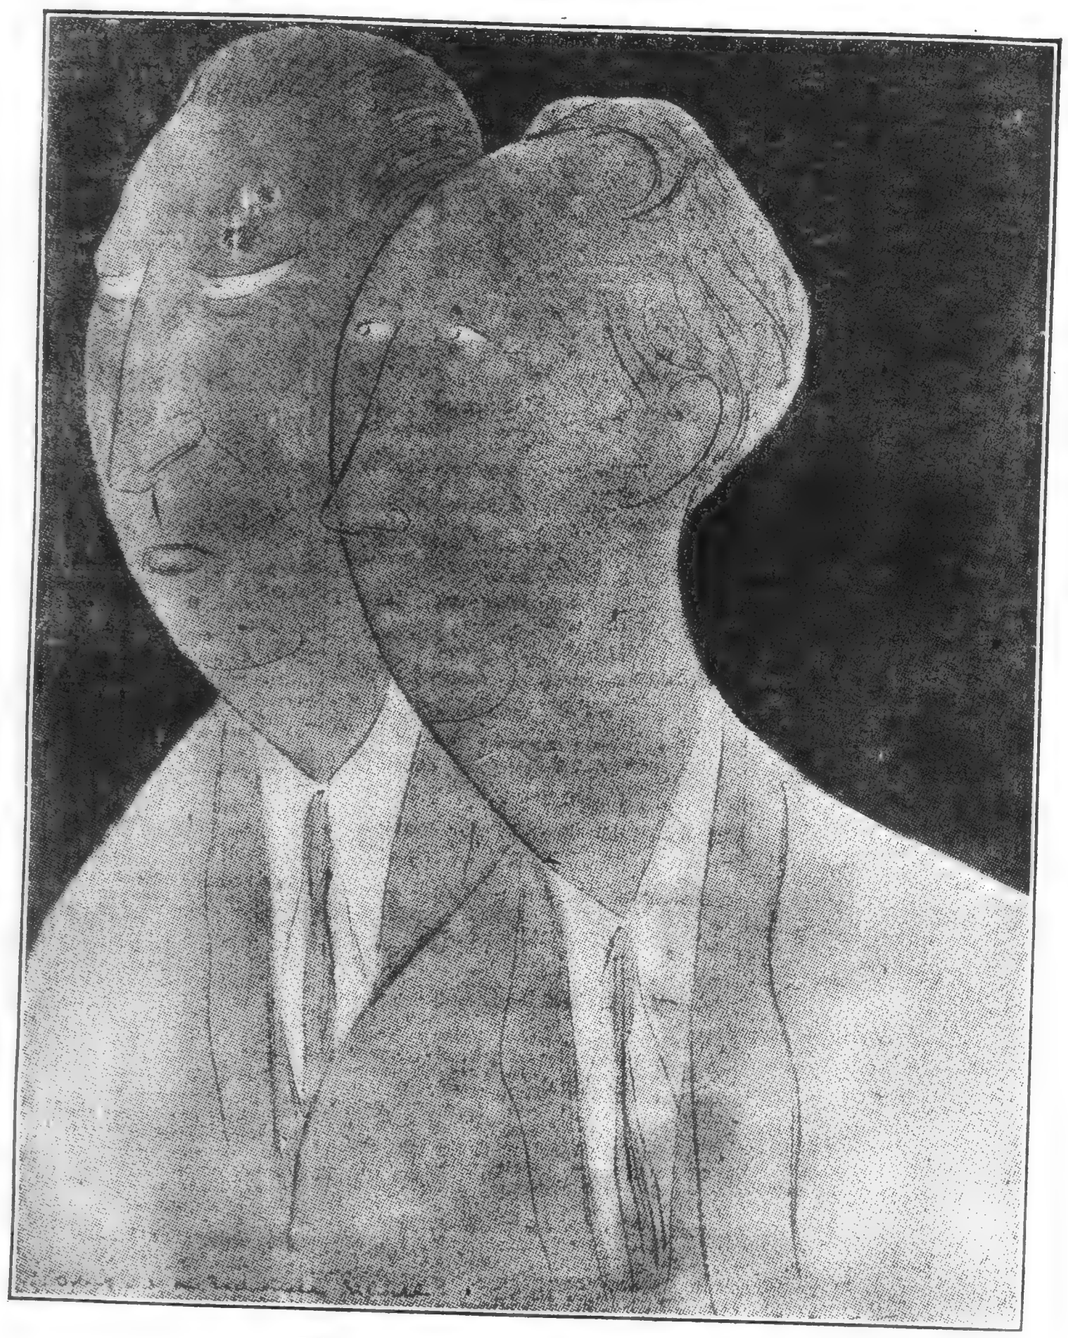
"I hope that in the improved form it will soon become one of the most useful compositions in the regular working repertory of every Symphony Orchestra, in this country as well as abroad."

Mr. Stock's memory slips when he writes: "In the autumn of that year I had an opportunity of meeting Mr. Griffes," for "that year" was 1920, and Griffes died April 8 (an obituary account in Musical America says April 9) of 1920. One can only assume that the conversation took place the previous autumn (1919), which presents further difficulties. For the Berkshire Festival occurred in the last week in September, yet in the program books for neither the Boston performance in January is there any mention of revision. One may also reasonably ask whether Mr. Stock, four months before he first played the tone-poem, had examined it so carefully as to be able to suggest revision of minute details to the composer. Whatever may be the answer to these puzzling questions, it is certain that Mr. Stock did not talk with Griffes in the fall of 1920.

175

layers === Music and Musicians

"Our Appearance"



The Poet of "The Rio Grande"

To Right is Sacheverell Sitwell, Maker of the Verses that Constant Lambert Clothed with Music, Heard at the Symphony Concerts Last Friday and Saturday, to be Repeated This Evening. To Left is His Brother Osbert, Likewise Man of Letters and Frequenter of Aesthetic Circles in London. Max Beerbohm Drew the Caricature

MUSIC

Tues Apr 28

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sixth and last concert of the Monday concert series of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last evening. Dr. Koussevitzky had finally settled upon the following program, one which evidently pleased his audience well: J. S. Bach, Suite for Orchestra, No. 3, in D major (in place of the originally promised "Ballett Borodine," for orchestra and chorus, by N. Tcherepnin); Lambert, "The Rio Grande," for chorus, orchestra, and solo pianoforte (poem by Sacheverell Sitwell); Brahms, Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68. The chorus of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assisted in the performance of Constant Lambert's work, whose pianoforte part was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma.

The Bach suite, one of those performed at the recent Bach festival, is among the most delightful of the composer's orchestral works. Not only for the beautiful and justly familiar air—often played by violinists as a solo transcribed or the G string—is the suite memorial; it has spontaneity, a melodic charm of the highest order, a complete freedom from the mechanical repetition of conventional formulas in which Bach was accustomed to take refuge when ideas were lacking. The prelude with, which it opened, the gigue with which it closed, were full of living and varied beauty.

Constant Lambert's setting for chorus and orchestra of a poem by Sacheverell Sitwell—member of a well-known family of English modernist poets—was first introduced to symphony audiences during the past week-end. Last night it again created a vivid impression by the boldness and brilliance of its orchestration, the skill with which it illustrated the changing moods of the poem and pictured the scenes there described. The almost hysterical irregularity and violence of its rhythms and the percussive brilliance of the long and difficult interludes for piano solo — superlatively played by Mr. Sanroma—seemed to owe as much to jazz as to the dances of Brazil and the tones of the marimba, yet there were suggestions of blazing sunlight and color and movement, hints of more typically Latin-American dance-rhythm and melodic idiom, the langorous closing measures of the contralto—traits that belonged authentically to the setting and gave the music its claim to be regarded as not solely a riotous tour-de-force of technique.

An excellent performance of Brahms's C minor symphony closed the concert (and the series). Dr. Koussevitzky's readings of Brahms seem constantly to gain in measure and balance, while they lose nothing in dramatic and emotional force. There are now fewer exaggerated extremes of tempo. The introduction to the first movement had last night no excessive breadth, neither was the exquisite andante transformed into a slow adagio. Yet there was no lack of majesty and exaltation in the one, nor of repose and calm loveliness in the other. The flowing grace of the allegretto, the overwhelming jubilation of the final pages of the last movement were alike to be remembered.

Enthusiastic applause was accorded to the players and singers of the evening, and to Dr. Koussevitzky. S. S.

SYMPHONY ENDS MONDAY SERIES

"The Rio Grande" Given With Cecilia Chorus

apr 27

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current series of Monday Symphony Concerts came to a close last evening. The programme, slightly altered from that first announced, embraced three movements from Bach's Suite in D major, substituted for Tcherepnin's "Borodin"; Lambert's "The Rio Grande," introduced to Boston at the concerts of last Friday and Saturday; and the First Symphony of Brahms.

A little suspicious, perhaps, of novelties and of "modern music" in general, the audience of last evening received young Mr. Lambert's exuberant piece a shade less cordially than did that of Friday afternoon. Had it been hearing "The Rio Grande" for the second time this relative tepidity would have been understandable. For this is hardly music to live with. Not a little of the initial interest in the work comes from wondering what the composer is going to do next; and when such curiosity is satisfied and the critical faculty allowed to function undisturbed, the piece seems more than ever a sort of glorification of the obvious. Yet it is rarely entertaining, and the composer's gusto, his tremendous dynamic energy are stimulating and refreshing.

Again the performance redounded to the credit of the orchestra, the chorus of the Cecilia Society, Miss Marie Murray, who sang the engaging alto solo; Mr. Sanroma, who played in true virtuoso fashion the exceedingly difficult piano part, and Dr. Koussevitzky, who conducted with sympathy and an infectious vitality. For the rest, the concert was familiar matter played with familiar eloquence and to a responsive audience.

Pops Begin on May 6

ON the night of May 6, the Wednesday following the conclusion of the regular Symphony season, the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will begin.

This will be the 46th season of the Pops and the second under Arthur Fiedler whose initial season last summer was one of the most popular the Pops have ever had.

Arthur Fiedler, a native of Boston and son of Emanuel Fiedler, former violinist of this orchestra, has in recent years made a distinct name for himself by his rising talents as conductor.

The program for the opening night includes:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" ... Berlioz
Overture to "Oberon" ... Weber
Minuet (for string orchestra) ... Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Carmen" ... Bizet
Tales from Johann Strauss ... Korngold
Londonderry Air
arranged by Hamilton Harty
(For violin solo, string orchestra and harp)
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 2 ... Liszt
"Girl Crazy," selection ... Gershwin
Czardas from the opera, "Ghost of the Warrior" ... Grossman

Gossip of the Town

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, our Boston flashlight biography today:

Ranks with Toscanini, Stokowski, world's greatest symphony conductors. His musicians declare him severe, drill-master disciplinarian, but only when his baton is up. Gentle as a child in minutes of relaxation. Closes his eyes to horseplay among the men at rehearsal. Dark, handsome genius type.

Volcano of dramatic temperament when music rouses him. Free of eccentric explosions or sensational conduct that mark other great maestri.

Once owner of large Russian estates of which the revolution dispossessed him, he is the grand seignior in manner down to his very finger tips. Meticulously formal and fashionably tailored. Special Russian dishes prepared for him by a Russian valet-and-cook, whose devotion to his master is a kind of idol worship.

Harbors burning ambition to display Boston Symphony orchestra to Europe's most discriminating audiences. Sympathetic to new music, but not over-enthusiastic. Loves to play "Kol Nidre" on contrabass, of which he is greatest living virtuoso.

So innately in exquisite taste about everything, he acts unaware women are just plain dizzy about him. Mrs. Koussevitzky guards her husband's time outside music against intrusion and workaday cares. They enjoy unexcelled, quiet social life in the town's inner society clique.

Apr 26

On the night of May 6 the Wednesday following the conclusion of the regular Symphony season, the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will begin. This will be the 46th season of the Pops and the second under Arthur Fiedler, whose initial season last Summer was one of the most popular the Pops have ever had.

Arthur Fiedler, a native of Boston and son of Fiedler, the former violinist of this orchestra, has in recent years made a distinct name for himself by his rising talents as conductor. He is known as the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, the Museum concerts, the Esplanade concerts (which he inaugurated) and his own Sinfonietta.

Refreshments will be served at the tables as a sociable accompaniment to the music each evening. The Pops will be given every night, with alternate Sunday performances and special programs of interest.

The new book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931," by M. A. de Wolfe Howe, will be issued this week, the last of the Symphony season, and will be available Wednesday.

The book combines a revision of the narrative published in 1914, with new chapters carrying the fortunes of the orchestra through the 17 ensuing years. The complete lists of the works played, the soloists and the personnel through the 50th season are recorded. The book is published by Houghton Mifflin Company.

Here in Boston

In repetition at the Symphony Concert on Saturday, Griffes's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" and Mr. Lambert's "Rio Grande" were again warmly received. After the latter piece, Dr. Koussevitzky called to the front of the stage Mr. Sanromá, the pianist, and Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the chorus from The Cecilia, and applause rose high. "The Rio Grande" was played more lightly than on Friday and gained accordingly. Nor does the relative weakness of Griffes's climaxes lessen the beauty and the poetry of much that lies between.

Copy sent Sands

MUSIC

Colonel Apr 28

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the final Monday evening concert of this season Dr Koussevitsky selected a Bach suite in D major; Brahms' C minor symphony; and Constant Lambert's much talked of "Rio Grande" for chorus, solo piano, and orchestra, first performed here at the Symphony concerts of last week. Nicolai Tcherepnin's "Ballet Borodin," originally announced for first performance here last evening, was omitted.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, and a chorus from the Cecilia Society again assisted in the Lambert work. "Rio Grande," while interesting and pleasing, with a closely knit musical texture, is by no means overwhelming in any detail. Lambert apparently has listened well to American jazz; what he had heard he has assimilated, until he has achieved a tolerably direct means of expression. In this respect, perhaps the greatest virtue of the work lies in the fact that it is not at all self-conscious or grotesque. Certainly that is something not truthfully to be said of most other "foreign" attempts at working with one of our foremost American products.

Lambert's harmonic scheme is not without a certain monotony, save for a few isolated spots; his instrumentation is rather conventional to American ears, in spite of the fact that it takes five men to perform on the percussion instruments called for in his score.

There is no great originality in his melodic material, though none of it is timeworn or stale. In short, "Rio Grande" seems to be the sincere yet only partially effective work of a young composer of ability who has not yet completely matured.

With the greatest respect for perhaps the greatest orchestra in the world, last evening's performance was not exactly one of virtuosity. Only Mr Sanroma displayed sufficient ability to invest the music was a gen jazz rhythm. But this type of rhy generally seems a stumbling bloc musicians other than those who play in American jazz orchestras.

The Bach suite was the one with the exquisite slow movement which some no doubt well-intentioned but sadly blundering soul or souls transformed into the solo "Air for the G string," and thereby robbed it of the effect obtainable only from massed strings. In such cases one can but echo the plaint of a prominent New York musical critic: "Why don't they let Bach alone?"

The program closed with one of Dr Koussevitzky's amazingly eloquent and dramatic performances of the Brahms' symphony. Brahms was a Titan beyond all doubt, but in such spots as the close of the sonorous peroration of the brass in the final movement when he reverts to a positive anticlimax in the violins, the great Johannes is downright irritating. A performance such as Dr Koussevitzky's, however, does much to redeem these places.

APRIL 26, 1931

Getting Another Pop Arthur Fiedler at

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A sign both of the approach of summer and of the ending of the music season proper is the announcement of the opening of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall on the evening of Wednesday, May 6. Arthur Fiedler, who achieved such success with the public last season, will again be the conductor of the orchestra of 80 players from the Boston Symphony and there will be the usual refreshments served at the tables and in the refreshment room that help to set the Pops apart from any other series of orchestral concerts in this country.

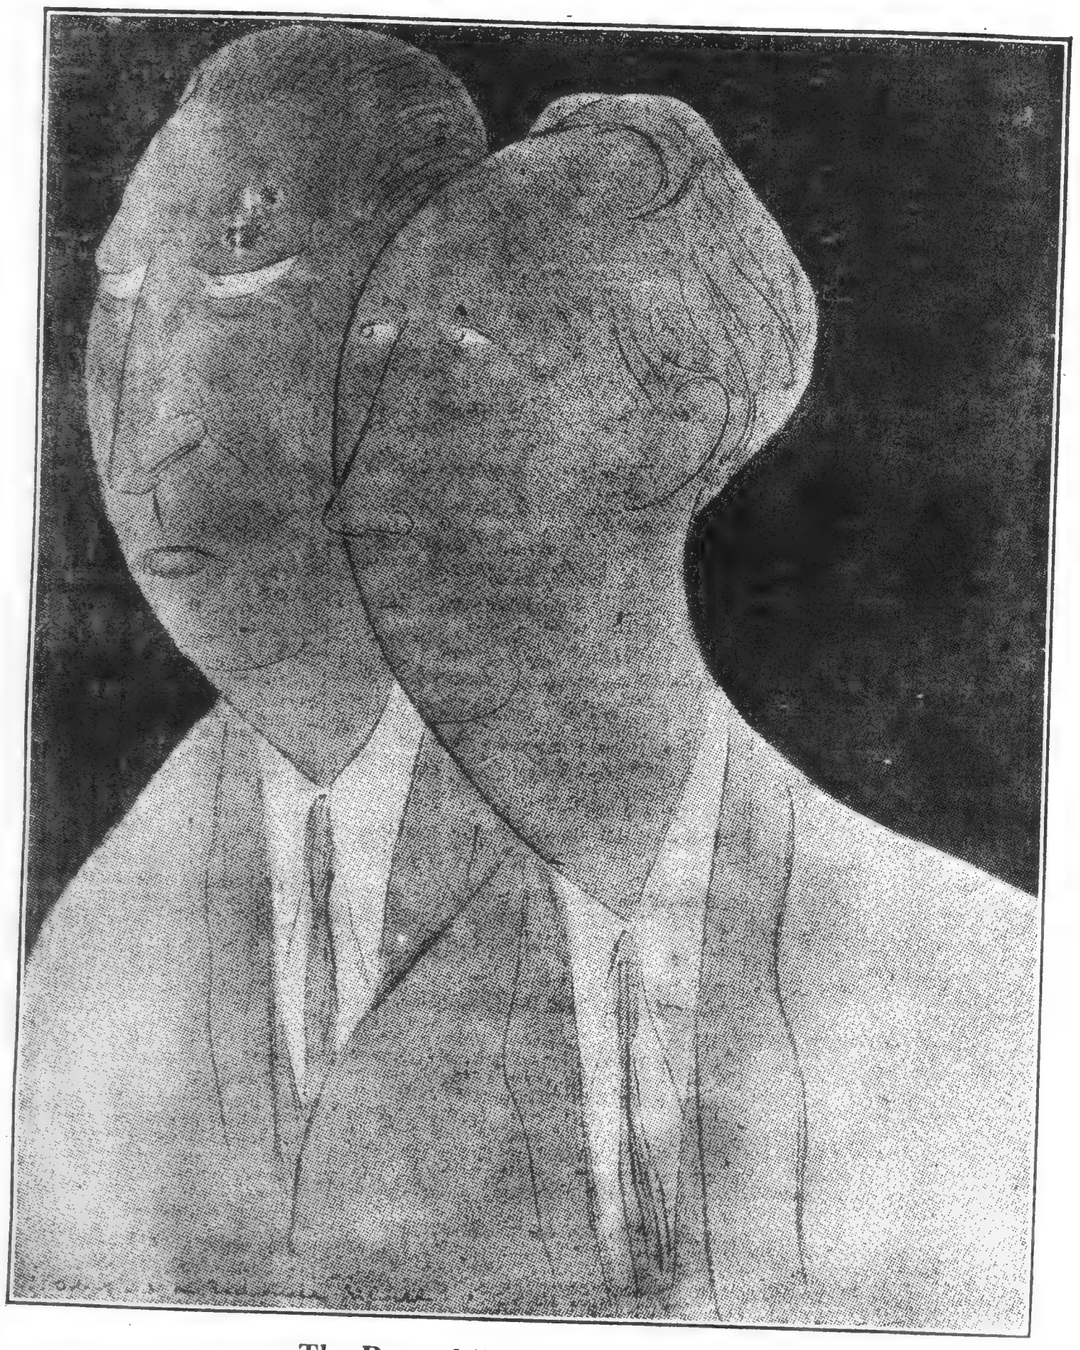
• • • •

Less "heavy," to use the colloquial phrase, than those of his predecessor, Alfredo Casella, Mr. Fiedler's programmes of last season suited all and sundry. His list for the opening night is typically wide-ranging. The lighter classics are represented by the "Rakoczy" March of Berlioz, Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes" and the "Valkyries' Ride" of Wagner. The customary operatic selection will be that from "Carmen" and musical comedy has its innings in a selection from Gershwin's "Girl Crazy." Bolzoni's Minuet for string orchestra, an arrangement for violin strings and harp of the familiar Londonderry Air, a waltz-medley by Korngold, "Tales from Johann Strauss" and a Czardas from the opera "Ghost of the Warrior" by Grossman, make the rest.

SEE PAGE 194 FOR APR 28-29 30 ALSO Page 199 for APR Comments

layers === Music and Musicians

"Our Appearance"



The Poet of "The Rio Grande"

To Right is Sacheverell Sitwell, Maker of the Verses that Constant Lambert Clothed with Music, Heard at the Symphony Concerts Last Friday and Saturday, to be Repeated This Evening. To Left is His Brother Osbert, Likewise Man of Letters and Frequenter of Aesthetic Circles in London. Max Beerbohm Drew the Caricature

Gossip of the Town

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, our Boston flashlight biography today:

Ranks with Toscanini, Stokowski, world's greatest symphony conductors. His musicians declare him severe, drill-master disciplinarian, but only when his baton is up. Gentle as a child in minutes of relaxation. Closes his eyes to horseplay among the men at rehearsal. Dark, handsome genius type.

Volcano of dramatic temperament when music rouses him. Free of eccentric explosions or sensational conduct that mark other great maestri.

Once owner of large Russian estates of which the revolution dispossessed him, he is the grand seignior in manner down to his very finger tips. Meticulously formal and fashionably tailored. Special Russian dishes prepared for him by a Russian valet-and-cook, whose devotion to his master is a kind of idol worship.

Harbors burning ambition to display Boston Symphony orchestra to Europe's most discriminating audiences. Sympathetic to new music, but not over-enthusiastic. Loves to play "Kol Nidre" on contrabass, of which he is greatest living virtuose.

Unbelievably in exquisite taste about everything, he acts unaware women just plain dizzy about him. Mrs. Koussevitzky guards her husband's time outside music against intrusion and workaday cares. They enjoy unexcelled, private social life in the town's inner society clique.

On the night of May 6, the Wednesday following the conclusion of the regular Symphony season, the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will begin. This will be the 46th season of the Pops and the second under Arthur Fiedler, a native of Boston and son of Fiedler, the former violinist of this orchestra, has in recent years made a distinct name for himself by his rising talents as conductor. He is known as the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, the Museum concerts, the Esplanade concerts (which he inaugurated) and his own Sinfonietta.

Refreshments will be served at the tables as a sociable accompaniment to the music each evening. The Pops will be given every night, with alternate Sunday performances and special programs of interest.

The new book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931," by M. A. de Wolfe Howe, will be issued this week, the last of the Symphony season, and will be available Wednesday.

The book combines a revision of the narrative published in 1914, with new chapters carrying the fortunes of the orchestra through the 17 ensuing years. The complete lists of the works played, the soloists and the personnel through the 50th season are recorded. The book is published by Houghton Mifflin Company.

Here in Boston

In repetition at the Symphony Concert on Saturday, Griffes's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" and Mr. Lambert's "Rio Grande" were again warmly received. After the latter piece, Dr. Koussevitzky called to the front of the stage Mr. Sanroma, the pianist, and Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the chorus from The Cecilia, and applause rose high. "The Rio Grande" was played more lightly than on Friday and gained accordingly. Nor does the relative weakness of Griffes's climaxes lessen the beauty and the poetry of much that lies between.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sixth and last concert of the Monday concert series of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last evening. Dr. Koussevitzky had finally settled upon the following program, one which evidently pleased his audience well: J. S. Bach, Suite for Orchestra, No. 3, in D major (in place of the originally promised "Ballett Borodine," for orchestra and chorus, by N. Tcherepnin); Lambert, "The Rio Grande," for chorus, orchestra, and solo pianoforte (poem by Sacheverell Sitwell); Brahms, Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68. The chorus of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assisted in the performance of Constant Lambert's work, whose pianoforte part was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma.

The Bach suite, one of those performed at the recent Bach festival, is among the most delightful of the composer's orchestral works. Not only for the beautiful and justly familiar air—often played by violinists as a solo transcribed or the G string—is the suite memorial; it has spontaneity, a melodic charm of the highest order, a complete freedom from the mechanical repetition of conventional formulas in which Bach was accustomed to take refuge when ideas were lacking. The prelude with which it opened, the gigue with which it closed, were full of living and varied beauty.

Constant Lambert's setting for chorus and orchestra of a poem by Sacheverell Sitwell—member of a well-known family of English modernist poets—was first introduced to symphony audiences during the past week-end. Last night it again created a vivid impression by the boldness and brilliance of its orchestration, the skill with which it illustrated the changing moods of the poem and pictured the scenes there described. The almost hysterical irregularity and violence of its rhythms and the percussive brilliance of the long and difficult interludes for piano solo — superlatively played by Mr. Sanroma—seemed to owe as much to jazz as to the dances of Brazil and the tones of the marimba, yet there were suggestions of blazing sunlight and color and movement, hints of more typically Latin-American dance-rhythm and melodic idiom, the langorous closing measures of the contralto—traits that belonged authentically to the setting and gave the music its claim to be regarded as not solely a riotous tour-de-force of technique.

An excellent performance of Brahms's C minor symphony closed the concert (and the series). Dr. Koussevitzky's readings of Brahms seem constantly to gain in measure and balance, while they lose nothing in dramatic and emotional force. There are now fewer exaggerated extremes of tempo. The introduction to the first movement had last night no excessive breadth, neither was the exquisite andante transformed into a slow adagio. Yet there was no lack of majesty and exaltation in the one, nor of repose and calm loveliness in the other. The flowing grace of the allegretto, the overwhelming jubilation of the final pages of the last movement were alike to be remembered.

Enthusiastic applause was accorded to the players and singers of the evening, and to Dr. Koussevitzky.

S. S.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the final Monday evening concert of this season Dr Koussevitsky selected a Bach suite in D major; Brahms' C minor symphony; and Constant Lambert's much talked of "Rio Grande" for chorus, solo piano, and orchestra, first performed here at the Symphony concerts of last week. Nicolai Tcherepnin's "Ballet Borodin," originally announced for first performance here last evening, was omitted.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, and a chorus from the Cecilia Society again assisted in the Lambert work. "Rio Grande," while interesting and pleasing, with a closely knit musical texture, is by no means overwhelming in any detail. Lambert apparently has listened well to American jazz; what he had heard he has assimilated, until he has achieved a tolerably direct means of expression. In this respect, perhaps the greatest virtue of the work lies in the fact that it is not at all self-conscious or grotesque. Certainly that is something not truthfully to be said of most other "foreign" attempts at working with one of our foremost American products.

Lambert's harmonic scheme is not without a certain monotony, save for a few isolated spots; his instrumentation is rather conventional to American ears, in spite of the fact that it takes five men to perform on the percussion instruments called for in his score.

There is no great originality in his melodic material, though none of it is timeworn or stale. In short, "Rio Grande" seems to be the sincere yet only partially effective work of a young composer of ability who has not yet completely matured.

With the greatest respect for perhaps the greatest orchestra in the world, last evening's performance was not exactly one of virtuosity. Only Mr Sanroma displayed sufficient ability to invest the music was a genuine jazz rhythm. But this type of rhythm generally seems a stumbling block to musicians other than those who play in American jazz orchestras.

The Bach suite was the one with the exquisite slow movement which some no doubt well-intentioned but sadly blundering soul or souls transformed into the solo "Air for the G string," and thereby robbed it of the effect obtainable only from massed strings. In such cases one can but echo the plaint of a prominent New York musical critic: "Why don't they let Bach alone?"

The program closed with one of Dr Koussevitzky's amazingly eloquent and dramatic performances of the Brahms' symphony. Brahms was a Titan beyond all doubt, but in such spots as the close of the sonorous peroration of the brass in the final movement when he reverts to a positive anticlimax in the violins, the great Johannes is downright irritating. A performance such as Dr Koussevitzky's, however, does much to redeem these places.

SYMPHONY ENDS MONDAY SERIES

"The Rio Grande" Given With Cecilia Chorus

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current series of Monday Symphony Concerts came to a close last evening. The programme, slightly altered from that first announced, embraced three movements from Bach's Suite in D major, substituted for Tcherepnin's "Borodin"; Lambert's "The Rio Grande," introduced to Boston at the concerts of last Friday and Saturday; and the First Symphony of Brahms.

A little suspicious, perhaps, of novelties and of "modern music" in general, the audience of last evening received young Mr. Lambert's exuberant piece a shade less cordially than did that of Friday afternoon. Had it been hearing "The Rio Grande" for the second time this relative tepidity would have been understandable. For this is hardly music to live with. Not a little of the initial interest in the work comes from wondering what the composer is going to do next; and when such curiosity is satisfied and the critical faculty allowed to function undisturbed, the piece seems more than ever a sort of glorification of the obvious. Yet it is rarely entertaining, and the composer's gusto, his tremendous dynamic energy are stimulating and refreshing.

Again the performance redounded to the credit of the orchestra, the chorus of the Cecilia Society, Miss Marie Murray, who sang the engaging alto solo; Mr. Sanroma, who played in true virtuoso fashion the exceedingly difficult piano part, and Dr. Koussevitzky, who conducted with sympathy and an infectious vitality. For the rest, the concert was familiar matter played with familiar eloquence and to a responsive audience.

Pops Begin on May 6

ON the night of May 6, the Wednesday following the conclusion of the regular Symphony season, the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will begin.

This will be the 46th season of the Pops and the second under Arthur Fiedler whose initial season last summer was one of the most popular the Pops have ever had.

Arthur Fiedler, a native of Boston and son of Emanuel Fiedler, former violinist of this orchestra, has in recent years made a distinct name for himself by his rising talents as conductor.

The program for the opening night includes:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"....Berlioz
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Minuet (for string orchestra).....Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Tales from Johann Strauss....Korngold
Londonderry Air
arranged by Hamilton Harty
(For violin solo, string orchestra and harp)
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 2
Liszt
"Girl Crazy," selection.....Gershwin
Czardas from the opera, "Ghost of the Warrior".....Grossman

TUE 26, 1931

Getting Another Pop ! Arthur Fiedler at

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A sign both of the approach of summer and of the ending of the music season proper is the announcement of the opening of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall on the evening of Wednesday, May 6. Arthur Fiedler, who achieved such success with the public last season, will again be the conductor of the orchestra of 80 players from the Boston Symphony and there will be the usual refreshments served at the tables and in the refreshment room that help to set the Pops apart from any other series of orchestral concerts in this country.

* * * *

Less "heavy," to use the colloquial phrase, than those of his predecessor, Alfredo Casella, Mr. Fiedler's programmes of last season suited all and sundry. His list for the opening night is typically wide-ranging. The lighter classics are represented by the "Rakoczy" March of Berlioz, Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes" and the "Valkyries' Ride" of Wagner. The customary operatic selection will be that from "Carmen" and musical comedy has its innings in a selection from Gershwin's "Girl Crazy." Bolzoni's Minuet for string orchestra, an arrangement for violin strings and harp of the familiar Londonderry Air, a waltz-medley by Korngold, "Tales from Johann Strauss" and a Czardas from the opera "Ghost of the Warrior" by Grossman, make the rest.

SEE PAGE 194 FOR APR 28-29 30 ALSO Page 199 for APR Comments

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
APR 1 1931

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

ON THE CALENDAR

April 6—The Compinsky Trio, Middlesex Women's Club, 3 p. m.

April 12—Benefit concert, Notre Dame de Lourdes parish hall, 8.15 p. m.

April 21—Holy Cross Musical Clubs, Memorial Auditorium, 8 p. m.

April 26—Philharmonic Orchestral Society, Liberty hall, 3 p. m.

There was the fortunate opportunity to hear two of the programs in the Bach festival which proved to be the peak of the celebration of the 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. One was that of Thursday evening last which included the Brandenburg Concerto, No. 2 in F major; Concerto for Pianoforte and orchestra, with Alexander Borovsky at the piano and the "Magnificat," for which singers from Harvard and Radcliffe furnished the chorus. The other program was that in which the festival culminated on Sunday afternoon and evening in a repetition of the great B minor mass.

It was obvious that in a festival of such a scope, covering virtually an entire week, the inclusion in some of the programs of choral works by the great composer would be advisable. For, however his instrumental works are rated in comparison with the compositions of a later day, the effects he scored in his massive choral works are still distinctive, and as they were presented in the two programs mentioned, both thrilling and inspiring. It may be difficult to enthuse the average listener with an organ toccata or fugue, or even with such a composition as the Brandenburg Concerto. But it would have been a man with no music in his soul whatever who could not feel the surge of the choral waves as the music flowed sonorously, massively and majestical from the voices of the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs at Dr. Koussevitzky's bidding in the Magnificat on Thursday evening and still more impressively in the great B minor mass on Sunday.

Enthusiasm Released.

At the conclusion of the mass on Sunday evening enthusiasm which had been fittingly pent up during the performance of a religious work, was released. On no occasion within memory has there been such an ovation as was given to the conductor, soloists, orchestra and choirs or such a tribute to the genius of Bach.

I was told by one of the chorus that the Harvard singers are somewhat tired of hearing references to the beauty of fresh young voices, or young fresh voices, whichever way you choose to put it. Nevertheless it was that quality in the singing that characterized it above all others. That, and the enthusiasm and resilience of youth. For to the singing of intricate music these young people, almost without exception, threw themselves with a fevor that vitalized the choral mass. What a pity it is that singers of their age are lacking in so many of our singing societies and choral organizations in which experience and musical knowledge does not always compensate for other qualities that come with maturity, to say nothing of old age.

In preparing young men and women to share in the performance of such great musical masterpieces as those of Bach Dr. Archibald T. Davorth defi- fit- re-sounding on both Thursday and Sunday evenings they should have been called to the fore to share them.

Whether in the Magnificat or in the B minor mass Bach's treatment of the text is replete with constant repetitions of words or phrases. To the development of a single brief sentence he devotes pages of music. In the Magnificat, for example, he rings the changes designedly on the words "omnes generationes." But while on occasion when solo voices are proclaiming them these reiterations tend to become tedious that impression is not given when they are intrusted to the chorus. And granting Bach's conception of the themes which he was clothing in music, there was reason for them.

The Soloists.

The soloists on both occasions were Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor and Frazer Gange, baritone. Of these Mme. Matzenauer was easily the outstanding artist, singing from memory all the numbers assigned to her throughout the festival, the only one of the four artists who ventured to do so. That does not imply that the others were tied slavishly to the music. All, in fact, sang with considerable freedom. In several of the solos both the men proved to be able artists. It was in the Mass that they had their most grateful opportunities. That for Mr. Crooks came in the beautiful aria in the Sanctus, for which Mr. Burgin supplied the violin obligato. Here Mr. Crooks displayed the best qualities of a really fine voice. Mr. Gange was notably successful in the aria in the Gloria, with incidental solo originally written for oboe but taken in this case with notable skill by the French horn, and in the aria "Et in spiritum sanctum" with the accompaniment of two oboes d'amore. Nor was the singing of Amy Evans on the evenings mentioned without its good points. To invite comparison with the more distinguished singer on the distaff side of the platform was no easy place for her.

Into the accompaniment of some of the solos in the Magnificat the harpsichord, skilfully played by Mr. Sanroma, was used, giving a remarkably ethereal effect in the air for alto, "Esurientes implevit bonis" to which a solo flute contributed and which the singing of Mme. Matzenauer made impressive. One of the finest of her vocal efforts, by the way, was the "Agnus Dei" in the Mass, sung with devotional feeling throughout.

To those who knew Bach chiefly through his organ composition some of the more familiar chorales or famous airs for G String the festival revealed him as a composer of infinite variety and resources.

Interesting as were many of the items on the programs during the week, it was the general agreement that in the combination of a great orchestra of virtuosi with a carefully schooled and alertly responsive chorus came the most thrilling moments of the festival. Dr. Koussevitzky richly merited the wreath which the choirs bestowed upon him and the plaudits that came from the floor. His was the genius that moulded the musical means available and brought the music of a great master to vivid and stimulating performance.

A Choir at All Souls.

The Easter Sunday service at All

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
TIMES

Melba and the Boston Orchestra.

From Melodies and Memories, by the Late Nellie Melba.

The first time Melba sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra she did not fully realize the prestige which the orchestra had "in the eyes of all good Americans," although she knew after five minutes that she "had never sung to such a marvelous accompaniment."

"One day we were rehearsing the 'Allegro ed il Penseroso' of Handel with flute obligato," she relates in her memoirs. "In an important part one of the instruments played a C natural instead of a C sharp.

"'C sharp—C sharp,' I shouted, turning round and pointing at the man who had made the mistake.

"There was a dead silence. Then they all burst out laughing. And I realized that I had created a record as far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra was concerned. Nobody had dared to criticize them like that since the time of their formation."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM
APR 3 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will end the New York series of concerts of its fiftieth season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday the program will consist of Brahms' first symphony and Bach's "Brandenberg" concerto in F major and piano concerto in D minor, with Alexander Borovsky, the Russian pianist, as soloist.

The program on Saturday will be made up of Bach's suite for orchestra in D major, the D minor concerto for two violins and string orchestra, and Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
APR 1931

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

ON THE CALENDAR

April 6—The Compinsky Trio, Middlesex Women's Club, 3 p. m.

April 12—Benefit concert, Notre Dame de Lourdes parish hall, 8.15 p. m.

April 21—Holy Cross Musical Clubs, Memorial Auditorium, 8 p. m.

April 26—Philharmonic Orchestral Society, Liberty hall, 3 p. m.

There was the fortunate opportunity to hear two of the programs in the Bach festival which proved to be the peak of the celebration of the 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. One was that of Thursday evening last which included the Brandenburg Concerto, No. 2 in F major; Concerto for Pianoforte and orchestra, with Alexander Borovsky at the piano and the "Magnificat," for which singers from Harvard and Radcliffe furnished the chorus. The other program was that in which the festival culminated on Sunday afternoon and evening in a repetition of the great B minor mass.

It was obvious that in a festival of such a scope, covering virtually an entire week, the inclusion in some of the programs of choral works by the great composer would be advisable. For, however his instrumental works are rated in comparison with the compositions of a later day, the effects he scored in his massive choral works are still distinctive, and as they were presented in the two programs mentioned, both thrilling and inspiring. It may be difficult to enthuse the average listener with an organ toccata or fugue, or even with such a composition as the Brandenburg Concerto. But it would have been a man with no music in his soul whatever who could not feel the surge of the choral waves as the music flowed sonorously, massively and majestical from the voices of the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs at Dr. Koussevitzky's bidding in the Magnificat on Thursday evening and still more impressively in the great B minor mass on Sunday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

BOOKS BOSTON SYMPHONY FOR FINAL CONCERT

Springfield Orchestra Arranges Five Concerts for 10th Season Starting Nov. 17.

The directors of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra met at the Hotel Kimball yesterday afternoon and completed plans for celebrating in fitting fashion the 10th season of the orchestra. It was decided to give five concerts again next season, four by the Springfield orchestra and bringing the season to a brilliant climax with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is 15 years since the Boston orchestra has given a regular evening concert in Springfield and the return of this famous organization to the Auditorium will mark an interesting event in the musical life of the city. The management of the local orchestra has been trying for some time to bring the Boston orchestra again to Springfield under its auspices but until now it has not been possible because of the crowded schedule of the orchestra. The proposition was put up to the directors of the local orchestra yesterday and they eagerly accepted it and authorized the secretary to sign a contract for the appearance of the Boston organization.

The concert dates for next season will be Nov. 17; Jan. 5; Feb. 9; March 8 and April 6. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just closed its 50th season with the most successful year in its history for its great Bach festival last week in honor of the event was one of the notable events in the musical history of Boston. Under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky the orchestra has reached the highest plane in its long and honored career and it will be a matter of congratulation to every music lover in Springfield that the local orchestra has been able to bring these famous players back once more to Springfield.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
APR 3 1931

al Notes

O BE CONGRATULATED BOSTON BACH FESTIVAL

One of the outstanding features of Boston's Bach festival last week in celebration of the fiftieth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra and in honor of its founder Henry L. Higginson, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky director, was the B Minor Mass which had not been heard in its entirety in Boston for nearly 30 years and its performance was one of the high points of the festival. Says the Transcript:

In the performance of this sort of music there is much to be said for using such fresh and eager young voices as those of the Harvard and Radcliffe undergraduates. Nor is it necessary, to say in this instance that they made up in enthusiasm what they lacked in training. For they had been rehearsed for more than a year in this difficult music by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, and under the vital baton of Dr. Koussevitsky they were revealed as an interpretive medium of extraordinary expressiveness. The balance of the choirs was sensitively maintained; the altos were equal partners with the others. Tonal quality was good, and phrasing and dynamics were subtle and musical. There was no dependence upon mere volume of sound. The "Crucifixus" was no less impressive than the opening "Kyrie," and the "Dona nobis pacem" was delivered with significant emotional values.

The chorus of course was the principal actor in the Mass, yet certain items in the solo work made a deep impression. Mme. Matzenauer in particular distinguished herself in the "Qui sedes" and the "Agnus Dei." Mme. Evans, if with less authority, sang with intelligence, and Mr. Crooks and Mr. Gange were satisfying. At the end of the opening performance the audience lingered for prolonged applause.

Other choral music included the Magnificat, the Easter Cantata, No. 4, and the Cantatas numbered 20, 80 and 85. The Brandenburg Concertos No. 2 (violin, flute, oboe and trumpet) and No. 5 (piano, violin and flute), the Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, the Concerto for two violins and the Suite No. 3 were the orchestral items.

Organ solos, harpsichord pieces and selections from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord" were listed. Prof. Bliss Perry of Harvard College gave an address on Major Higginson.

The orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor, and by the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists were Amy Evans and Adelle Alberts, sopranos; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ, and the following members of the orchestra: Richard Burgin, concert-master; Julius Theodorowicz, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Georges Mager, trumpet; Albert Snow, organ, and Louis Speper and Jean Devergie, oboe d'amore.

Dr. Koussevitzky has again earned laurels by an ambitious undertaking and by the mastery with which he has carried it through. He sees Bach, as he sees other composers, through his own dramatic temperament, and his tempi sometimes cause shaking of heads. But the notion that Bach is quite emotionless has by now been discouraged, and Dr. Koussevitzky does not forget that his music always is a pattern of sound; indeed, as it flows from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of particularly beautiful sound.

Speculation is already heard as to what composer will be honored by Dr. Koussevitzky next season; for it is assumed that the annual festival plan will be continued. Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert, Bach—not many composers remain whose musical output would pass this test. Mozart, Strauss, Stravinsky? Perhaps Stravinsky is most likely to be favored, not merely because he is a Russian, but because his numerous styles offer sufficient variety for festival purposes, and because it would not be necessary to repair to the opera house in order to give him a fair representation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL
APR 3 1931

amount it secured in other years.

High Finnish Order Is Given Koussevitsky

BOSTON, April 3—Finland's highest honor, the cross of commander of the Order of the White Cross, has been awarded to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

W. Astroem, minister of the republic of Finland to the United States, announced the award yesterday in a communication to Dr. Koussevitzky. His letter read in part as follows:

"I have the pleasure to inform you that the president of the republic of Finland has awarded you the cross of the commander of the Order of the White Cross as a token of appreciation for the interest you have shown in Finnish music, especially the compositions of Sibelius, during a great number of years under your eminent conductorship in the most important cultural centres of the United

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

HIGH FINNISH HONOR FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Order of White Cross Acknowledges His Interest In Music of Nation

Finland's highest honor, the cross of commander of the Order of the White Cross, has been awarded to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. W. Astroem, minister of the Republic of Finland to the United States, announced the award yesterday in a communication to Dr. Koussevitzky. His letter read in part as follows:

"I have the pleasure to inform you that the President of the Republic of Finland has awarded you the cross of the commander of the Order of the White Cross as a token of appreciation for the interest you have shown in Finnish music, especially the compositions of Sibelius, which have been regularly performed during a great number of years under your eminent conductorship in the most important cultural centres of the United States."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
APR 3 1931

High Finnish Order Is Given Koussevitsky

BOSTON, April 3—Finland's highest honor, the cross of commander of the Order of the White Cross, has been awarded to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

W. Astroem, minister of the republic of Finland to the United States, announced the award yesterday in a communication to Dr. Koussevitzky. His letter read in part as follows:

"I have the pleasure to inform you that the president of the republic of Finland has awarded you the cross of the commander of the Order of the White Cross as a token of appreciation for the interest you have shown in Finnish music, especially the compositions of Sibelius, during a great number of years under your eminent conductorship in the most important cultural centres of the United States."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED.

Finnish Government Makes Him a Commander of the White Cross.

The Cross of Commander of the Order of the White Cross, the highest honor of the Finnish Government, has been awarded by the President of Finland to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The conductor was notified by Leonard Astroem, Finnish Minister to this country, that the award was made because of Mr. Koussevitzky's interest in Finnish music, especially that of Jean Sibelius.

Mr. Koussevitzky has performed six of Sibelius's symphonies in this country. He has conducted the First, Third, Sixth and Seventh symphonies in New York, and has directed other orchestral works by the Finnish master here, in Boston and elsewhere.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
APR 1 1931

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

ON THE CALENDAR

April 6—The Compinsky Trio, Middlesex Women's Club, 3 p. m.

April 12—Benefit concert, Notre Dame de Lourdes parish hall, 8.15 p. m.

April 21—Holy Cross Musical Clubs, Memorial Auditorium, 8 p. m.

April 26—Philharmonic Orchestral Society, Liberty hall, 3 p. m.

There was the fortunate opportunity to hear two of the programs in the Bach festival which proved to be the peak of the celebration of the 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. One was that of Thursday evening last which included the Brandenburg Concerto, No. 2 in F major; Concerto for Pianoforte and orchestra, with Alexander Borovsky at the piano and the "Magnificat," for which singers from Harvard and Radcliffe furnished the chorus. The other program was that in which the festival culminated on Sunday afternoon and evening in a repetition of the great B minor mass.

It was obvious that in a festival of such a scope, covering virtually an entire week, the inclusion in some of the programs of choral works by the great composer would be advisable. For, however his instrumental works are rated in comparison with the compositions of a later day, the effects he scored in his massive choral works are still distinctive, and as they were presented in the two programs mentioned, both thrilling and inspiring. It may be difficult to enthuse the average listener with an organ toccata or fugue, or even with such a composition as the Brandenburg Concerto. But it would have been a man with no music in his soul whatever who could not feel the surge of the choral waves as the music flowed sonorously, massively and majestical from the voices of the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs at Dr. Koussevitzky's bidding in the Magnificat on Thursday evening and still more impressively in the great B minor mass on Sunday.

Enthusiasm Released.

At the conclusion of the mass on Sunday evening enthusiasm which had been fittingly pent up during the performance of a religious work, was released. On no occasion within memory has there been such an ovation as was given to the conductor, soloists, orchestra and choirs or such a tribute to the genius of Bach.

I was told by one of the chorus that the Harvard singers are somewhat tired of hearing references to the beauty of fresh young voices, or young fresh voices, whichever way you choose to put it. Nevertheless it was that quality in the singing that characterized it above all others. That, and the enthusiasm and resilience of youth. For to the singing of intricate music these young people, almost without exception, threw themselves with a fevor that vitalized the choral mass. What a pity it is that singers of their age are lacking in so many of our singing societies and choral organizations in which experience and musical knowledge does not always compensate for other qualities that come with maturity, to say nothing of old age.

In preparing young men and women to share in the performance of such great musical masterpieces as those of Bach Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth have accomplished something definitely worth while. And it was fitting that when plaudits were resounding on both Thursday and Sunday evenings they should have been called to the fore to share them.

Whether in the Magnificat or in the B minor mass Bach's treatment of the text is replete with constant repetitions of words or phrases. To the development of a single brief sentence he devotes pages of music. In the Magnificat, for example, he rings the changes designedly on the words "omnes generationes." But while on occasion when solo voices are proclaiming them these reiterations tend to become tedious that impression is not given when they are intrusted to the chorus. And granting Bach's conception of the themes which he was clothing in music, there was reason for them.

The Soloists.

The soloists on both occasions were Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor and Frazer Gange, baritone. Of these Mme. Matzenauer was easily the outstanding artist, singing from memory all the numbers assigned to her throughout the festival, the only one of the four artists who ventured to do so. That does not imply that the others were tied slavishly to the music. All, in fact, sang with considerable freedom. In several of the solos both the men proved to be able artists. It was in the Mass that they had their most grateful opportunities. That for Mr. Crooks came in the beautiful aria in the Sanctus, for which Mr. Burgin supplied the violin obligato. Here Mr. Crooks displayed the best qualities of a really fine voice. Mr. Gange was notably successful in the aria in the Gloria, with incidental solo originally written for oboe but taken in this case with notable skill by the French horn, and in the aria "Et in spiritum sanctum" with the accompaniment of two oboes d'amore. Nor was the singing of Amy Evans on the evenings mentioned without its good points. To invite comparison with the more distinguished singer on the distaff side of the platform was no easy place for her.

Into the accompaniment of some of the solos in the Magnificat the harpsichord, skilfully played by Mr. Sanroma, was used, giving a remarkably ethereal effect in the air for alto, "Esurientes implevit bonis" to which a solo flute contributed and which the singing of Mme. Matzenauer made impressive. One of the finest of her vocal efforts, by the way, was the "Agnus Dei" in the Mass, sung with devotional feeling throughout.

To those who knew Bach chiefly through his organ composition some of the more familiar chorales or famous airs for G String the festival revealed him as a composer of infinite variety and resources.

Interesting as were many of the items on the programs during the week, it was the general agreement that in the combination of a great orchestra of virtuosi with a carefully schooled and alertly responsive chorus came the most thrilling moments of the festival. Dr. Koussevitzky richly merited the wreath which the choirs bestowed upon him and the plaudits that came from the floor. His was the genius that moulded the musical means available and brought the music of a great master to vivid and stimulating performance.

A Choir at All Souls.

The Easter Sunday service at All

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
APR 1931

to Levins

BRAVES TIE CAN

ON THE CALENDAR

April 6—The Compinsky Trio, Middlesex Women's Club, 3 p. m.

April 12—Benefit concert, Notre Dame de Lourdes parish hall, 8.15 p. m.

April 21—Holy Cross Musical Clubs, Memorial Auditorium, 8 p. m.

April 26—Philharmonic Orchestral Society, Liberty hall, 3 p. m.

There was the fortunate opportunity to hear two of the programs in the Bach festival which proved to be the peak of the celebration of the 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. One was that of Thursday evening last which included the Brandenburg Concerto, No. 2 in F major; Concerto for Pianoforte and orchestra, with Alexander Borovsky at the piano and the "Magnificat," for which singers from Harvard and Radcliffe furnished the chorus. The other program was that in which the festival culminated on Sunday afternoon and evening in a repetition of the great B minor mass.

It was obvious that in a festival of such a scope, covering virtually an entire week, the inclusion in some of the programs of choral works by the great composer would be advisable. For, however his instrumental works are rated in comparison with the compositions of a later day, the effects he scored in his massive choral works are still distinctive, and as they were presented in the two programs mentioned, both thrilling and inspiring. It may be difficult to enthuse the average listener with an organ toccata or fugue, or even with such a composition as the Brandenburg Concerto. But it would have been a man with no music in his soul whatever who could not feel the surge of the choral waves as the music flowed sonorously, massively and majestical from the voices of the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs at Dr. Koussevitzky's bidding in the Magnificat on Thursday evening and still more impressively in the great B minor mass on Sunday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

BOOKS BOSTON SYMPHONY FOR FINAL CONCERT

Springfield Orchestra Arranges Five Concerts for 10th Season Starting Nov. 17.

The directors of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra met at the Hotel Kimball yesterday afternoon and completed plans for celebrating in fitting fashion the 10th season of the orchestra. It was decided to give five concerts again next season, four by the Springfield orchestra and bringing the season to a brilliant climax with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is 15 years since the Boston orchestra has given a regular evening concert in Springfield and the return of this famous organization to the Auditorium will mark an interesting event in the musical life of the city. The management of the local orchestra has been trying for some time to bring the Boston orchestra again to Springfield under its auspices but until now it has not been possible because of the crowded schedule of the orchestra. The proposition was put up to the directors of the local orchestra yesterday and they eagerly accepted it and authorized the secretary to sign a contract for the appearance of the Boston organization.

The concert dates for next season will be Nov. 17; Jan. 5; Feb. 9; March 8 and April 6. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just closed its 50th season with the most successful year in its history for its great Bach festival last week in honor of the event was one of the notable events in the musical history of Boston. Under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky the orchestra has reached the highest plane in its long and honored career and it will be a matter of congratulation to every music lover in Springfield that the local orchestra has been able to bring these famous players back once more to Springfield.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
APR 3 1931

Musical Notes

DR. KOUSSEVITSKY TO BE CONGRATULATED ON SUCCESS OF BOSTON BACH FESTIVAL

One of the outstanding features of Boston's Bach festival last week in celebration of the fiftieth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra and in honor of its founder Henry L. Higginson, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky director, was the B Minor Mass which had not been heard in its entirety in Boston for nearly 30 years and its performance was one of the high points of the festival. Says the Transcript:

In the performance of this sort of music there is much to be said for using such fresh and eager young voices as those of the Harvard and Radcliffe undergraduates. Nor is it necessary to say in this instance that they made up in enthusiasm what they lacked in training. For they had been rehearsed for more than a year in this difficult music by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, and under the vital baton of Dr. Koussevitsky they were revealed as an interpretive medium of extraordinary expressiveness. The balance of the choirs was sensitively maintained; the altos were equal partners with the others. Tonal quality was good, and phrasing and dynamics were subtle and musical. There was no dependence upon mere volume of sound. The "Crucifixus" was no less impressive than the opening "Kyrie," and the "Dona nobis pacem" was delivered with significant emotional values.

The chorus of course was the principal actor in the Mass, yet certain items in the solo work made a deep impression. Mme. Matzenauer in particular distinguished herself in the "Qui sedes" and the "Agnus Dei." Mme. Evans, if with less authority, sang with intelligence, and Mr. Crooks and Mr. Gange were satisfying. At the end of the opening performance the audience lingered for prolonged applause.

Other choral music included the Magnificat, the Easter Cantata, No. 4, and the Cantatas numbered 20, 80 and 85. The Brandenburg Concertos No. 2 (violin, flute, oboe and trumpet) and No. 5 (piano, violin and flute), the Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, the Concerto for two violins and the Suite No. 3 were the orchestral items. Organ solos, harpsichord pieces and selections from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord" were listed. Prof. Bliss Perry of Harvard College gave an address on Major Higginson.

The orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor, and by the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists were Amy Evans and Adelle Alberts, sopranos; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Paterni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ, and the following members of the orchestra: Richard Burgin, concert-master; Julius Theodorowicz, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Georges Mager, trumpet; Albert Snow, organ, and Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboe d'amore.

Dr. Koussevitzky has again earned laurels by an ambitious undertaking and by the mastery with which he has carried it through. He sees Bach, as he sees other composers, through his own dramatic temperament, and his tempi sometimes cause shaking of heads. But the notion that Bach is quite emotionless has by now been discouraged, and Dr. Koussevitzky does not forget that his music always is a pattern of sound; indeed, as it flows from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of particularly beautiful sound.

Speculation is already heard as to what composer will be honored by Dr. Koussevitzky next season; for it is assumed that the annual festival plan will be continued. Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert, Bach—not many composers remain whose musical output would pass this test. Mozart, Strauss, Stravinsky? Perhaps Stravinsky is most likely to be favored, not merely because he is a Russian, but because his numerous styles offer sufficient variety for festival purposes, and because it would not be necessary to repair to the opera house in order to give him a fair representation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL
APR 3 1931

amount it secured in other years.

High Finnish Order Is Given Koussevitsky

BOSTON, April 3—Finland's highest honor, the cross of commander of the Order of the White Cross, has been awarded to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

W. Astroem, minister of the republic of Finland to the United States, announced the award yesterday in a communication to Dr. Koussevitzky. His letter read in part as follows:

"I have the pleasure to inform you that the president of the republic of Finland has awarded you the cross of the commander of the Order of the White Cross as a token of appreciation for the interest you have shown in Finnish music, especially the compositions of Sibelius, during a great number of years under your eminent conductorship in the most important cultural centres of the United States."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
APR 3 1931

High Finnish Order Is Given Koussevitsky

BOSTON, April 3—Finland's highest honor, the cross of commander of the Order of the White Cross, has been awarded to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

W. Astroem, minister of the republic of Finland to the United States, announced the award yesterday in a communication to Dr. Koussevitzky. His letter read in part as follows:

"I have the pleasure to inform you that the president of the republic of Finland has awarded you the cross of the commander of the Order of the White Cross as a token of appreciation for the interest you have shown in Finnish music, especially the compositions of Sibelius, during a great number of years under your eminent conductorship in the most important cultural centres of the United States."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM
APR 3 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will end the New York series of concerts of its fiftieth season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday the program will consist of Brahms' first symphony and Bach's "Brandenberg" concerto in F major and piano concerto in D minor, with Alexander Borovsky, the Russian pianist, as soloist.

The program on Saturday will be made up of Bach's suite for orchestra in D major, the D minor concerto for two violins and string orchestra, and Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony.

...Americans," although she knew after five minutes that she "had never sung to such a marvelous accompaniment."

"One day we were rehearsing the 'Allegro ed il Penseroso' of Handel with flute obligato," she relates in her memoirs. "In an important part one of the instruments played a C natural instead of a C sharp.

"'C sharp—C sharp,' I shouted, turning round and pointing at the man who had made the mistake.

"There was a dead silence. Then they all burst out laughing. And I realized that I had created a record as far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra was concerned. Nobody had dared to criticize them like that since the time of their formation."

...KOUSSEVITZKY

Order of White Cross Acknowledges His Interest In Music of Nation

Finland's highest honor, the cross of commander of the Order of the White Cross, has been awarded to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. W. Astroem, minister of the Republic of Finland to the United States, announced the award yesterday in a communication to Dr. Koussevitzky. His letter read in part as follows:

"I have the pleasure to inform you that the President of the Republic of Finland has awarded you the cross of the commander of the Order of the White Cross as a token of appreciation for the interest you have shown in Finnish music, especially the compositions of Sibelius, which have been regularly performed during a great number of years under your eminent conductorship in the most important cultural centres of the United States."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED.

Finnish Government Makes Him a Commander of the White Cross.

The Cross of Commander of the Order of the White Cross, the highest honor of the Finnish Government, has been awarded by the President of Finland to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The conductor was notified by Leonard Astroem, Finnish Minister to this country, that the award was made because of Mr. Koussevitzky's interest in Finnish music, especially that of Jean Sibelius.

Mr. Koussevitzky has performed six of Sibelius's symphonies in this country. He has conducted the First, Third, Sixth and Seventh symphonies in New York, and has directed other orchestral works by the Finnish master here, in Boston and elsewhere.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
APR 3 193

BACH IN BOSTON; SOUL MARCHES ON

Bliss Perry Pays Tribute to One Whose Spirit Was Melodious and Who Transmitted to Posterity Gems That Glisten in a Thousand Diadems.

(Boston Herald)

The Boston symphony orchestra, under the stimulating leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky, has undertaken in other years special performances of the works of the greater composers. There was a Beethoven festival and more recently a Brahms festival. During this week the orchestra, assisted by the Harvard glee club, the Radcliffe choral society, and distinguished soloists, has been devoting itself to the major compositions of the most talented of the Bachs, John Sebastian.

Successful and important musically as the concerts have been—the B minor mass had not been sung in Boston since 1901—the memory of Bach has been overshadowed by remembrances of the man who, 50 years ago, created the orchestra. Bach is one of the immortals and as such has the recognition of the world, but Boston can be pardoned if it chooses to honor the name of Henry L. Higginson, a citizen who "made one vast field of beauty accessible to persons having little other enjoyment . . . 'who leading gray lives, have needed this sunshine.'"

To many persons the most enjoyable and most moving part of the festival came on Wednesday evening when the orchestra, its board of trustees, and its friends formally observed the 50th anniversary. Most happy was the choice of Bliss Perry as the principal speaker. With nothing of the perfunctory eulogist, but with much of kindly insight and friendly comment, he told the story of Maj. Higginson's dream and its fulfilment. To his hearers the figure of the founder walked again. Let us quote Mr. Perry's closing words:

The men and women of his own generation are nearly gone. The Boston of his youth and manhood has changed beyond recognition. A new race of music-lovers has succeeded to the old. Fresh conceptions of the fine arts are molding the imaginations of a new era. Yet beauty and truth do not go out of fashion any more than old Johann Sebastian Bach goes out of fashion. They are forever being re-created; and whatever new and rich pleasures come to the patrons of the orchestra in the next 50 years, they can never quite forget the noble gentleman who first lighted the fire on this hearth.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL

Thill, New Tenor, Sings 1st Italian Role at Opera

By IRVING WEIL.

BACK TO BACH.

Serge Koussevitzky, for the final two concerts of the Boston Orchestra Thursday and Saturday goes back to Bach, a reflex of his recent Bach Festival on the grounds. The second Brandenburg concerto and the D-minor piano concerto with Alexander Borovsky as soloist will be heart at the first concert and the D-minor concerto for two violins at the second. The Brahms First Symphony and the Berlioz-Fantastic," respectively, fill out these programs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was notified yesterday by the Finnish Minister, Mr. W. Astrom, that the President of Finland had bestowed upon him the highest Finnish decoration, the cross of Commander of the Order of the White Cross. Dr. Koussevitzky received the decoration on account of his interest in Finnish music, especially that of Jan Sibelius. The Boston Symphony has played six Sibelius symphonies under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
APR 3 - 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra Booked

Will Give Final Concert in Series of Five Next Season.

The directors of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra met at the Hotel Kimball yesterday afternoon and completed plans for celebrating in fitting fashion the 10th season of the orchestra. It was decided to give five concerts again next season, four by the Springfield orchestra and bringing the season to a brilliant climax with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is 15 years since the Boston orchestra has given a regular evening concert in Springfield and the return of this famous organization to the Auditorium will mark an interesting event in the musical life of the city. The management of the local orchestra has been trying for some time to bring the Boston orchestra again to Springfield under its auspices but until now it has not been possible because of the crowded schedule of the orchestra. The proposition was put up to the directors of the local orchestra yesterday and they eagerly accepted it and authorized the secretary to sign a contract for the appearance of the Boston organization.

The concert dates for next season will be Nov. 17; Jan. 5; Feb. 9; March 8 and April 6. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just closed its 50th season with the most successful year in its history for its great Bach festival last week in honor of the event was one of the notable events in the musical history of Boston. Under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky the orchestra has reached the highest plane in its long and honored career and it will be a matter of congratulation to every music lover in Springfield that the local orchestra has been able to bring these famous players back once more to Springfield.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE

BOSTON CONCLUDES FESTIVAL OF BACH

Noted Orchestra's 50th Anniversary Season Celebrated With Series of Concerts

The Bach Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Sunday proved the peak of the 50th anniversary season of the great orchestra, which has been celebrated with many events. The Bach Festival, which was given on six days, from March 24 to March 29, was attended by overflowing audiences. At the conclusion of the Mass in B minor on Sunday night, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, together with the chorus, the orchestra, and the soloists were given a prolonged and tumultuous demonstration.

Wednesday evening, March 25, was devoted to the memory of Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra and its sole sustainer for 37 years, when an address was delivered by Bliss Perry, his friend and biographer.

The Festival included the Mass in B minor, the Magnificat, four cantatas, orchestral concertos and suites, and music for piano, harpsichord and organ. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and the Bach Cantata Club of Radcliffe performed the choral scores. Alexander Borovsky and Mme. Patorni-Casadesus came from Europe to appear as pianist and harpsichordist, respectively. The vocal soloists were Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer, Adelle Alberts, Richard Crooks and Fraser Gange.

The Boston Herald of Monday, March 30, thus described the close of the Festival:

"At the close of the concert the audience that packed the hall expressed its delight in this great music and in the outstanding brilliance of its performance with an enthusiasm more tempestuous than any other demonstration of the kind within recent memory. Dr. Koussevitzky, to whose devotion and enthusiasm the success of the Festival just ended was so largely due, was presented with a large wreath by representatives of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, amid a storm of congratulatory noises to which the great throng of singers and players upon the platform added their quota."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
APR 4 - 1931

VARIA

By WILLARD

The engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the Directors of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra is a great step forward. Not only will this concert serve to embelish the 10th anniversary of the Springfield organization, but it will stimulate interest in the orchestra itself and undoubtedly cause a large increase in subscriptions. Conditions for the past few years have been such that no manager or organization has dared to bring a Symphony to the city or any other great music for that matter. It is a matter of some 15 years since the Boston Symphony has been heard here in an evening concert although the Y. M. C. A. has had it here at various times. The directors are to be congratulated on their desire to enrich the musical life of the city.

The Bach Mass.

Writing of the Boston Symphony brings to mind the fact that the organization has recently completed in Boston a Bach festival that will go down in musical history. Outstanding in this festival were the two performances of the Bach Mass, one of which we heard last Sunday.

It was a notable achievement and quite as remarkable from a virtuoso standpoint as any performance ever given in this country. The Radcliffe and Harvard College choruses sang magnificently after practising a year on this work. It was singing such as one probably hears once in a lifetime. The dynamic Koussevitsky had absolute control over the choruses and orchestra and produced astonishing and wonderful effects.

The soloists were Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Amy Ellerman, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. To the great Matzenauer went the honors. She sang without a score and with that opulence of tone and nobility of interpretation which only she can summon. Crooks was in fine vocie and his one aria was superbly sung. Crooks is having a busy season, having sung the Bach "St. Matthew Passion" twice in Philadelphia with that orchestra, and this week singing it twice again with the Detroit Symphony forces. Neither Mr. Gagne or Miss Ellerman seemed equal to their tasks although both are earnest and well-schooled singers.

It was the work of the choruses, however, which provided the most thrilling moments. Fresh young voices gave the music body. A year of study under Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth provided familiarity and confidence and they were undaunted by Bach's phrases and periods or by his contrapuntal and fugal devices or his ornamentations. It was singing one hears all too seldom.

A veritable ovation greeted the participants after the mass. Dr. Koussevitsky received a huge wreath from the two choruses and he and the soloists were called back time after time. The sedate Boston audience went wild, cheered, stamped and applauded for fully half an hour.

We are told that every performance during the week met with intense enthusiasm which culminated after the presentation of the B Mass on Sunday night. Tickets were at a premium during the week and all available standing room was used. The festival was even more successful than the Brahms festival last year

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will end the New York series of its fiftieth season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 9 and 11, in Carnegie Hall.

The evening program will consist of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major, with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. Bach's pianoforte Concerto in D minor will also be played, the soloist being Alexander Borovsky, the Rusian pianist, who came from Europe especially to appear in the Bach festival recently held in Boston. The concert will close with the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

For the matinee program Mr. Koussevitzky announces Bach's Suite for Orchestra No. 3 in D major and the Concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra, the solo parts to be taken by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, first and second concert masters. The program will end with Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST
APR

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Koussevitzky's Closing Programs of Season—New Pieces by Philharmonic—Other Music Events Next Week

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY'S programs for the last two concerts of the New York season of the fiftieth year of the Boston Symphony Society, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, are devoted mainly to Bach. They are reminiscent of the recent Bach festival given in Boston by the orchestra in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, its founder. Thursday's program will consist of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in F major with solos by Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and Georges Mager, trumpet, and his Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra with Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, who was brought to this country especially for the Bach festival, as soloist on the Bechstein piano. Brahms's First Symphony completes the program.

Saturday afternoon's program will be devoted to Bach's Suite for Orchestra in D major and Concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra, with Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz as soloists, and the concert concludes with Berliz's "Symphonie Fantastique" in C major. The first concert of the orchestra was given October 22, 1881, with Georg Henschel as conductor, the program being Beethoven's Overture "Dedication of the House," Haydn's Symphony in B flat, the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Weber's "Festival" Overture. The soloist was the great American contralto, Annie Louise Cary, who sang the aria for Gluck's "Orpheus" and Penelope's aria from the scene of Max Bruch's "Odysseus."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Under the direction of Leon Barzin and with the assistance of Georges Barrere, flutist, as soloist, the National Orchestral Association will give its seventh concert of the season at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon of this week. The program announced includes a Bach Concerto for strings, Mozart's D major Concerto for Flute, Quinto Maganini's "Night on an Island of Fantasy" (first performance) and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will this week pay their fifth and last visit of the season to New York, playing in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. Both concerts will be devoted to the performance of works by classic composers; no novelties will be presented on either occasion.

The program for the Thursday evening concert, at which Alexander Borovsky, pianist, will appear as soloist, has been announced as follows:

Bach.....Brandenburg Concerto No. 2
Bach.....Piano Concerto in D minor
Brahms.....Symphony in C minor

Assisting artists at the Saturday matinee concert will be Ruchard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, violinists, members of the orchestra. The program will be as follows:

Bach.....Suite in D for Orchestra
Bach....Concerto in D minor for 2 Violins
Berlioz.....''Fantastic'' Symphony

The program for the Friday evening concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be found elsewhere on this page.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its last New York appearances of the season under Serge Koussevitzky next Thursday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, will offer some excerpts from its recent Bach festival in Boston on both programs. On Saturday afternoon Richard Burgin and J. Theodorowicz, concertmaster and assistant concertmaster of the orchestra, will be soloists in the Bach concerto for two violins. On Thursday evening Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, who came to America especially for this festival, will be soloist in the Bach D minor concerto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Philharmonic

Koussevitzky's Closing Programs of Season—New Pieces by Philharmonic—Other Music Events Next Week

Borough Visitation—Hadley to Use Choral Group in Last Concert—Two Native Works for Toscanini—Schedule at the Metropolitan.

Another phase of the music season as it concerns this borough will close this week when Sergei Koussevitsky brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music on Friday evening for the final concert of the year. The orchestra plays in Manhattan this week its last programs of the current period.

Richard Burgin, concertmeister, and Julius Theodorewicz will be the soloists in the D Minor Concerto of Bach for two violins. The D Major symphony of Haydn and the first Brahms symphony are the other program numbers.

Due to the Bostonians taking over Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, the Philharmonic-Symphony Society will spend that night at Hartford. On Wednesday evening, however, Mr. Toscanini makes two important gestures. He will play two works by an American composer and two others by Russians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now drawing toward the close of its fifteenth season, will make its last appearance in Brooklyn for the season next Friday evening, April 10, at the Academy of Music.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present the Symphony by Haydn in D major (B. & H. No. 101). The second number will be Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins with string orchestra, in which the solo parts will be taken by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, first and second concert-masters. This score was performed in the recent Bach Festival given in observance of the Anniversary Season and in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, the Orchestra's founder. The program and the season will end with Brahms First Symphony in C minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON APRIL 14

Brahms First Symphony on Closing Concert of 1930-1931 Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to a close its 1930-1931 concert series in this city when it appears at the R-K-O Albee Theatre a week from tomorrow night under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The stock of this fourth concert of the waning season will be the Brahms First Symphony, while the conductor has also drawn upon Bach, Debussy and Mendelsschn in picking his program. The Boston orchestra is featuring the Brahms work in its New York concert Saturday of this week.

Bach's Suite for Orchestra No. 3 in D major will be the opening composition, according to an announcement last night at Symphony Hall, Boston. The work is in five parts: Overture, air, two gavottes grouped together, a bouree and the concluding gigue.

The Debussy number is the familiar Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun", an eclogue by the poet Mallarme. These will follow the Scherzo and the Allegro vivace from Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

The Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, opus 68, comes after the intermission. Its four movements are designated as follows: I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro. II. Andante sostenuto. III. Un poco allegretto grazioso. IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

APR 3 193

BACH IN BOSTON; SOUL MARCHES ON

Bliss Perry Pays Tribute to One Whose Spirit Was Melodious and Who Transmitted to Posterity Gems That Glisten in a Thousand Diadems.

(Boston Herald)

The Boston symphony orchestra, under the stimulating leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky, has undertaken in other years special performances of the works of the greater composers. There was a Beethoven festival and more recently a Brahms festival. During this week the orchestra, assisted by the Harvard glee club, the Radcliffe choral society, and distinguished soloists, has been devoting itself to the major compositions of the most talented of the Bachs, John Sebastian.

Successful and important musically as the concerts have been—the B minor mass had not been sung in Boston since 1901—the memory of Bach has been overshadowed by remembrances of the man who, 50 years ago, created the orchestra. Bach is one of the immortals and as such has the recognition of the world, but Boston can be pardoned if it chooses to honor the name of Henry L. Higginson, a citizen who "made one vast field of beauty accessible to persons having little other enjoyment . . . 'who leading gray lives, have needed this sunshine.'"

To many persons the most enjoyable and most moving part of the festival came on Wednesday evening when the orchestra, its board of trustees, and its friends formally observed the 50th anniversary. Most happy was the choice of Bliss Perry as the principal speaker. With nothing of the perfunctory eulogist, but with much of kindly insight and friendly comment, he told the story of Maj. Higginson's dream and its fulfilment. To his hearers the figure of the founder walked again. Let us quote Mr. Perry's closing words:

The men and women of his own generation are nearly gone. The Boston of his youth and manhood has changed beyond recognition. A new race of music-lovers has succeeded to the old. Fresh conceptions of the fine arts are molding the imaginations of a new era. Yet beauty and truth do not go out of fashion any more than old Johann Sebastian Bach goes out of fashion. They are forever being re-created; and whatever new and rich pleasures come to the patrons of the orchestra in the next 50 years, they can never quite forget the noble gentleman who first lighted the fire on this hearth.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL

Thill, New Tenor, Sings 1st Italian Role at Opera

By IRVING WEIL.

BACK TO BACH.

Serge Koussevitzky, for the final two concerts of the Boston Orchestra Thursday and Saturday goes back to Bach, a reflex of his recent Bach Festival on the grounds. The second Brandenburg concerto and the D-minor piano concerto with Alexander Borovsky as soloist will be heart at the first concert and the D-minor concerto for two violins at the second. The Brahms First Symphony and the Berlioz-Fantastic," respectively, fill out these programs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 1931

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was notified yesterday by the Finnish Minister, Mr. W. Astrom, that the President of Finland had bestowed upon him the highest Finnish decoration, the cross of Commander of the Order of the White Cross. Dr. Koussevitzky received the decoration on account of his interest in Finnish music, especially that of Jan Sibelius. The Boston Symphony has played six Sibelius symphonies under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 3 - 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra Booked

Will Give Final Concert in Series of Five Next Season.

The directors of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra met at the Hotel Kimball yesterday afternoon and completed plans for celebrating in fitting fashion the 10th season of the orchestra. It was decided to give five concerts again next season, four by the Springfield orchestra and bringing the season to a brilliant climax with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is 15 years since the Boston orchestra has given a regular evening concert in Springfield and the return of this famous organization to the Auditorium will mark an interesting event in the musical life of the city. The management of the local orchestra has been trying for some time to bring the Boston orchestra again to Springfield under its auspices but until now it has not been possible because of the crowded schedule of the orchestra. The proposition was put up to the directors of the local orchestra yesterday and they eagerly accepted it and authorized the secretary to sign a contract for the appearance of the Boston organization.

The concert dates for next season will be Nov. 17; Jan. 5; Feb. 9; March 8 and April 6. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just closed its 50th season with the most successful year in its history for its great Bach festival last week in honor of the event was one of the notable events in the musical history of Boston. Under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky the orchestra has reached the highest plane in its long and honored career and it will be a matter of congratulation to every music lover in Springfield that the local orchestra has been able to bring these famous players back once more to Springfield.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE

BOSTON CONCLUDES FESTIVAL OF BACH

Noted Orchestra's 50th Anniversary Season Celebrated With Series of Concerts

The Bach Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Sunday proved the peak of the 50th anniversary season of the great orchestra, which has been celebrated with many events. The Bach Festival, which was given on six days, from March 24 to March 29, was attended by overflowing audiences. At the conclusion of the Mass in B minor on Sunday night, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, together with the chorus, the orchestra, and the soloists were given a prolonged and tumultuous demonstration.

Wednesday evening, March 25, was devoted to the memory of Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra and its sole sustainer for 37 years, when an address was delivered by Bliss Perry, his friend and biographer.

The Festival included the Mass in B minor, the Magnificat, four cantatas, orchestral concertos and suites, and music for piano, harpsichord and organ. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and the Bach Cantata Club of Radcliffe performed the choral scores. Alexander Borovsky and Mme. Patorni-Casadesus came from Europe to appear as pianist and harpsichordist, respectively. The vocal soloists were Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer, Adelle Alberts, Richard Crooks and Fraser Gange.

The Boston Herald of Monday, March 30, thus described the close of the Festival:

"At the close of the concert the audience that packed the hall expressed its delight in this great music and in the outstanding brilliance of its performance with an enthusiasm more tempestuous than any other demonstration of the kind within recent memory. Dr. Koussevitzky, to whose devotion and enthusiasm the success of the Festival just ended was so largely due, was presented with a large wreath by representatives of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, amid a storm of congratulatory noises to which the great throng of singers and players upon the platform added their quota."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 4 - 1931

VARIA

By WILLARD

The engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the Directors of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra is a great step forward. Not only will this concert serve to embelish the 10th anniversary of the Springfield organization, but it will stimulate interest in the orchestra itself and undoubtedly cause a large increase in subscriptions. Conditions for the past few years have been such that no manager or organization has dared to bring a Symphony to the city or any other great music for that matter. It is a matter of some 15 years since the Boston Symphony has been heard here in an evening concert although the Y. M. C. A. has had it here at various times. The directors are to be congratulated on their desire to enrich the musical life of the city.

The Bach Mass.

Writing of the Boston Symphony brings to mind the fact that the organization has recently completed in Boston a Bach festival that will go down in musical history. Outstanding in this festival were the two performances of the Bach Mass, one of which we heard last Sunday.

It was a notable achievement and quite as remarkable from a virtuoso standpoint as any performance ever given in this country. The Radcliffe and Harvard College choruses sang magnificently after practising a year on this work. It was singing such as one probably hears once in a lifetime. The dynamic Koussevitsky had absolute control over the choruses and orchestra and produced astonishing and wonderful effects.

The soloists were Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Amy Ellerman, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. To the great Matzenauer went the honors. She sang without a score and with that opulence of tone and nobility of interpretation which only she can summon. Crooks was in fine vocie and his one aria was superbly sung. Crooks is having a busy season, having sung the Bach "St. Matthew Passion" twice in Philadelphia with that orchestra, and this week singing it twice again with the Detroit Symphony forces. Neither Mr. Gagne or Miss Ellerman seemed equal to their tasks although both are earnest and well-schooled singers.

It was the work of the choruses, however, which provided the most thrilling moments. Fresh young voices gave the music body. A year of study under Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth provided familiarity and confidence and they were undaunted by Bach's phrases and periods or by his contrapuntal and fugal devices or his ornamentations. It was singing one hears all too seldom.

A veritable ovation greeted the participants after the mass. Dr. Koussevitsky received a huge wreath from the two choruses and he and the soloists were called back time after time. The sedate Boston audience went wild, cheered, stamped and applauded for fully half an hour.

We are told that every performance during the week met with intense enthusiasm which culminated after the presentation of the B Mass on Sunday night. Tickets were at a premium during the week and all available standing room was used. The festival was even more successful than the Brahms festival last year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

APR 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will end the New York series of its fiftieth season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 9 and 11, in Carnegie Hall.

The evening program will consist of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major, with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet. Bach's pianoforte Concerto in D minor will also be played, the soloist being Alexander Borovsky, the Rusian pianist, who came from Europe especially to appear in the Bach festival recently held in Boston. The concert will close with the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

For the matinee program Mr. Koussevitzky announces Bach's Suite for Orchestra No. 3 in D major and the Concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra, the solo parts to be taken by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, first and second concert masters. The program will end with Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

Way Screen

s to Become a Hollywood Star
ry With Horror

N DELEHANTY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY'S programs for the last two concerts of the New York season of the fiftieth year of the Boston Symphony Society, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, are devoted mainly to Bach. They are reminiscent of the recent Bach festival given in Boston by the orchestra in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, its founder. Thursday's program will consist of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in F major with solos by Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and Georges Mager, trumpet, and his Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra with Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, who was brought to this country especially for the Bach festival, as soloist on the Bechstein piano. Brahms's First Symphony completes the program.

Saturday afternoon's program will be devoted to Bach's Suite for Orchestra in D major and Concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra, with Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz as soloists, and the concert concludes with Berliz's "Symphonie Fantastique" in C major. The first concert of the orchestra was given October 22, 1881, with Georg Henschel as conductor, the program being Beethoven's Overture "Dedication of the House," Haydn's Symphony in B flat, the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Weber's "Festival" Overture. The soloist was the great American contralto, Annie Louise Cary, who sang the aria for Gluck's "Orpheus" and Penelope's aria from the scene of Max Bruch's "Odysseus."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Under the direction of Leon Barzin and with the assistance of Georges Barrere, flutist, as soloist, the National Orchestral Association will give its seventh concert of the season at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon of this week. The program announced includes a Bach Concerto for strings, Mozart's D major Concerto for Flute, Quinto Maganini's "Night on an Island of Fantasy" (first performance) and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will this week pay their fifth and last visit of the season to New York, playing in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. Both concerts will be devoted to the performance of works by classic composers; no novelties will be presented on either occasion.

The program for the Thursday evening concert, at which Alexander Borovsky, pianist, will appear as soloist, has been announced as follows:

Bach.....Brandenburg Concerto No. 2
Bach.....Piano Concerto in D minor
Brahms.....Symphony in C minor

Assisting artists at the Saturday matinee concert will be Ruchard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, violinists, members of the orchestra. The program will be as follows:

Bach.....Suite in D for Orchestra
Bach....Concerto in D minor for 2 Violins
Berlioz......"Fantastic" Symphony

The program for the Friday evening concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be found elsewhere on this page.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its last New York appearances of the season under Serge Koussevitzky next Thursday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, will offer some excerpts from its recent Bach festival in Boston on both programs. On Saturday afternoon Richard Burgin and J. Theodorowicz, concertmaster and assistant concertmaster of the orchestra, will be soloists in the Bach concerto for two violins. On Thursday evening Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, who came to America especially for this festival, will be soloist in the Bach D minor concerto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 1931

2 Orchestras End Seasons as Opera Enters Final Week

Koussevitsky Completes Borough Visitation—Hadley to Use Choral Group in Last Concert—Two Native Works for Toscanini—Schedule at the Metropolitan.

Another phase of the music season as it concerns this borough will close this week when Sergei Koussevitsky brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music on Friday evening for the final concert of the year. The orchestra plays in Manhattan this week its last programs of the current period.

Richard Burgin, concertmeister, and Julius Theodorewicz will be the soloists in the D Minor Concerto of Bach for two violins. The D Major symphony of Haydn and the first Brahms symphony are the other program numbers.

Due to the Bostonians taking over Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, the Philharmonic-Symphony Society will spend that night at Hartford. On Wednesday evening, however, Mr. Toscanini makes two important gestures. He will play two works by an American composer and two others by Russians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now drawing toward the close of its fifteenth season, will make its last appearance in Brooklyn for the season next Friday evening, April 10, at the Academy of Music.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present the Symphony of Haydn in D major (B. & H. No. 101). The second number will be Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins with string orchestra, in which the solo parts will be taken by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, first and second concert-masters. This score was performed in the recent Bach Festival given in observance of the Anniversary Season and in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, the Orchestra's founder. The program and the season will end with Brahms First Symphony in C minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY
HERE ON APRIL 14

Brahms First Symphony on Closing Concert of 1930-1931 Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to a close its 1930-1931 concert series in this city when it appears at the R-K-O Albee Theatre a week from tomorrow night under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The stock of this fourth concert of the waning season will be the Brahms First Symphony, while the conductor has also drawn upon Bach, Debussy and Mendelsschn in picking his program. The Boston orchestra is featuring the Brahms work in its New York concert Saturday of this week.

Bach's Suite for Orchestra No. 3 in D major will be the opening composition, according to an announcement last night at Symphony Hall, Boston. The work is in five parts: Overture, air, two gavottes grouped together, a bource and the concluding gigue.

The Debussy number is the familiar Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun", an eclogue by the poet Mallarme. These will follow the Scherzo and the Allegro vivace from Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

The Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, opus 68, comes after the intermission. Its four movements are designated as follows: I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro. II. Andante sostenuto. III. Un poco allegretto grazioso. IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

178

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME
APR 6 - 1931

MUSIC

Boston Major

The ghost of an old man with a sabre scar across his cheek hovered over Boston's Symphony Hall last week. In his honor Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky had prepared a six-day Bach festival and undertaken to give two complete performances of the great B Minor Mass. Contralto Margaret Matzenauer had come to do some of the soloing in her deep, vibrant voice. Singers from Harvard University and Radcliffe College had worked for weeks polishing the difficult choruses. Conductor Koussevitzky was keyed to a pitch where no amount of effort was too much to spend in the memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson, who 50 years ago founded the Boston Orchestra and for nearly 40 years supported it.

On the second day of the festival the old Major's bust was taken out of the

THE LATE MAJOR HIGGINSON
They put his bust and widow on the stage.

Symphony Hall lobby, set on the stage in the centre of a floral display. Instead of music, speeches were the meat of the afternoon, with the Major's widow, a little old lady of 93, one of the guests on the stage. Professor Bliss Perry of Harvard, the Major's friend & biographer, recalled many an interesting fact: Henry Lee Higginson went only a part of one year to Harvard although he was described by President Hadley of Yale as the "ideal Harvard man." He gave the university Soldiers' Field and the Harvard Union (meeting house for undergraduates).

For years Major Higginson knew every player in the orchestra just as he knew the names of every soldier in the two regiments which fought under him in the Civil War. Because of his great philanthropy, he was widely regarded as an enormously rich, successful businessman. It was news to most of last week's audience that he failed twice in business before he was taken into the family brokerage firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., that his generosity ran him close to bankruptcy again in his eighteenth year (1914) when his brother, the late Francis Lee Higginson, anonymously took over the burden of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
APR 8 - 1931

Subscribers to the Symphony Concerts are receiving the following circular. It is signed by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Russell S. Codman, Jr., Mrs M. G. Haughton, Mrs. Edward Thaw, Mr. and Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell, Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Steinert.

"This seems an appropriate time for us all to join in an expression of appreciation and gratitude to Dr. Koussevitzky for all that he has accomplished by his untiring devotion to the work of bringing our orchestra to its present perfection.

"It is proposed to present at the end of this season to Dr. Koussevitzky a wreath of gold or other emblem marking his part in the celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fiftieth Anniversary which his splendid efforts have made so memorable.

"If you care to participate in the gift kindly send your subscription (not exceeding one dollar) to Francis C. Gray; Lee, Higginson Trust Co., 50 Federal Street, Boston, not later than April 15."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM
APR 8 - 1931

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been awarded the Cross of the Commander of the Order of the White Cross by the President of the Republic of Finland. The decoration has been conferred in token of Mr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for Finnish music in general and Jans Sibelius in particular. Six of Sibelius's seven symphonies have been performed under his baton in America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 8 - 1931

MUSIC CRITIC TO GIVE LECTURE ON CONCERT

Dr. W. Louis Chapman Will Speak in Public Library Sunday.

A lecture, free to the public, will be given by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Evening Bulletin, on the program of the forthcoming Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Providence Public Library Sunday at 4 o'clock.

Throughout the winter, Dr. Chapman has given lectures on the Sunday prior to each Boston Symphony concert. They have attracted large and appreciative audiences of students, musicians and music lovers. The concert April 14 is the final one of the season.

The lectures are given under auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 8 - 1931

MUSIC CRITIC TO GIVE LECTURE ON CONCERT

Dr. W. Louis Chapman Will Speak in Public Library Sunday.

A lecture, free to the public, will be given by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal, on the program of the forthcoming Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Providence Public Library Sunday at 4 o'clock.

Throughout the winter, Dr. Chapman has given lectures on the Sunday prior to each Boston Symphony concert. They have attracted large and appreciative audiences of students, musicians and music lovers. The concert April 14 is the final one of the season.

The lectures are given under auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 10 1931

HUB SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA 50-YEAR REVIEW PUBLISHED

The 50 years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be reviewed in a history by Mark A. DeWolfe Howe, announced for publication last night as the culminating feature of the orchestra's half-century season. It will be offered at a special price to patrons of symphony concerts in Boston and elsewhere.

The book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1888-1931" is in part a republication of Dr. Howe's earlier book on the organization which was brought out in 1914. To this have been added new chapters relating the fortunes of the orchestra through the ensuing 17 years. The last seasons under Dr. Muck, the era of the two French conductors and the achievements of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky are recorded.

New full appendices will include a complete list of the music played at the regular concerts, giving the dates of performance. The soloists and the personnel through 50 years are also named, and an address by Bliss Perry, given at the Bach Festival last month, is printed in eulogy of Henry Lee Higginson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
APR 9 - 1931

Musica

PROGRAM FOR YOUNG

The Boston Symphony orchestra presented the second in the series of Young People's Concerts Monday afternoon in Symphony Hall with a fair-sized audience. The Herald's account was in part as follows: Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the first movement of Haydn's Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 10) and the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Incidental music for Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream;" Mr. Richard Burgin conducted the Handel-Casadeus Andante from concerto (viola solo; Jean Lafranc). Honegger's Pacific 231, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish Themes.

The children were well pleased with the choice of music. The pert rhythm of the Allegro from Haydn's Symphony aroused their interest. Their delight increased as the nimble-footed movement advanced. So it was with the Mendelssohn Scherzo; what Mr. Meyer couldn't explain to them in words—such as what the fairies pictured on one of the slides were discussing—the instruments told them quite plainly.

Instead of simply showing the children a picture of the viola Mr. Meyer produced the instrument itself, held it up with the violin that the children might see the difference between the two instruments. That the ear might know to distinguish between them Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Lefranc played phrases on their respective instruments—first on the strings the violin and viola possess in common, then on those peculiar to each instrument—thus graphically bringing to the hearers the difference in timbre of each. This was duly appreciated, as was Mr. Lefranc's beautiful playing of the Andante that followed.

The knowledge Mr. Meyer shows of locomotives would almost vie with that of Mr. Honegger himself. However, the young people seemed much more engrossed with the information he gave them than the music which portrays Pacific 231 so vividly. If their attention lapsed a bit during the Honegger, the Caprice on Spanish Themes captivated and intrigued them. The brilliant piece excited curiosity and admiration. Enthusiastic applause followed it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
APR 10 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS APPLAUDED HERE ON 50TH BIRTHDAY

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra on its final weekend visit this season was heard by a large and appreciative audience at Carnegie Hall last evening. The band is celebrating its fiftieth year of existence and in its home town observed the anniversary with a festival of Bach's music. Last night's program contained two numbers by that composer, held over from the festival list. They were the F major Brandenburg concerto and the D minor concerto for piano, with Alexander Borovsky as soloist. The concert ended with Brahms' C minor symphony. Serge Koussevitzky was in charge.

He prepared the following program for tomorrow afternoon, the final event in the Bostonians' New York series: D major suite for orchestra, by Bach; concerto D minor for two violins and strings, by Bach (the featured musicians will be Concertmaster Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz), and Symphonie Fantastique, by Berlioz.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL
APR 10 1931

Boston Orchestra in Music of Bach and Brahms

By IRVING WEIL.

Serge Koussevitzky has lately been conducting the Boston Orchestra through a somewhat marathonic Bach Festival in observance of its fiftieth anniversary year, and he brought a little of it with him last night for the band's monthly visit to Carnegie Hall. He also played some of the music of Brahms, thus chastely devoting his whole evening to two of the three B's of the classic repertoire.

Bach was represented by the second of the six Brandenburg concertos, the one with concertino of four solo instruments (violin, flute, oboe and trumpet), and by the D-minor piano, or rather, harpsichord concerto. The Brahms work was the C-minor symphony, now so frequently heard in Carnegie that its phonetic contours have probably hollowed out permanent places for themselves in the architecture.

2 CONCERTOS HAZARDOUS.

It is a little hazardous to program two Bach concertos end to end during the same evening, for the form, even as Bach developed it, was still essentially the old concerto grosso and admitted of little real variety. The true concerto, with its exciting star part for a featured instrument, was not to arise until Mozart should come along and evolve it into a virtuoso show piece.

Bach strode the path of progress with his D-minor concerto but the solo piano (now customarily substituted for the intended harpsichord) remains part of the early eighteenth century orchestra that accompanies it; when it does emerge, it does so without actual insistence.

With a piano instead of a harpsichord, the music seems to be neither fish nor flesh. The modern concert grand introduces a tone timbre that Bach knew nothing about and, one pretty strongly suspects, would have rejected for this particular type of music if he had. One has only to hear this concerto with a harpsichord as played by Wanda Landowska or Regina Paterni to realize this acutely; for the piece is music for the strings and the harpsichord's plucked vibration of tone keeps it such.

However, the old klavier is becoming more and more definitively a thing of the past and one must accept the piano in its place, even where it so obviously doesn't belong. The solo instrument was played last night by the Russian pianist, Alexander Borovsky, who has not been heard here in a number of years, and who came over just for Mr. Koussevitsky's Bach Festival in Boston.

BOROVSKY PLAYS ADROITLY.

Mr. Borovsky did his part adroitly and with an evident knowledge of Bach's intentions. Technically, the solo part of the concerto calls for little more than fleetness and independence of finger, a commonplace for so good a pianist as this Russian. But he was additionally skillful and intelligent in his use, or disuse, of the damper pedal and saw to it that some simulation of the staccato effect of the harpsichord should be obtained.

The F-major Brandenburg concerto could, to our own taste, have been played with more vim for its zestful allegro and more go in the finale, whilst Mr. Koussevitsky slowed up its middle movement until the melody of this andante took on the ponderous pace of largo. The solo trumpet part is always a cruel problem to the modern player, for he is hard put to it to compass Bach's high altitudes. Either eighteenth century trumpeters were marvels, or the instrument-makers of that day possessed a secret which they kept. Mr. Georges Maker scarcely solved all Bach's problems last night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM
APR 10 1931

Borovsky Aids Orchestra

By PITTS SA[illegible]

In Boston's Symphony Hall, a fort[illegible]ght or so ago, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its Russian cond[illegible]ctor, Serge Koussevitzky, [illegible]ded two performances of the B minor Mass.

There are reminders of that festival in the programs which the men of Boston have brought over to Carnegie Hall t[illegible]is week. Though naturally enough they have not undertaken to repeat here the titanic Mass, four concertos by Bach had been selected for our delectation.

The two heard last night were the second "Brandenburg" concerto, in F major, and the D minor concerto for clavier and strings. For the latter the Bostonians enjoyed the distinguished assistance of an artist of the first rank in Alexander Borovsky, the Russian pianist, who had not appeared here in several seasons.

The D minor concerto is a delectable work, enshrining between its two typical allegros an adagio that opens with a stately sadness, passes in gently rhapsodic fashion to a mood of ineffable tenderness, and ends with a return of the melancholy hauteur.

The performance accorded the adagio on this occasion by Mr. Borovsky and the Boston strings was something to be treasured in the memory. Not only was it as exquisitely adjusted a piece of ensemble playing as one is likely ever to hear, but it was also instinct with the quiet exaltation, the profundity, the noble sensitiveness that are characteristic of Bach. Nor were Mr. Borovsky and the strings less successful with the allegros.

The Russian pianist furnished a conspicuous example of an accomplished and resourceful art exercised solely in the interest of music, without thought of personal display.

The evenness of the finger work, the faultlessly controlled shading, the discreet dynamic scale, the judicious employment of tone color all bespoke the intelligent and devoted student of Bach.

We have known Mr. Borovsky in certain modern compositions as a colossal technician. In his presentation of Bach he is as authentically, if less obviously, a mighty master of the keyboard, and at the same time he is a high priest of what is purest and loftiest in the tonal art.

Mr. Koussevitzky obtained also a memorable performance of the "Brandenburg" concerto, with its robust and jolly allegro moderato, its andante of an unearthly beauty, and its dazzling finale. In this work the soloists—Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and George Mager, trumpet—acquitted themselves admirably.

The rest of the concert was given over to the hard working C minor symphony of Brahms.

In Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon he will lead the Boston musicians in Bach's third orchestral

Boston in Concert

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 10 1931

Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought no new music to the attention of their audience in Carnegie Hall last evening. Instead, they presented a program devoted to the works of classic masters—to Sebastian Bach's F major Brandenburg Concerto and D minor Piano Concerto, and to the C minor Symphony of Brahms.

The F major Brandenburg Concerto was given in its original form, with the trumpet part unaltered. The range of the music written for this instrument is extremely high; modern players find it difficult to perform accurately or with a clear tone. Last evening success did not attend the attempt of Georges Mager, first trumpeter of Mr. Koussewitsky's orchestra to negotiate it untransposed.

Alexander Borovsky appeared as soloist in the D minor Piano Concerto. His playing was distinguished by melodic and rhythmic clarity, by an admirable grasp of the style of the work in whose exposition he assisted. In both of the Bach Concertos, Mr. Koussewitsky's strings were heard to advantage; in skill, in the living character of the tone they produce, they continue to impress one as superior to the strings of other Eastern orchestras.

The Brahms Symphony will be played again under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction at the Academy of Music this evening. More may be said of its performance subsequent to this repetition.

E. C.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

178

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME

MUSIC

Boston Major

The ghost of an old man with a sabre scar across his cheek hovered over Boston's Symphony Hall last week. In his honor Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky had prepared a six-day Bach festival and undertaken to give two complete performances of the great B Minor Mass. Contralto Margaret Matzenauer had come to do some of the soloing in her deep, vibrant voice. Singers from Harvard University and Radcliffe College had worked for weeks polishing the difficult choruses. Conductor Koussevitzky was keyed to a pitch where no amount of effort was too much to spend in the memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson, who 50 years ago founded the Boston Orchestra and for nearly 40 years supported it.

On the second day of the festival the old Major's bust was taken out of the

THE LATE MAJOR HIGGINSON
They put his bust and widow on the stage.

Symphony Hall lobby, set on the stage in the centre of a floral display. Instead of music, speeches were the meat of the afternoon, with the Major's widow, a little old lady of 93, one of the guests on the stage. Professor Bliss Perry of Harvard, the Major's friend & biographer, recalled many an interesting fact: Henry Lee Higginson went only a part of one year to Harvard although he was described by President Hadley of Yale as the "ideal Harvard man." He gave the university Soldiers' Field and the Harvard Union (meeting house for undergraduates).

For years Major Higginson knew every player in the orchestra just as he knew the names of every soldier in the two regiments which fought under him in the Civil War. Because of his great philanthropy, he was widely regarded as an enormously rich, successful businessman. It was news to most of last week's audience that he failed twice in business before he was taken into the family brokerage firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., that his generosity ran him close to bankruptcy again in his eighteenth year (1914) when his brother, the late Francis Lee Higginson, anonymously took over the burden of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

Subscribers to the Symphony Concerts are receiving the following circular. It is signed by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Russell S. Codman, Jr., Mrs. M. G. Haughton, Mrs. Edward Thaw, Mr. and Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell, Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Steinert.

"This seems an appropriate time for us all to join in an expression of appreciation and gratitude to Dr. Koussevitzky for all that he has accomplished by his untiring devotion to the work of bringing our orchestra to its present perfection.

"It is proposed to present at the end of this season to Dr. Koussevitzky a wreath of gold or other emblem marking his part in the celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fiftieth Anniversary which his splendid efforts have made so memorable.

"If you care to participate in the gift kindly send your subscription (not exceeding one dollar) to Francis C. Gray: Lee, Higginson Trust Co., 50 Federal Street, Boston. Not later than April 15."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been awarded the Cross of the Commander of the Order of the White Cross by the President of the Republic of Finland. The decoration has been conferred in token of Mr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for Finnish music in general and Jans Sibelius in particular. Six of Sibelius's seven symphonies have been performed under his baton in America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MUSIC CRITIC TO GIVE
LECTURE ON CONCERT

Dr. W. Louis Chapman Will Speak in Public Library Sunday.

A lecture, free to the public, will be given by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Evening Bulletin, on the program of the forthcoming Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Providence Public Library Sunday at 4 o'clock.

Throughout the winter, Dr. Chapman has given lectures on the Sunday prior to each Boston Symphony concert. They have attracted large and appreciative audiences of students, musicians and music lovers. The concert April 14 is the final one of the season.

The lectures are given under auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MUSIC CRITIC TO GIVE
LECTURE ON CONCERT

Dr. W. Louis Chapman Will Speak in Public Library Sunday.

A lecture, free to the public, will be given by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal, on the program of the forthcoming Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Providence Public Library Sunday at 4 o'clock.

Throughout the winter, Dr. Chapman has given lectures on the Sunday prior to each Boston Symphony concert. They have attracted large and appreciative audiences of students, musicians and music lovers. The concert April 14 is the final one of the season.

The lectures are given under auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

HUB SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
50-YEAR REVIEW PUBLISHED

The 50 years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be reviewed in a history by Mark A. DeWolfe Howe, announced for publication last night as the culminating feature of the orchestra's half-century season. It will be offered at a special price to patrons of symphony concerts in Boston and elsewhere.

The book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1888-1931" is in part a republication of Dr. Howe's earlier book on the organization which was brought out in 1914. To this have been added new chapters relating the fortunes of the orchestra through the ensuing 17 years. The last seasons under Dr. Muck, the era of the two French conductors and the achievements of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky are recorded.

New full appendices will include a complete list of the music played at the regular concerts, giving the dates of performance. The soloists and the personnel through 50 years are also named, and an address by Bliss Perry, given at the Bach Festival last month, is printed in eulogy of Henry Lee Higginson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
APR 9 - 1931

Musica

PROGRAM FOR YOUNG

The Boston Symphony orchestra presented the second in the series of Young People's Concerts Monday afternoon in Symphony Hall with a fair-sized audience. The Herald's account was in part as follows: Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the first movement of Haydn's Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 10) and the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Incidental music for Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream;" Mr. Richard Burgin conducted the Handel-Casadeus Andante from concerto (viola solo: Jean Lafranc). Honegger's Pacific 231, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish Themes.

The children were well pleased with the choice of music. The pert rhythm of the Allegro from Haydn's Symphony aroused their interest. Their delight increased as the nimble-footed movement advanced. So it was with the Mendelssohn Scherzo; what Mr. Meyer couldn't explain to them in words—such as what the fairies pictured on one of the slides were discussing—the instruments told them quite plainly.

Instead of simply showing the children a picture of the viola Mr. Meyer produced the instrument itself, held it up with the violin that the children might see the difference between the two instruments. That the ear might know to distinguish between them Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Lefranc played phrases on their respective instruments—first on the strings the violin and viola possess in common, then on those peculiar to each instrument—thus graphically bringing to the hearers the difference in timbre of each. This was duly appreciated, as was Mr. Lefranc's beautiful playing of the Andante that followed.

The knowledge Mr. Meyer shows of locomotives would almost vie with that of Mr. Honegger himself. However, the young people seemed much more engrossed with the information he gave them than the music which portrays Pacific 231 so vividly. If their attention lapsed a bit during the Honegger, the Caprice on Spanish Themes captivated and intrigued them. The brilliant piece excited curiosity and admiration. Enthusiastic applause followed it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS APPLAUDED HERE ON 50TH BIRTHDAY

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra on its final weekend visit this season was heard by a large and appreciative audience at Carnegie Hall last evening. The band is celebrating its fiftieth year of existence and in its home town observed the anniversary with a festival of Bach's music. Last night's program contained two numbers by that composer, held over from the festival list. They were the F major Brandenburg concerto and the D minor concerto for piano, with Alexander Borovsky as soloist. The concert ended with Brahms' C minor symphony. Serge Koussevitzky was in charge.

He prepared the following program for tomorrow afternoon, the final event in the Bostonians' New York series: D major suite for orchestra, by Bach; concerto D minor for two violins and strings, by Bach (the featured musicians will be Concertmaster Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz), and Symphonie Fantastique, by Berlioz.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL

Boston Orchestra in Music of Bach and Brahms

By IRVING WEIL.

Serge Koussevitzky has lately been conducting the Boston Orchestra through a somewhat marathonic Bach Festival in observance of its fiftieth anniversary year, and he brought a little of it with him last night for the band's monthly visit to Carnegie Hall. He also played some of the music of Brahms, thus chastely devoting his whole evening to two of the three B's of the classic repertoire.

Bach was represented by the second of the six Brandenburg concertos, the one with concertino of four solo instruments (violin, flute, oboe and trumpet), and by the D-minor piano, or rather, harpsichord concerto. The Brahms work was the C-minor symphony, now so frequently heard in Carnegie that its phonetic contours have probably hollowed out permanent places for themselves in the architecture.

2 CONCERTOS HAZARDOUS.

It is a little hazardous to program two Bach concertos end to end during the same evening, for the form, even as Bach developed it, was still essentially the old concerto grosso and admitted of little real variety. The true concerto, with its exciting star part for a featured instrument, was not to arise until Mozart should come along and evolve it into a virtuoso show piece.

Bach strode the path of progress with his D-minor concerto but the solo piano (now customarily substituted for the intended harpsichord) remains part of the early eighteenth century orchestra that accompanies it; when it does emerge, it does so without actual insistence.

With a piano instead of a harpsichord, the music seems to be neither fish nor flesh. The modern concert grand introduces a tone timbre that Bach knew nothing about and, one pretty strongly suspects, would have rejected for this particular type of music if he had. One has only to hear this concerto with a harpsichord as played by Wanda Landowska or Regina Paterni to realize this acutely; for the piece is music for the strings and the harpsichord's plucked vibration of tone keeps it such.

However, the old klavier is becoming more and more definitively a thing of the past and one must accept the piano in its place, even where it so obviously doesn't belong. The solo instrument was played last night by the Russian pianist, Alexander Borovsky, who has not been heard here in a number of years, and who came over just for Mr. Koussevitsky's Bach Festival in Boston.

BOROVSKY PLAYS ADROITLY.

Mr. Borovsky did his part adroitly and with an evident knowledge of Bach's intentions. Technically, the solo part of the concerto calls for little more than fleetness and independence of finger, a commonplace for so good a pianist as this Russian. But he was additionally skillful and intelligent in his use, or disuse, of the damper pedal and saw to it that some simulation of the staccato effect of the harpsichord should be obtained.

The F-major Brandenburg concerto could, to our own taste, have been played with more vim for its zestful allegro and more go in the finale, whilst Mr. Koussevitsky slowed up its middle movement until the melody of this andante took on the ponderous pace of largo. The solo trumpet part is always a cruel problem to the modern player, for he is hard put to it to compass Bach's high altitudes. Either eighteenth century trumpeters were marvels, or the instrument-makers of that day possessed a secret which they kept. Mr. Georges Maker scarcely solved all Bach's problems last night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

Borovsky Aids Orchestra

By PITTS SANBORN.

In Boston's Symphony Hall, a fortnight or so ago, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, presided through a big Bach festival that included two performances of the B minor Mass.

There are reminders of that festival in the programs which the men of Boston have brought over to Carnegie Hall this week. Though naturally enough they have not undertaken to repeat here the titanic Mass, four concertos by Bach had been selected for our delectation.

The two heard last night were the second "Brandenburg" concerto, in F major, and the D minor concerto for clavier and strings. For the latter the Bostonians enjoyed the distinguished assistance of an artist of the first rank in Alexander Borovsky, the Russian pianist, who had not appeared here in several seasons.

The D minor concerto is a delectable work, enshrining between its two typical allegros an adagio that opens with a stately sadness, passes in gently rhapsodic fashion to a mood of ineffable tenderness, and ends with a return of the melancholy hauteur.

The performance accorded the adagio on this occasion by Mr. Borovsky and the Boston strings was something to be treasured in the memory. Not only was it as exquisitely adjusted a piece of ensemble playing as one is likely ever to hear, but it was also instinct with the quiet exaltation, the profundity, the noble sensitiveness that are characteristic of Bach. Nor were Mr. Borovsky and the strings less successful with the allegros.

The Russian pianist furnished a conspicuous example of an accomplished and resourceful art exercised solely in the interest of music, without thought of personal display.

The evenness of the finger work, the faultlessly controlled shading, the discreet dynamic scale, the judicious employment of tone color all bespoke the intelligent and devoted student of Bach.

We have known Mr. Borovsky in certain modern compositions as a colossal technician. In his presentation of Bach he is as authentically, if less obviously, a mighty master of the keyboard, and at the same time he is a high priest of what is purest and loftiest in the tonal art.

Mr. Koussevitzky obtained also a memorable performance of the "Brandenburg" concerto, with its robust and jolly allegro moderato, its andante of an unearthly beauty, and its dazzling finale. In this work the soloists—Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and George Mager, trumpet—acquitted themselves admirably.

The rest of the concert was given over to the hard working C minor symphony of Brahms.

In Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon he will lead the Boston musicians in Bach's third orchestral

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought no new music to the attention of their audience in Carnegie Hall last evening. Instead, they presented a program devoted to the works of classic masters—to Sebastian Bach's F major Brandenburg Concerto and D minor Piano Concerto, and to the C minor Symphony of Brahms.

The F major Brandenburg Concerto was given in its original form, with the trumpet part unaltered. The range of the music written for this instrument is extremely high; modern players find it difficult to perform accurately or with a clear tone. Last evening success did not attend the attempt of Georges Mager, first trumpeter of Mr. Koussewitsky's orchestra to negotiate it untransposed.

Alexander Borovsky appeared as soloist in the D minor Piano Concerto. His playing was distinguished by melodic and rhythmic clarity, by an admirable grasp of the style of the work in whose exposition he assisted. In both of the Bach Concertos, Mr. Koussewitsky's strings were heard to advantage; in skill, in the living character of the tone they produce, they continue to impress one as superior to the strings of other Eastern orchestras.

The Brahms Symphony will be played again under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction at the Academy of Music this evening. More may be said of its performance subsequent to this repetition.

E. C.

Boston in Concert

INFORMATION OBSCURED

178

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME

MUSIC

Boston Major

The ghost of an old man with a sabre scar across his cheek hovered over Boston's Symphony Hall last week. In his honor Conductor Sergei Koussevitzky had prepared a six-day Bach festival and undertaken to give two complete performances of the great B Minor Mass. Contralto Margaret Matzenauer had come to do some of the soloing in her deep, vibrant voice. Singers from Harvard University and Radcliffe College had worked for weeks polishing the difficult choruses. Conductor Koussevitzky was keyed to a pitch where no amount of effort was too much to spend in the memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson, who 50 years ago founded the Boston Orchestra and for nearly 40 years supported it.

On the second day of the festival the old Major's bust was taken out of the

THE LATE MAJOR HIGGINSON
They put his bust and widow on the stage.

Symphony Hall lobby, set on the stage in the centre of a floral display. Instead of music, speeches were the meat of the afternoon, with the Major's widow, a little old lady of 93, one of the guests on the stage. Professor Bliss Perry of Harvard, the Major's friend & biographer, recalled many an interesting fact: Henry Lee Higginson went only a part of one year to Harvard although he was described by President Hadley of Yale as the "ideal Harvard man." He gave the university Soldiers' Field and the Harvard Union (meeting house for undergraduates).

For years Major Higginson knew every player in the orchestra just as he knew the names of every soldier in the two regiments which fought under him in the Civil War. Because of his great philanthropy, he was widely regarded as an enormously rich, successful businessman. It was news to most of last week's audience that he failed twice in business before he was taken into the family brokerage firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., that his generosity ran him close to bankruptcy again in his eighties year (1914) when his brother, the late Francis Lee Higginson, anonymously took over the burden of the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

Subscribers to the Symphony Concerts are receiving the following circular. It is signed by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Russell S. Codman, Jr., Mrs M. G. Haughton, Mrs. Edward Thaw, Mr. and Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell, Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Steinert.

"This seems an appropriate time for us all to join in an expression of appreciation and gratitude to Dr. Koussevitzky for all that he has accomplished by his untiring devotion to the work of bringing our orchestra to its present perfection.

"It is proposed to present at the end of this season to Dr. Koussevitzky a wreath of gold or other emblem marking his part in the celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fiftieth Anniversary which his splendid efforts have made so memorable.

"If you care to participate in the gift kindly send your subscription (not exceeding one dollar) to Francis C. Gray, Lee, Higginson Trust Co., 50 Federal Street, Boston, not later than April 15."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been awarded the Cross of the Commander of the Order of the White Cross by the President of the Republic of Finland. The decoration has been conferred in token of Mr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for Finnish music in general and Jans Sibelius in particular. Six of Sibelius's seven symphonies have been performed under his baton in America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MUSIC CRITIC TO GIVE
LECTURE ON CONCERT

Dr. W. Louis Chapman Will Speak in Public Library Sunday.

A lecture, free to the public, will be given by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Evening Bulletin, on the program of the forthcoming Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Providence Public Library Sunday at 4 o'clock.

Throughout the winter, Dr. Chapman has given lectures on the Sunday prior to each Boston Symphony concert. They have attracted large and appreciative audiences of students, musicians and music lovers. The concert April 14 is the final one of the season.

The lectures are given under auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MUSIC CRITIC TO GIVE
LECTURE ON CONCERT

Dr. W. Louis Chapman Will Speak in Public Library Sunday.

A lecture, free to the public, will be given by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal, on the program of the forthcoming Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Providence Public Library Sunday at 4 o'clock.

Throughout the winter, Dr. Chapman has given lectures on the Sunday prior to each Boston Symphony concert. They have attracted large and appreciative audiences of students, musicians and music lovers. The concert April 14 is the final one of the season.

The lectures are given under auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

HUB SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
50-YEAR REVIEW PUBLISHED

The 50 years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be reviewed in a history by Mark A. DeWolfe Howe, announced for publication last night as the culminating feature of the orchestra's half-century season. It will be offered at a special price to patrons of symphony concerts in Boston and elsewhere.

The book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1888-1931" is in part a republication of Dr. Howe's earlier book on the organization which was brought out in 1914. To this have been added new chapters relating the fortunes of the orchestra through the ensuing 17 years. The last seasons under Dr. Muck, the era of the two French conductors and the achievements of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky are recorded.

New full appendices will include a complete list of the music played at the regular concerts, giving the dates of performance. The soloists and the personnel through 50 years are also named, and an address by Bliss Perry, given at the Bach Festival last month, is printed in eulogy of Henry Lee Higginson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
APR 9 - 1931

Musica

PROGRAM FOR YOUNG

The Boston Symphony orchestra presented the second in the series of Young People's Concerts Monday afternoon in Symphony Hall with a fair-sized audience. The Herald's account was in part as follows: Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the first movement of Haydn's Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 10) and the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Incidental music for Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream;" Mr. Richard Burgin conducted the Handel-Casadeus Andante from concerto (viola solo: Jean Lafranc). Honegger's Pacific 231, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish Themes.

The children were well pleased with the choice of music. The pert rhythm of the Allegro from Haydn's Symphony aroused their interest. Their delight increased as the nimble-footed movement advanced. So it was with the Mendelssohn Scherzo; what Mr. Meyer couldn't explain to them in words—such as what the fairies pictured on one of the slides were discussing—the instruments told them quite plainly.

Instead of simply showing the children a picture of the viola Mr. Meyer produced the instrument itself, held it up with the violin that the children might see the difference between the two instruments. That the ear might know to distinguish between them Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Lefranc played phrases on their respective instruments—first on the strings the violin and viola possess in common, then on those peculiar to each instrument—thus graphically bringing to the hearers the difference in timbre of each. This was duly appreciated, as was Mr. Lefranc's beautiful playing of the Andante that followed.

The knowledge Mr. Meyer shows of locomotives would almost vie with that of Mr. Honegger himself. However, the young people seemed much more engrossed with the information he gave them than the music which portrays Pacific 231 so vividly. If their attention lapsed a bit during the Honegger, the Caprice on Spanish Themes captivated and intrigued them. The brilliant piece excited curiosity and admiration. Enthusiastic applause followed it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS APPLAUDED HERE ON 50TH BIRTHDAY

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra on its final weekend visit this season was heard by a large and appreciative audience at Carnegie Hall last evening. The band is celebrating its fiftieth year of existence and in its home town observed the anniversary with a festival of Bach's music. Last night's program contained two numbers by that composer, held over from the festival list. They were the F major Brandenburg concerto and the D minor concerto for piano, with Alexander Borovsky as soloist. The concert ended with Brahms' C minor symphony. Serge Koussevitzky was in charge.

He prepared the following program for tomorrow afternoon, the final event in the Bostonians' New York series: D major suite for orchestra, by Bach; concerto D minor for two violins and strings, by Bach (the featured musicians will be Concertmaster Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz), and Symphonie Fantastique, by Berlioz.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL

Boston Orchestra in Music of Bach and Brahms

By IRVING WEIL.

Serge Koussevitzky has lately been conducting the Boston Orchestra through a somewhat marathonic Bach Festival in observance of its fiftieth anniversary year, and he brought a little of it with him last night for the band's monthly visit to Carnegie Hall. He also played some of the music of Brahms, thus chastely devoting his whole evening to two of the three B's of the classic repertoire.

Bach was represented by the second of the six Brandenburg concertos, the one with concertino of four solo instruments (violin, flute, oboe and trumpet), and by the D-minor piano, or rather, harpsichord concerto. The Brahms work was the C-minor symphony, now so frequently heard in Carnegie that its phonetic contours have probably hollowed out permanent places for themselves in the architecture.

2 CONCERTOS HAZARDOUS.

It is a little hazardous to program two Bach concertos end to end during the same evening, for the form, even as Bach developed it, was still essentially the old concerto grosso and admitted of little real variety. The true concerto, with its exciting star part for a featured instrument, was not to arise until Mozart should come along and evolve it into a virtuoso show piece.

Bach strode the path of progress with his D-minor concerto but the solo piano (now customarily substituted for the intended harpsichord) remains part of the early eighteenth century orchestra that accompanies it; when it does emerge, it does so without actual insistence.

With a piano instead of a harpsichord, the music seems to be neither fish nor flesh. The modern concert grand introduces a tone timbre that Bach knew nothing about and, one pretty strongly suspects, would have rejected for this particular type of music if he had. One has only to hear this concerto with a harpsichord as played by Wanda Landowska or Regina Paterni to realize this acutely; for the piece is music for the strings and the harpsichord's plucked vibration of tone keeps it such.

However, the old klavier is becoming more and more definitively a thing of the past and one must accept the piano in its place, even where it so obviously doesn't belong. The solo instrument was played last night by the Russian pianist, Alexander Borovsky, who has not been heard here in a number of years, and who came over just for Mr. Koussevitsky's Bach Festival in Boston.

BOROVSKY PLAYS ADROITLY.

Mr. Borovsky did his part adroitly and with an evident knowledge of Bach's intentions. Technically, the solo part of the concerto calls for little more than fleetness and independence of finger, a commonplace for so good a pianist as this Russian. But he was additionally skillful and intelligent in his use, or disuse, of the damper pedal and saw to it that some simulation of the staccato effect of the harpsichord should be obtained.

The F-major Brandenburg concerto could, to our own taste, have been played with more vim for its zestful allegro and more go in the finale, whilst Mr. Koussevitsky slowed up its middle movement until the melody of this andante took on the ponderous pace of largo. The solo trumpet part always a cruel problem to the modern player, for he is hard put to it to compass Bach's high altitudes. Either eighteenth century trumpeters were marvels, or the instrument-makers of that day possessed a secret which they kept. Mr. Georges Maker scarcely solved all Bach's problems last night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

Borovsky Aids Boston Orchestra in Concert

By PITTS SANBORN.

In Boston's Symphony Hall, a fortnight or so ago, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, carried through a big Bach festival that included two performances of the B minor Mass.

There are reminders of that festival in the programs which the men of Boston have brought over to Carnegie Hall this week. Though naturally enough they have not undertaken to repeat here the titanic Mass, four concertos by Bach had been selected for our delectation.

The two heard last night were the second "Brandenburg" concerto, in F major, and the D minor concerto for clavier and strings. For the latter the Bostonians enjoyed the distinguished assistance of an artist of the first rank in Alexander Borovsky, the Russian pianist, who had not appeared here in several seasons.

The D minor concerto is a delectable work, enshrining between its two typical allegros an adagio that opens with a stately sadness, passes in gently rhapsodic fashion to a mood of ineffable tenderness, and ends with a return of the melancholy hauteur.

The performance accorded the adagio on this occasion by Mr. Borovsky and the Boston strings was something to be treasured in the memory. Not only was it as exquisitely adjusted a piece of ensemble playing as one is likely ever to hear, but it was also instinct with the quiet exaltation, the profundity, the noble sensitiveness that are characteristic of Bach. Nor were Mr. Borovsky and the strings less successful with the allegros.

The Russian pianist furnished a conspicuous example of an accomplished and resourceful art exercised solely in the interest of music, without thought of personal display.

The evenness of the finger work, the faultlessly controlled shading, the discreet dynamic scale, the judicious employment of tone color all bespoke the intelligent and devoted student of Bach.

We have known Mr. Borovsky in certain modern compositions as a colossal technician. In his presentation of Bach he is as authentically, if less obviously, a mighty master of the keyboard, and at the same time he is a high priest of what is purest and loftiest in the tonal art.

Mr. Koussevitzky obtained also a memorable performance of the "Brandenburg" concerto, with its robust and jolly allegro moderato, its andante of an unearthly beauty, and its dazzling finale. In this work the soloists—Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and George Mager, trumpet—acquitted themselves admirably.

The rest of the concert was given over to the hard working C minor symphony of Brahms.

In Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon he will lead the Boston musicians in Bach's third orchestral suit, in D major; Bach's D minor concerto for two violins and string orchestra, and the "Fantastic" symphony of Hector Berlioz.

F major Brandenburg ...
D minor Piano Concerto, and to the C minor Symphony of Brahms.

The F major Brandenburg Concerto was given in its original form, with the trumpet part unaltered. The range of the music written for this instrument is extremely high; modern players find it difficult to perform accurately or with a clear tone. Last evening success did not attend the attempt of Georges Mager, first trumpeter of Mr. Koussewitsky's orchestra to negotiate it untransposed.

Alexander Borovsky appeared as soloist in the D minor Piano Concerto. His playing was distinguished by melodic and rhythmic clarity, by an admirable grasp of the style of the work in whose exposition he assisted. In both of the Bach Concertos, Mr. Koussewitsky's strings were heard to advantage; in skill, in the living character of the tone they produce, they continue to impress one as superior to the strings of other Eastern orchestras.

The Brahms Symphony will be played again under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction at the Academy of Music this evening. More may be said of its performance subsequent to this repetition.

E. C.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

APR 10 1931

MUSIC

Bach and Brahms Glorified.

By OLIN DOWNES.

A few years ago a program consisting entirely of music by Bach and Brahms would have been considered formidable. Last night such a program was given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, and enthusiasm was rife, reaching its climax after Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of Brahms's C minor symphony.

In their order, the compositions were Bach's Second "Brandenburg" concerto, with Mr. Burgin, concertmaster, and other superb virtuosos of the orchestra—Messrs. Laurent, flute; Gillet, oboe, and Mager, trumpet, for the solo parts; the Bach concerto for piano and orchestra in D minor, with Alexander Borovsky, pianist, as soloist of the occasion, and the Brahms symphony.

The performances of Bach were of a ravishing tonal beauty and a virtuosity placed entirely at the service of musical expression. And why not? For such purposes the concerti grossi of other days were planned. Each of the solo players in the orchestra gave his utmost to the enunciation of his phrases, while the tutti supplied background and mass treatment of the ideas. There was wonderful solo playing last night, when each leading player glorified his task. Mr. Mager's small trumpet proved admirably adapted to Bach's high tessitura and gave the trumpet passage a fine and brilliant tone of unique timbre. The concerto is really chamber music, and the number of Mr. Koussevitzky's players was even more modest than that prescribed by tradition. But thanks to the acoustics of the hall and the supreme art of the performance, Bach was given his whole due.

In turn Mr. Borowski played the piano part of the second concerto with a clearness, polish and feeling for Bach's which are rare. He has prodigious virtuoso and he is at home in music of the modernist type, which often presents very difficult technical problems. But Mr. Borowski played Bach with spontaneity and ease which bespoke not only a clear technical conscience but a profound musicality, taste and self-effacement which centred the audience's attention upon the music and not upon the soloist's personality and achievement. The audience saw to it, after the movement, that Mr. Borowski received due recognition. But Mr. Borowski, like his colleagues in the orchestra, like Mr. Koussevitzky wielding his baton, saw that the evening, or the first half of it, was Bach's. The occasion was worthy of the music.

When the Brahms symphony had ended there was rapturous applause and Mr. Koussevitzky was repeatedly called back to the stage. Granting these handsome acknowledgements of a final virtuoso performance, it remains that the symphony was interpreted in a highly inconsistent and erratic manner and that, so interpreted, it lost a considerable degree of its grandeur and rugged power. The first movement calls for more heroic and energetic moulding than it was given and the sentimental retard with which the coda was introduced did not help matters. In many places tempi were summarily altered, sometimes effectively, if the isolated passage was considered, but not with organic conception, if the great lines of the symphony are taken into consideration. The third movement was minimized, especially in the middle section, when there was a rapidity of tempo not called for in the score, which made the passage relatively inconsequential.

The treatment of the last movement was such that if Mr. Koussevitsky's unquestionable sincerity and great qualities as one of the leading virtuoso conductors now in this country were not known, he could have been suspected of sticking his tongue in his teeth, and endeavoring to disturb the bourgeoisie. The pace at which the broad theme of the movement proper, after the introduction, was taken, deprived it of its significance and precluded the accelerations which are clearly marked in the score to come later.

The last movement of this symphony is hard enough to make cohesive and unflagging under any circumstances. It became episodic, rhetorical patch-work. The music is so dramatic that under any circumstances it stirs an audience—the more so when a conductor of Mr. Koussevitzky's powers is in charge. And there were memorable places. Thus the famous horn passage of the introduction, played with a seraphic beauty of tone. When the chorale returned at the climax of the last movement it was reached with such breathless scramble that the orchestra could not play the notes clearly, and was thus played so slowly that for the moment it "held up the show." This was startling, impressive in its way. It was not, however, in line with the logic, the architecture, the coordinated development, hence ultimate effect of the movement.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN

APR 10 1931

Boston Symphony Plays Bach

Final Evening Concert of Series for This Season Is Given at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The final evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The famous orchestra has been lately holding a Bach festival in Boston, and naturally some of its choicest numbers had to be repeated here, two last evening and two reserved for tomorrow's matinee. The opening number was the Brandenburg concerto, No. 2, for violin, flute, oboe, trumpet and strings. There can be no great profit in heaping up exclamations of delight and praise whenever one of these old concerti is performed. But there could perhaps be some profit in discussing the difficulties which have beset conductors for many years in securing satisfactory performance.

Bach wrote trumpet parts in such a high register that most orchestral trumpeters of the nineteenth cenury could not play them. The problem was not solved by application of the knowledge that "clarin" players in Bach's day practiced only the highest notes of the trumpet, the lower tones being produced by other players. Nor were matters made any better by arrangements substituting other instruments for the trumpet. A German trumpeter invented a high Bach trumpet, which was used at the unveiling of the Bach statue in Eisenach in 1884, when Joachim conducted. But for some reason the old order was not changed and Bach concerti continued to be performed without the shrilling of the original clarion tones.

The Bach trumpet has recently come into use and there are instrument makers who specialize in their construction. The trumpet which Georges Mager used at last evening's performance was a short instrument with a small bore and a very high register. The thin piercing upper tones were probably close to those which were in Bach's mind when he created the composition. The trumpet dominated the concertino (as the group of solo instruments was called by the old masters) and gave the work a complex ier and orchestra. The solo player was Alexander Borovsky. In this music also there is usually, and was last evening, a departure from the original text of the composer. Cristofori's piano action was given to the world in 1711 and Bach died in 1750. He had no great fancy for the new instrument, which he condemned as heavy in touch and tone. His instruments were the clavichord and harpsichord, though the former was never suited to public ensemble performance. But Bach possessed in almost miraculous degree the prophetic soul. He wrote clavier music which went far beyond the powers of his instrument, as in the particular case of the imposing "Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue," which seems to attain its true stature only on a modern concert grand piano. So we hear the concertos now with piano and orchestra, and they come to us, when rightly played, as if made for our own time and means.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

It was fortunate that Mr. Borovsky was at the piano last evening, for he thoroughly immersed himself in the spirit and style of the music. His employment of tone and color was continent and his treatment of the melos and the polyphony of the concerto was respectful in feeling as well as thoroughly clear in outline. On the whole, it was an artistic performance and called forth very warm applause.

The concert came to a vigorous and stirring conclusion with a characteristic delivery of the first symphony of Brahms, which every one knows has long been dear to Mr. Koussevitzky's heart

In the World of Music

Boston Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Plays Fiftieth Anniversary Numbers

THE Brandenburg Bach, Brahms, Borovsky and the Boston Orchestra under the compelling baton of Serge Koussevitzky all share the praises for a concert which culminated last night in the finale of the mighty C minor symphony, even if in some degree the conductor seemed to be sacrificing coherence for the sake of dramatic effect and excitement. It was an admirable twentieth century concert of eighteenth and nineteenth century music, and the capacity audience in Carnegie Hall was properly enthusiastic.

If this period is not one of powerful achievement in composition of new music it surely must be granted that for New York, at any rate, it is a period of powerful interpretations by conductors gifted and diligent. When one hears the second Brandenburg concerto played with such a fresh charm as it had last night it is natural to wonder whether the concerto could have sounded so well in the composer's time. This delightful piece, written for a mere Prussian prince, is music fit for a king.

So buoyantly the bright measures of the first movement flowed last night. With such simple composure the Andante took its leisurely way. And the naive fancy in the airs of this Bach of chamber music proportions was carried with such grace by the solo players, Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Georges Mager, trumpet. Mr. Mager's work with his striking instrument was really a bit of wizardry.

As soloist for the Bach concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in D minor, Dr. Koussevitzky assuredly picked the right man. Alexander Borovsky, the Russian pianist who came to America to take part in the Bach festival given in Boston in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of this illustrious orchestra, displayed a most commendable taste and intelligence in his work of co-operation.

For it amounted to that. He played less as a soloist than as a partner with the orchestra in presenting the winning themes of Bach. He was so lucid, with a mind to the importance of giving every note its value and also of the continuity of phrase. His success in keeping his part of the concerto both conservative and ever interesting with its lively tunes and progressions would still have been impossible, of course, except for his fine physical control at the keyboard, and for his deftness and fluency.

He and Dr. Koussevitzky have reason to appreciate each other. From beginning to end this concerto was delightful and it came to a sparkling, rapid finish with that air of finality and completeness that is so characteristic of the compositions of grand old Johann Sebastian Bach. When he had something to say he said it and when it was said he stopped and that was the end of the matter.

Last night's audience was most impressed by the symphony. This was natural, for here conductor and orchestra achieved tonal effects of splendor. There was a majestic sweep about the playing and in the chorale whose power only Bach could match there was an impressive deliberation, and the horns came out with dignity. Any questioning of the conductor's reading here concerns matters of coherence and authenticity. It is possible to make Brahms thrilling with resonance and still lose that spacious serenity and nobility that place his first symphony on a height where comparison with other great symphonies is futile.

HENRY BECKETT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 10 1931

179

Koussevitzky Directs Boston Symphony Here

Capacity Audience at Carnegie Hall Hears Bach's 2d Brandenburg Concerto

Clavier Work Also Played

Borovsky Commended for Solo Work; Mager Praised

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra begain their fifth and last New York sojourn of the season last night with a concert in Carnegie Hall before a capacity audience. On his program Dr. Koussevitzky made no further disclosures of the new music which had been commissioned by the Bostonians for this season's home concerts, but offered Bach's second Brandenburg concerto and his clavier concerto in D minor and the first symphony of Brahms.

Both Bach numbers had been played in the orchestra's Bach festival in Boston last month, and last night's soloist, Alexander Borovsky, had come to America after some seasons' absence to take part in that festival. The Russian pianist, who had first been heard here in the fall of 1923, gave a conservative, highly skillful performance last night in the D Minor Concerto, clear in outline and detail, fluent and well proportioned, and received due ovation from the audience.

The soloists in the second Brandenburg Concerto were Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and Georges Mager, trumpet, who played with much virtuosity, especially Mr. Mager, who did remarkable work with the taxingly high-pitched passages assigned the solo trumpeter.

Much of the Brahms symphony was played with memorable eloquence, especially the first two movements, which received an interpretation of praiseworthy breadth and depth and poetic insight; the strings sang with an unusually full, mellow and expressive tone. The first proclamation by the horns of the melody in the introduction to the finale also offered moments of unusual imaginative potency, but in the main part of the movement Dr. Koussevitzky's tempi differed sometimes from those customarily adopted and not always with happy results. The acceleration of the broad main theme diminished, for us, its dignity and impressiveness, but the unusually deliberate tempo for the chorale-like passage for the close proved effective. Then the presto was resumed at a whirlwind pace, and the audience responded with warmly expressed enthusiasm and several recalls for the conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

APR 1931

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY brought the Boston Symphony orchestra to town for the last series of concerts of this, its fiftieth jubilee season, and its first concert of the trip was given last night before the usual crowd of devotees at Carnegie Hall.

The programme consisted entirely of the two great masters, Bach and Brahms, and climax was the deathless Brahms C Minor. The other numbers were Bach's Second ("Brandenburg") Concerto, with solo parts by members of the orchestra, and the Bach Concerto for piano and orchestra in D Minor, with Alexander Borovsky as piano soloist.

The audience responded with more enthusiasm than is usual even for followers of this great organization, and many were heard to say that the concert was the greatest ever given by the symphony.

To-night Dr. Koussevitzky brings his musicians to the Brooklyn Academy of Music and to-morrow the concert will be dealt with at greater length.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

APR 10 1931

MUSIC

Bach and Brahms Glorified.

By OLIN DOWNES.

A few years ago a program consisting entirely of music by Bach and Brahms would have been considered formidable. Last night such a program was given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, and enthusiasm was rife, reaching its climax after Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of Brahms's C minor symphony.

In their order, the compositions were Bach's Second "Brandenburg" concerto, with Mr. Burgin, concertmaster, and other superb virtuosos of the orchestra—Messrs. Laurent, flute; Gillet, oboe, and Mager, trumpet, for the solo parts; the Bach concerto for piano and orchestra in D minor, with Alexander Borovsky, pianist, as soloist of the occasion, and the Brahms symphony.

The performances of Bach were of a ravishing tonal beauty and a virtuosity placed entirely at the service of musical expression. And why not? For such purposes the concerti grossi of other days were planned. Each of the solo players in the orchestra gave his utmost to the enunciation of his phrases, while the tutti supplied background and mass treatment of the ideas. There was wonderful solo playing last night, when each leading player glorified his task. Mr. Mager's small trumpet proved admirably adapted to Bach's high tessitura and gave the trumpet passage a fine and brilliant tone of unique timbre. The concerto is really chamber music, and the number of Mr. Koussevitzky's players was even more modest than that prescribed by tradition. But thanks to the acoustics of the hall and the supreme art of the performance, Bach was given his whole due.

In turn Mr. Borowski played the piano part of the second concerto with a clearness, polish and feeling for Bach's which are rare. He has prodigious virtuoso and he is at home in music of the modernist type, which often presents very difficult technical problems. But Mr. Borowski played Bach with spontaneity and ease which bespoke not only a clear technical conscience but a profound musicality, taste and self-effacement which centred the audience's attention upon the music and not upon the soloist's personality and achievement. The audience saw to it, after the movement, that Mr. Borowski received due recognition. But Mr. Borowski, like his colleagues in the orchestra, like Mr. Koussevitzky wielding his baton, saw that the evening, or the first half of it, was Bach's. The occasion was worthy of the music.

When the Brahms symphony had ended there was rapturous applause and Mr. Koussevitzky was repeatedly called back to the stage. Granting these handsome acknowledgements of a final virtuoso performance, it remains that the symphony was interpreted in a highly inconsistent and erratic manner and that, so interpreted, it lost a considerable degree of its grandeur and rugged power. The first movement calls for more heroic and energetic moulding than it was given and the sentimental retard with which the coda was introduced did not help matters. In many places tempi were summarily altered, sometimes effectively, if the isolated passage was considered, but not with organic conception, if the great lines of the symphony are taken into consideration. The third movement was minimized, especially in the middle section, when there was a rapidity of tempo not called for in the score, which made the passage relatively inconsequential.

The treatment of the last movement was such that if Mr. Koussevitsky's unquestionable sincerity and great qualities as one of the leading virtuoso conductors now in this country were not known, he could have been suspected of sticking his tongue in his teeth, and endeavoring to disturb the bourgeoisie. The pace at which the broad theme of the movement proper, after the introduction, was taken, deprived it of its significance and precluded the accelerations which are clearly marked in the score to come later.

The last movement of this symphony is hard enough to make cohesive and unflagging under any circumstances. It became episodic, rhetorical patch-work. The music is so dramatic that under any circumstances it stirs an audience—the more so when a conductor of Mr. Koussevitzky's powers is in charge. And there were memorable places. Thus the famous horn passage of the introduction, played with a seraphic beauty of tone. When the chorale returned at the climax of the last movement it was reached with such breathless scramble that the orchestra could not play the notes clearly, and was thus played so slowly that for the moment it "held up the show." This was startling, impressive in its way. It was not, however, in line with the logic, the architecture, the coordinated development, hence ultimate effect of the movement.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN

APR 10 1931

Boston Symphony Plays Bach

Final Evening Concert of Series for This Season Is Given at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The final evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The famous orchestra has been lately holding a Bach festival in Boston, and naturally some of its choicest numbers had to be repeated here, two last evening and two reserved for tomorrow's matinee. The opening number was the Brandenburg concerto, No. 2, for violin, flute, oboe, trumpet and strings. There can be no great profit in heaping up exclamations of delight and praise whenever one of these old concerti is performed. But there could perhaps be some profit in discussing the difficulties which have beset conductors for many years in securing satisfactory performance.

Bach wrote trumpet parts in such a high register that most orchestral trumpeters of the nineteenth century could not play them. The problem was not solved by application of the knowledge that "clarin" players in Bach's day practiced only the highest notes of the trumpet, the lower tones being produced by other players. Nor were matters made any better by arrangements substituting other instruments for the trumpet. A German trumpeter invented a high Bach trumpet, which was used at the unveiling of the Bach statue in Eisenach in 1884, when Joachim conducted. But for some reason the old order was not changed and Bach concerti continued to be performed without the shrilling of the original clarion tones.

The Bach trumpet has recently come into use and there are instrument makers who specialize in their construction. The trumpet which Georges Mager used at last evening's performance was a short instrument with a small bore and a very high register. The thin piercing upper tones were probably close to those which were in Bach's mind when he created the composition. The trumpet dominated the concertino (as the group of solo instruments was called by the old masters) and gave the work a complexion somewhat different from that to which we were formerly accustomed. The work was excellently played and the audience signified its approval in unmistakable manner.

The second number on the list was Bach's concerto in D minor for clavier and orchestra. The solo player was Alexander Borovsky. In this music also there is usually, and was last evening, a departure from the original text of the composer. Cristofori's piano action was given to the world in 1711 and Bach died in 1750. He had no great fancy for the new instrument, which he condemned as heavy in touch and tone. His instruments were the clavichord and harpsichord, though the former was never suited to public ensemble performance. But Bach possessed in almost miraculous degree the prophetic soul. He wrote clavier music which went far beyond the powers of his instrument, as in the particular case of the imposing "Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue," which seems to attain its true stature only on a modern concert grand piano. So we hear the concertos now with piano and orchestra, and they come to us, when rightly played, as if made for our own time and means.

It was fortunate that Mr. Borovsky was at the piano last evening, for he thoroughly immersed himself in the spirit and style of the music. His employment of tone and color was continent and his treatment of the melos and the polyphony of the concerto was respectful in feeling as well as thoroughly clear in outline. On the whole, it was an artistic performance and called forth very warm applause.

The concert came to a vigorous and stirring conclusion with a characteristic delivery of the first symphony of Brahms, which every one knows has long been dear to Mr. Koussevitzky's heart.

Music

...sevitzky Plays Fiftieth Anni... Numbers

...under the compelling ... rge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra for a concert which culminated last night in the finale of the mighty C minor symphony, even if in some degree the conductor seemed to be sacrificing coherence for the sake of dramatic effect and excitement. It was an admirable twentieth century concert of eighteenth and nineteenth century music, and the capacity audience in Carnegie Hall was properly enthusiastic.

If this period is not one of powerful achievement in composition of new music it surely must be granted that for New York, at any rate, it is a period of powerful interpretations by conductors gifted and diligent. When one hears the second Brandenburg concerto played with such a fresh charm as it had last night it is natural to wonder whether the concerto could have sounded so well in the composer's time. This delightful piece, written for a mere Prussian prince, is music fit for a king.

So buoyantly the bright measures of the first movement flowed last night. With such simple composure the Andante took its leisurely way. And the naive fancy in the airs of this Bach of chamber music proportions was carried with such grace by the solo players, Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Georges Mager, trumpet. Mr. Mager's work with his striking instrument was really a bit of wizardry.

As soloist for the Bach concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in D minor, Dr. Koussevitzky assuredly picked the right man. Alexander Borovsky, the Russian pianist who came to America to take part in the Bach festival given in Boston in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of this illustrious orchestra, displayed a most commendable taste and intelligence in his work of co-operation.

For it amounted to that. He played less as a soloist than as a partner with the orchestra in presenting the winning themes of Bach. He was so lucid, with a mind to the importance of giving every note its value and also of the continuity of phrase. His success in keeping his part of the concerto both conservative and ever interesting with its lively tunes and progressions would still have been impossible, of course, except for his fine physical control at the keyboard, and for his deftness and fluency.

He and Dr. Koussevitzky have reason to appreciate each other. From beginning to end this concerto was delightful and it came to a sparkling, rapid finish with that air of finality and completeness that is so characteristic of the compositions of grand old Johann Sebastian Bach. When he had something to say he said it and when it was said he stopped and that was the end of the matter.

Last night's audience was most impressed by the symphony. This was natural, for here conductor and orchestra achieved tonal effects of splendor. There was a majestic sweep about the playing and in the chorale whose power only Bach could match there was an impressive deliberation, and the horns came out with dignity. Any questioning of the conductor's reading here concerns matters of coherence and authenticity. It is possible to make Brahms thrilling with resonance and still lose that spacious serenity and nobility that place his first symphony on a height where comparison with other great symphonies is futile.

HENRY BECKETT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 10 1931

179

Koussevitzky Directs Boston Symphony Here

Capacity Audience at Carnegie Hall Hears Bach's 2d Brandenburg Concerto

Clavier Work Also Played

Borovsky Commended for Solo Work; Mager Praised

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra begain their fifth and last New York sojourn of the season last night with a concert in Carnegie Hall before a capacity audience. On his program Dr. Koussevitzky made no further disclosures of the new music which had been commissioned by the Bostonians for this season's home concerts, but offered Bach's second Brandenburg concerto and his clavier concerto in D minor and the first symphony of Brahms.

Both Bach numbers had been played in the orchestra's Bach festival in Boston last month, and last night's soloist, Alexander Borovsky, had come to America after some seasons' absence to take part in that festival. The Russian pianist, who had first been heard here in the fall of 1923, gave a conservative, highly skillful performance last night in the D Minor Concerto, clear in outline and detail, fluent and well proportioned, and received due ovation from the audience.

The soloists in the second Brandenburg Concerto were Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and Georges Mager, trumpet, who played with much virtuosity, especially Mr. Mager, who did remarkable work with the taxingly high-pitched passages assigned the solo trumpeter.

Much of the Brahms symphony was played with memorable eloquence, especially the first two movements, which received an interpretation of praiseworthy breadth and depth and poetic insight; the strings sang with an unusually full, mellow and expressive tone. The first proclamation by the horns of the melody in the introduction to the finale also offered moments of unusual imaginative potency, but in the main part of the movement Dr. Koussevitzky's tempi differed sometimes from those customarily adopted and not always with happy results. The acceleration of the broad main theme diminished, for us, its dignity and impressiveness, but the unusually deliberate tempo for the chorale-like passage for the close proved effective. Then the presto was resumed at a whirlwind pace, and the audience responded with warmly expressed enthusiasm and several recalls for the conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

...R 1931

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY brought the Boston Symphony orchestra to town for the last series of concerts of this, its fiftieth jubilee season, and its first concert of the trip was given last night before the usual crowd of devotees at Carnegie Hall.

The programme consisted entirely of the two great masters, Bach and Brahms, and climax was the deathless Brahms C Minor. The other numbers were Bach's Second ("Brandenburg") Concerto, with solo parts by members of the orchestra, and the Bach Concerto for piano and orchestra in D Minor, with Alexander Borovsky as piano soloist.

The audience responded with more enthusiasm than is usual even for followers of this great organization, and many were heard to say that the concert was the greatest ever given by the symphony.

To-night Dr. Koussevitzky brings his musicians to the Brooklyn Academy of Music and to-morrow the concert will be dealt with at greater length.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 10 1931

IN TERMS OF MUSIC,
Comment in Season

Season's Last Program by Boston Symphony Orchestra Deemed Built of Worthy Favorites Contrasting in Temper.—Bach Suite Recalls Recent Festival

It would be difficult to imagine a more interesting or fascinating program than that which is to be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening at the Albee Theatre. The Brahms, Debussy and Mendelssohn numbers are great favorites but worthy of endless repetitions because of their great musical merit. The Bach Suite is not so well known when played in its entirety, yet the different movements are more frequently played as short concert numbers.

Dr. Koussevitsky has shown his liking for Bach in many ways during the past few seasons. This particular interest and ability reached its climax during the "Bach Festival" held in Boston some weeks ago when seven concerts composed entirely of the works of Bach were played to crowded houses. In these concerts both conductor and orchestra not only praised Bach but also praised themselves. The most important of the offerings of the Festival were the famous "Magnificat" and the "Mass in B-minor" which were given with a chorus of 400 voices, a distinguished quartet and the entire Symphony Orchestra. With this recent preparation and experience the orchestra is sure to be Bach-minded, and the Suite will be entirely correct in traditional idiom.

Much of the music of this Suite is charmingly simple. It is not the Bach of thunderous majesty and massive chords but the Bach of the smooth and gently flowing melodies, of the fields and sylvan glades rather than of the cathedral and the concert hall. This is shown particularly in the celebrated aria for the G-string, one of the most played compositions of Bach and a test of fine violin artistry. The opportunities for refinements of rubato and nuance in this beautiful movement are many. The Gavotte and Bourre, which are also familiar, offer further opportunities for fine, rich string tone.

After this delightful suite, the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" of Debussy comes in a most remarkable contrast. The 200 years that separate these two composers do not represent differences of musical thought for Debussy, although of our time, did not write in the idiom of his day. Instead he worked with the same disregard for time and custom as did Bach and Wagner in their ages and periods. The spirit spake to them in another language, one which as yet is not well understood but which with continued study reveals hidden beauties and new interests.

Musical evolution like progress in other things has times when its art progresses with unexpected rapidity, leaving imprints and influences that have tremendous effects upon the future. Debussy was such a composer. Capable of showing in the same composition and almost upon the same page phrases of exquisite beauty and "modernistic" absurdity, he also wrote musical gems of the finest melodic invention and tone coloring like this. "Prelude" and his String Quartet, in which not a bar of music offensive to the ear can be found.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Bach
Suite for orchestra, No. 3, in D-major
I. Overture
II. Air
III. Gavotte I, Gavotte II
IV. Bourree
V. Gigue

Debussy—
"Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune (Eglogue de S. Mallarme)"
(Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun) (Eclogue by S. Mallarme)

Mendelssohn
From the Incidental Music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"
Scherzo, Allegro vivace.

Brahms
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

Those who deny musical merit to anything "modern" will find this "Prelude" of the greatest interest, for it contains some of the most beautiful thoughts to be found in the entire literature of music. It is not the invocation of the "whole toned scale" that makes this work famous, it is rather the combination of this mode with ingenuity of composition and the devising of absolutely novel combinations of tone color in instrumentation. These accomplish the marvellous atmospheric effects that makes this short piece one of the most beautiful of our time.

Had Debussy written only this, it would still stand as a remarkable composition and one which more than any other has had a profound influence on contemporaneous and futuristic music. The unrivalled wood wind choir of the orchestra is certain to give a most satisfactory and poetic interpretation of this beautiful work, as it has in years past.

A number of times this reviewer has lamented the absence of Mendelssohn from concert programs and wondered why vocalists, pianists, quartets and orchestras have allowed his memory to fade and our recollections of his works to cloud. Constant communion with great masters old and new confirm the delights of this fine melodist.

It will be like meeting an old friend to hear again the glittering, rippling and smoothly flowing phrases of this Scherzo which has been heard much of late, more or less well played, upon the radio. To play this number with the "vivace" directed by the composer requires an agility and a clarity of articulation that only a virtuoso orchestra can accomplish.

To many people the first symphony of Brahms is his greatest symphony; to others it is the greatest of all symphonies. The growing appreciation of Brahms is astonishing. Never has there been the acrimony and whole-hearted opposition to Brahms that there was to the works of Richard Wagner, yet at one time both critics and other laymen had scant praise for either. It is a testimony to popular intelligence and culture that these works are now so much admired and that concerts of his works are so well attended.

This Brahms symphony is a veritable collection of beautiful melodic and harmonic figures, joined by the choicest of modulations and configurations. It abounds in haunting melodies, in striking effects and in the development of simple material into the richest of musical fabrics. Much interest has of late been occasioned by the resemblance between the "horn motive" in the last movement of the symphony and the well-known "Westminster Chimes." There are many phrases in Brahms which show similarities with thoughts of other composers, notably Cherubini and Beethoven. Remarkable in the first place, they are made even more impressive and enduring by Brahms.

In this superb symphony the attention is not allowed to lag an instant. It glitters, it surges, it romps and then lapses into profoundly serious moods. Not yet have its themes and phrases been ticketed with poetic labels by sentimental analysts, yet this beautiful tone poem would not be made less interesting for them.

This concert is a fitting climax for the season's superb performances of interesting programs. While we congratulate ourselves upon our good fortune to hear these concerts, few as they have been, we regret that the capacity of the auditorium has prevented hundreds from sharing our very great pleasure.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

(Dr. Chapman will give the last of his series of concert appreciation talks Sunday afternoon in the children's room of the Providence Public Library. Beginning at 4 o'clock he will consider in detail the numbers to be played at the Boston Symphony concert, illustrating his discussion by playing the important themes on the piano and other instruments. His talk, as were the previous

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 11 1931

Music of the Day

LAST evening at the Academy of Music Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra chose to conclude their Brooklyn season with a performance of Brahms' C minor Symphony. It was, from one point of view, an appropriate, happy choice—for little music has been written in the symphonic form which exceeds in stature, in nobility of thought and eloquence of expression, this unique masterpiece.

* * * *

Mr. Koussewitsky, however, is not an ideal interpreter of the music of Brahms. He has for it, we may believe, a profound and passionate admiration; to this his frequent performances of one or another of the four symphonies offer irrefutable testimony. But his love for these works is greater than his understanding of them. Mr. Koussewitsky has never convinced us that he grasps Brahms' thought, Brahms' style. He does not see the symphonies steadily or see them whole. As their interpreter, his interest is centered in the detail of these scores; his vision does not embrace the vast architectonic of their design; his eye regards them too closely, achieves no perspective upon them.

* * *

This is typical of Mr. Koussewitsky. His feeling is for detail of design, for minor felicities of phrase, of color, for "effects" of one sort or another. Thus he is an admirable conductor of much 18th-Century music and of much modern music, whichhave characteristics of finesse and subtlety in common—he is a master of arabesque, a colorist of the first rank. But these are not qualities pre-eminently requisite tin an inerpreter of Beethoven, of Brahms.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky's reading of the C minor Symphony lacked breadth and dignity of style. It was finickal, often incoherent. The conductor's choice of tempi, especially in the first and last movements, was often unjustified by the indications of the composer and the character of the music; moreover, the relations of these tempi to one another were often inharmonious, unbalanced. Not for a moment is Mr. Koussewitsky to be charged with deliberate eccentricity—he is too serious and earnest an artist for this to be conceivable. From another, however, his reading of the C minor Symphony might have seemed affected, insincere. Details here and there were happily treated; the Andante was expressively modeled, the scherzo gracefully played. But as a whole the performance, misrepresenting the character of the music, was a failure.

* * *

Earlier in the evening Mr. Koussewitsky read a Haydn Symphony in D (No. 10 in Haertel's catalogue) far more sympathetically. The playing of this music, spirited, tender, was captivating. And the accompaniment of the Bach D minor Concerto for Two Viloins found in Mr. Koussewitsky an understanding interpreter. The soloists in the latter, Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, were members of the orchestra—first desk men of, respectively, the first and second violins. Their playing was virtuose, musicianly, admirable in its grasp of the spiritand the style of Bach's music.

* * *

A large audience attended the concert, the last of the five which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this season as in the past, has given at the Academy, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY TUESDAY NIGHT

The final Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Providence this season will be held at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday night. It will mark the close of the orchestra's 50th anniversary season.

For the coming concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, announces the following program: Bach's Suite in D Major, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Mendelssohn's Scherzo to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" and Brahm's First Symphony in C Minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

April 11 1931

1931

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

KOUSSEVITZKY'S FAREWELL

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, in the fifth and final Brooklyn concert of the current season, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, selected the majestic and overwhelmingly beautiful Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C Minor for his farewell to his local admirers, and a packed house responded by giving the great Russian maestro a deserved ovation.

It was a fitting climax to a memorable season, the glorious music of the great German thundering to its close before a rapt and enchanted audience who were there to revel in great music greatly played.

The programme likewise included a Hadyn and a Bach number, the maestro being content to sing his season's farewell with the greatest of the classics rather than venturing forth with the moderns, as he has done on previous occasions. The fiftieth anniversary of the founding of this great orchestra having been celebrated in Boston with a magnificent Bach festival, Dr. Koussevitzky could do nothing less than close with the Titans of the classical period.

The Haydn number was the beautiful Symphony in D Major, played largely with the strings. It is a composition that can be described only as being ineffably sweet. In such music, in the opinion of this reviewer, the orchestra was at its very best, soft and lovely music being its metier rather than thundering Brahms and Beethoven and Wagner—although even in the latter the band is among the world's greatest.

Bach was represented by the historic Concerto in D Minor, scored for and played by two violins and a portion of the string sections. The soloists were Richard Burgin, the talented concertmaster of the orchestra, and Julius Theodorowicz. Their playing was superb in the first and third movements, the Vivace and the Allegro, but in our opinion they seemed to lose interest in the second movement, the Largo, and merely marked time, waiting for the section to come to an end. In justice to them, however, it must be reported that the applause at the close of that movement was as rapturous as at the close of the first and of the number as a whole.

The Brahms symphony is to our mind—at this moment—one of the greatest compositions in existence. It has that effect upon hearers. For a long time after hearing it, it is hard to imagine anything as great. And it was played magnificently.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 11 1931

MUSIC

BOSTON SERIES ENDS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted his Boston Symphony Orchestra through the last of their five-concert series in the Academy of Music last night, and at the end of a beautifully interpreted program of Haydn, Bach and Brahms, the audience, grateful for past and present favors, applauded the great leader and his band of virtuosi to an echo.

The program opened with Haydn's Symphony in D Major. The second piece was Bach's Concerto in D Minor for two violins and string orchestra. The concert closed with Brahm's Symphony No. 1 in C Minor Opus 68.

The lovely tone in the violin sections of M. Koussevitzky's orchestra was never more evident than in last night's rendition of the Haydn symphony. The third movement (minuetto) brought out the precision in these same sections.

In the Bach concerto, the soloists, Richard Burgin, concert-master, and Julius Theodorowicz, his desk-mate, played with fine fluency and command, while a restrained orchestra supported them, sympathetic in tone and flow.

The full orchestra appeared on the platform for the only time during the evening for the Brahms symphony, the last piece and a worthy climax to a memorable evening. Here the sweep of this fine band showed itself through every movement. Brooklyn, long a debtor of Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians, did well to recall him to

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 11 1931

Boston Symphony

The 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now drawing toward its close, has proved one of the most eventful in the illustrious history of the famous organization. The Symphony concert next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre will close the Providence series. The orchestra is likewist completing its New York concerts today.

For the final Providence concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces a programme of engrossing beauty and brilliance. It will begin with Bach's Suite in D major, one of the outstanding pieces played in the recent Bach Festival which was given by this orchestra in Boston last month. Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" will likewise be played, and to end the first part of the programme, Mendelssohn's Scherzo to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." This little musical classic suggests the fairylike theme of the play. The concert and the season will end with Brahm's First Symphony in C minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

APR 11 1931

FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT NEXT TUESDAY NIGHT

The 50th anniversary season of the Boston symphony orchestra now drawing towards it close has proved one of the most eventful in the organization's history. The symphony concert next Tuesday evening in the Albe theatre will close the Providence series. The orchestra is completing its New York concerts today.

he platform many times at the cert, nclusion of this program. 's a program of beauty and brilliance. It will begin with Bach's suite in D major, one of the outstandng pieces played in the recent Bach festival which was given by the orchestra in Boston last month. Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" will likewise be played, and to end the first part of the program, Mendelssohn's scherzo to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." This little musical classic suggests the fairy-like theme of the play. The concert and the season will end with Brahms first symphony in C minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

IN TERMS OF MUSIC,
Comment in Season

Season's Last Program by Boston Symphony Orchestra Deemed Built of Worthy Favorites Contrasting in Temper.—Bach Suite Recalls Recent Festival

It would be difficult to imagine a more interesting or fascinating program than that which is to be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening at the Albee Theatre. The Brahms, Debussy and Mendelssohn numbers are great favorites but worthy of endless repetitions because of their great musical merit. The Bach Suite is not so well known when played in its entirety, yet the different movements are more frequently played as short concert numbers.

Dr. Koussevitsky has shown his liking for Bach in many ways during the past few seasons. This particular interest and ability reached its climax during the "Bach Festival" held in Boston some weeks ago when seven concerts composed entirely of the works of Bach were played to crowded houses. In these concerts both conductor and orchestra not only praised Bach but also praised themselves. The most important of the offerings of the Festival were the famous "Magnificat" and the "Mass in B-minor" which were given with a chorus of 400 voices, a distinguished quartet and the entire Symphony Orchestra. With this recent preparation and experience the orchestra is sure to be Bach-minded, and the Suite will be entirely correct in traditional idiom.

Much of the music of this Suite is charmingly simple. It is not the Bach of thunderous majesty and massive chords but the Bach of the smooth and gently flowing melodies, of the fields and sylvan glades rather than of the cathedral and the concert hall. This is shown particularly in the celebrated air for the G-string, one of the most played compositions of Bach and a test of fine violin artistry. The opportunities for refinements of rubato and nuance in this beautiful movement are many. The Gavotte and Bourre, which are also familiar, offer further opportunities for fine, rich string tone.

After this delightful suite, the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" of Debussy comes in a most remarkable contrast. The 200 years that separate these two composers do not represent differences of musical thought, for Debussy, although of our time, did not write in the idiom of his day. Instead he worked with the same disregard for time and custom as did Bach and Wagner in their ages and periods. The spirit spake to them in another language, one which as yet is not well understood but which with continued study reveals hidden beauties and new interests.

Musical evolution like progress in other things has times when its art progresses with unexpected rapidity, leaving imprints and influences that have tremendous effects upon the future. Debussy was such a composer. Capable of showing in the same composition and almost upon the same page phrases of

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Bach
Suite for orchestra, No. 3, in D-major
I. Overture
II. Air
III. Gavotte I, Gavotte II
IV. Bourree
V. Gigue

Debussy
"Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune (Eglogue de S. Mallarme)"
(Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun) (Eclogue by S. Mallarme)

Mendelssohn
From the Incidental Music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"
Scherzo, Allegro vivace.

Brahms
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

exquisite beauty and "modernistic" absurdity, he also wrote musical gems of the finest melodic invention and tone coloring like this, "Prelude" and his String Quartet, in which not a bar of music offensive to the ear can be found.

Those who deny musical merit to anything "modern" will find this "Prelude" of the greatest interest, for it contains some of the most beautiful thoughts to be found in the entire literature of music. It is not the invocation of the "whole toned scale" that makes this work famous, it is rather the combination of this mode with ingenuity of composition and the devising of absolutely novel combinations of tone color in instrumentation. These accomplish the marvellous atmospheric effects that makes this short piece one of the most beautiful of our time.

Had Debussy written only this, it would still stand as a remarkable composition and one which more than any other has had a profound influence on contemporaneous and futuristic music. The unrivalled wood wind choir of the orchestra is certain to give a most satisfactory and poetic interpretation of this beautiful work, as it has in years past.

A number of times this reviewer has lamented the absence of Mendelssohn from concert programs and wondered why vocalists, pianists, quartets and orchestras have allowed his memory to fade and our recollections of his works to cloud. Constant communion with great masters old and new confirm the delights of this fine melodist.

It will be like meeting an old friend to hear again the glittering, rippling and smoothly flowing phrases of this Scherzo which has been heard much of late, more or less well played, upon the radio. To play this number with the "vivace" directed by the composer requires an agility and a clarity of articulation that only a virtuoso orchestra can accomplish.

To many people the first symphony of Brahms is his greatest symphony; to others it is the greatest of all symphonies. The growing appreciation of Brahms is astonishing. Never has there been the acrimony and whole-hearted opposition to Brahms that there was to the works of Richard Wagner, yet at one time both critics and other laymen had scant praise for either. It is a testimony to popular intelligence and culture that these works are now so much admired and that concerts of his works are so well attended.

This Brahms symphony is a veritable collection of beautiful melodic and harmonic figures, joined by the choicest of modulations and configurations. It abounds in haunting melodies, in striking effects and in the development of simple material into the richest of musical fabrics. Much interest has of late been occasioned by the resemblance between the "horn motive" in the last movement of the symphony and the well-known "Westminster Chimes." There are many phrases in Brahms which show similarities with thoughts of other composers, notably Cherubini and Beethoven. Remarkable in the first place, they are made even more impressive and enduring by Brahms.

In this superb symphony the attention is not allowed to lag an instant. It glitters, it surges, it romps and then lapses into profoundly serious moods. Not yet have its themes and phrases been ticketed with poetic labels by sentimental analysts, yet this beautiful tone poem would not be made less interesting for them.

This concert is a fitting climax for the season's superb performances of interesting programs. While we congratulate ourselves upon our good fortune to hear these concerts, few as they have been, we regret that the capacity of the auditorium has prevented hundreds from sharing our very great pleasure.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

(Dr. Chapman will give the last of his series of concert appreciation talks Sunday afternoon in the children's room of the Providence Public Library. Beginning at 4 o'clock he will consider in detail the numbers to be played at the Boston Symphony concert, illustrating his discussion by playing the important themes on the piano and other instruments. His talk, as were the previous

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Music of the Day

LAST evening at the Academy of Music Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra chose to conclude their Brooklyn season with a performance of Brahms' C minor Symphony. It was, from one point of view, an appropriate, happy choice—for little music has been written in the symphonic form which exceeds in stature, in nobility of thought and eloquence of expression, this unique masterpiece.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky, however, is not an ideal interpreter of the music of Brahms. He has for it, we may believe, a profound and passionate admiration; to this his frequent performances of one or another of the four symphonies offer irrefutable testimony. But his love for these works is greater than his understanding of them. Mr. Koussewitsky has never convinced us that he grasps Brahms' thought, Brahms' style. He does not see the symphonies steadily or see them whole. As their interpreter, his interest is centered in the detail of these scores; his vision does not embrace the vast architectonic of their design; his eye regards them too closely, achieves no perspective upon them.

* * *

This is typical of Mr. Koussewitsky. His feeling is for detail of design, for minor felicities of phrase, of color, for "effects" of one sort or another. Thus he is an admirable conductor of much 18th-Century music and of much modern music, whichhave characteristics of finesse and subtlety in common—he is a master of arabesque, a colorist of the first rank. But these are not qualities pre-eminently requisite tin an inerpreter of Beethoven, of Brahms.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky's reading of the C minor Symphony lacked breadth and dignity of style. It was finickal, often incoherent. The conductor's choice of tempi, especially in the first and last movements, was often unjustified by the indications of the composer and the character of the music; moreover, the relations of these tempi to one another were often inharmonious, unbalanced. Not for a moment is Mr. Koussewitsky to be charged with deliberate eccentricity—he is too serious and earnest an artist for this to be conceivable. From another, however, his reading of the C minor Symphony might have seemed affected, insincere. Details here and there were happily treated; the Andante was expressively modeled, the scherzo gracefully played. But as a whole the performance, misrepresenting the character of the music, was a failure.

* * *

Earlier in the evening Mr. Koussewitsky read a Haydn Symphony in D (No. 10 in Haertel's catalogue) far more sympathetically. The playing of this music, spirited, tender, was captivating. And the accompaniment of the Bach D minor Concerto for Two Viloins found in Mr. Koussewitsky an understanding interpreter. The soloists in the latter, Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, were members of the orchestra—first desk men of, respectively, the first and second violins. Their playing was virtuose, musicianly, admirable in its grasp of the spiritand the style of Bach's music.

* * *

A large audience attended the concert, the last of the five which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this season as in the past, has given at the Academy, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY TUESDAY NIGHT

The final Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Providence this season will be held at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday night. It will mark the close of the orchestra's 50th anniversary season.

For the coming concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, announces the following program: Bach's Suite in D Major, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun." Mendelssohn's Scherzo to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" and Brahm's First Symphony in C Minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

KOUSSEVITZKY'S FAREWELL

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, in the fifth and final Brooklyn concert of the current season, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, selected the majestic and overwhelmingly beautiful Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C Minor for his farewell to his local admirers, and a packed house responded by giving the great Russian maestro a deserved ovation.

It was a fitting climax to a memorable season, the glorious music of the great German thundering to its close before a rapt and enchanted audience who were there to revel in great music greatly played.

The programme likewise included a Hadyn and a Bach number, the maestro being content to sing his season's farewell with the greatest of the classics rather than venturing forth with the moderns, as he has done on previous occasions. The fiftieth anniversary of the founding of this great orchestra having been celebrated in Boston with a magnificent Bach festival, Dr. Koussevitzky could do nothing less than close with the Titans of the classical period.

The Haydn number was the beautiful Symphony in D Major, played largely with the strings. It is a composition that can be described only as being ineffably sweet. In such music, in the opinion of this reviewer, the orchestra was at its very best, soft and lovely music being its metier rather than thundering Brahms and Beethoven and Wagner—although even in the latter the band is among the world's greatest.

Bach was represented by the historic Concerto in D Minor, scored for and played by two violins and a portion of the string sections. The soloists were Richard Burgin, the talented concertmaster of the orchestra, and Julius Theodorowicz. Their playing was superb in the first and third movements, the Vivace and the Allegro, but in our opinion they seemed to lose interest in the second movement, the Largo, and merely marked time, waiting for the section to come to an end. In justice to them, however, it must be reported that the applause at the close of that movement was as rapturous as at the close of the first and of the number as a whole.

The Brahms symphony is to our mind—at this moment—one of the greatest compositions in existence. It has that effect upon hearers. For a long time after hearing it, it is hard to imagine anything as great. And it was played magnificently.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

MUSIC

BOSTON SERIES ENDS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted his Boston Symphony Orchestra through the last of their five-concert series in the Academy of Music last night, and at the end of a beautifully interpreted program of Haydn, Bach and Brahms, the audience, grateful for past and present favors, applauded the great leader and his band of virtuosi to an echo.

The program opened with Haydn's Symphony in D Major. The second piece was Bach's Concerto in D Minor for two violins and string orchestra. The concert closed with Brahm's Symphony No. 1 in C Minor Opus 68.

The lovely tone in the violin sections of M. Koussevitzky's orchestra was never more evident than in last night's rendition of the Haydn symphony. The third movement (minuetto) brought out the precision in these same sections.

In the Bach concerto, the soloists, Richard Burgin, concert-master, and Julius Theodorowicz, his desk-mate, played with fine fluency and command, while a restrained orchestra supported them, sympathetic in tone and flow.

The full orchestra appeared on the platform for the only time during the evening for the Brahms symphony, the last piece and a worthy climax to a memorable evening. Here the sweep of this fine band showed itself through every movement. Brooklyn, long a debtor of Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians, did well to recall him to

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

Boston Symphony

The 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now drawing toward its close, has proved one of the most eventful in the illustrious history of the famous organization. The Symphony concert next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre will close the Providence series. The orchestra is likewist completing its New York concerts today.

For the final Providence concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces a programme of engrossing beauty and brilliance. It will begin with Bach's Suite in D major, one of the outstanding pieces played in the recent Bach Festival which was given by this orchestra in Boston last month. Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" will likewise be played, and to end the first part of the programme, Mendelssohn's Scherzo to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." This little musical classic suggests the fairy-like theme of the play. The concert and the season will end with Brahm's First Symphony in C minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT NEXT TUESDAY NIGHT

The 50th anniversary season of the Boston symphony orchestra now drawing towards it close has proved one of the most eventful in the organization's history. The symphony concert next Tuesday evening in the Albe theatre will close the Providence series. The orchestra is completing its New York concerts today.

For the final Providence concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces a program of beauty and brilliance. It will begin with Bach's suite in D major, one of the outstanding pieces played in the recent Bach festival which was given by the orchestra in Boston last month. Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" will likewise be played, and to end the first part of the program, Mendelssohn's scherzo to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." This little musical classic suggests the fairy-like theme of the play. The concert and the season will end with Brahms first symphony in C minor.

Les funérailles du printemps

Mourir au printemps, à son printemps, pour épargner des printemps à venir.

Mourir à vingt-trois ans, en avril, à vingt-trois ans, en Touraine, au plus bel âge, au plus beau mois, en la plus belle des provinces françaises.

Mourir d'avoir voulu montrer des images à des enfants et, les images ayant pris feu, d'avoir, très simplement, gardé toute la flamme pour soi.

D'avoir sur soi concentré la flamme ; de l'avoir, sur son cœur, serrée de ses deux mains carbonisées, pour ne pas effrayer les enfants à qui l'on apportait des images.

Avoir fait cela, à vingt-trois ans, en avril. En être mort.

C'est un beau sort, c'est un sort sublime et révoltant, c'est un sort difficile à admettre et difficile à porter.

C'est celui dont les dieux jugèrent qu'était digne Stéphane Pitard, instituteur à Châteaurenault, Indre-et-Loire.

Nous sommes d'un pays où les bûchers naissent des rayons. Et un geste qui consume, nous le saluons, s'il éclaire.

On peut me reprocher de n'être pas assidu aux arrivées tonitruantes de stars tout en cils, de déléguer des collaborateurs aux banquets des étoiles...

On ne saurait être partout où se rencontre la cinématographie : j'étais sur la tombe d'un grand garçon mort dans les flammes, parmi les petits garçons dont il avait la charge.

Il avait arraché la pellicule incandescente pour la jeter hors de la salle. Mais pour parvenir à la porte, il eût fallu traverser des rangs d'enfants, avec cet incendie dans les bras. Il rentra donc dans la cabine, afin que la flamme ne dévorât que lui... Simplement, à la française.

Monsieur l'inspecteur d'académie, vous avez

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
1931

MUSIC NO

Serge Koussevitsky Leads Final Concert of Season

Bach, Debussy, Mendelssohn and Brahms on Closing Program of Local Series.—Verdandi Male Chorus in Anniversary Recital Today

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is playing its farewell concert for the season here this week, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting a program of works by Bach, Debussy, Mendelssohn and Brahms. The customary Sunday lecture on the numbers to be played will be given by Dr. W. Louis Chapman in the Providence Public Library this afternoon at 4 o'clock under the auspices of the Monday Musical Club. The lecture is free to the public. Also for this afternoon is a concert by the Verdandi Male Chorus, with a number of recitals by soloists and clubs to follow during the week.

Serge Koussevitzky
Conducts final concert of Boston Symphony's Providence season Tuesday night in Albee Theatre.

VERDANDI CONCERT
SYMPHONY'S FINAL CONCERT TUESDAY

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are saying farewell to Providence for the season on Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre with a program which opens with Bach's Suite for Orchestra, No. 3, in D-Major, repeated from the Boston Symphony's Bach Festival of last month. The movements are: Overture, Air, Gavotte I, Gavotte II, Bourree, Gigue. The program opens at 8:15 o'clock.

Thereafter will come the following numbers upon which Warren Storey Smith comments elsewhere in this section: "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" (eclogue by S. Mallarme), Debussy; Incidental Music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," Scherzo, Allegro vivace, Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 1 in C-minor, opus 68, Brahms, Un poco sostenuto, allegro; Andante sostenuto, Un poco allegretto e grazioso, Adagio, Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

The Boston Symphony is now nearing the close of its 50th anniversary season, which has proved in many ways the most eventful of its history. It has been marked by a Beethoven Festival in Washington last December, a Bach Festival in Boston and a number of scores by some of the greatest living composers, dedicated to the orchestra's anniversary, and first performed in Boston. The orchestra ended its New York season yesterday afternoon.

A new book is to be published as the culminating feature of the half-century season. This book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," will consist of a re-publication of the book by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, which was brought out in 1914. To this have been added new chapters relating the fortunes of the great organization through the ensuing 17 years. The last seasons under Dr. Muck, the era of the two French conductors and the achievements of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky are recorded. New and full appendices will include a complete list of the music played at the regular concerts, giving the dates of performances. The soloists and the personnel through 50 years are also recorded and an address on Henry Lee Higginson made by Bliss Perry at the Bach Festival, March 25. This book is to be offered at a special reduced price to patrons of the symphony concerts.

DENVER, COLO.
POST
APR 12 1931

Boston Honors Birthday Of Its Symphony Backer

Maj. Henry Lee Higginson Spent Fortune Keeping Alive Musical Organization Which Brought Fame and Honor to His City.

(By JOHN C. WILCOX.)

LAST week the citizens of Boston participated in a six-day music festival to celebrate the fiftieth birthday of their famous symphony orchestra. The program took the form of a Bach festival, featuring two performances of the great B-minor mass, which Conductor Koussevitzky prepared with meticulous care and which called into co-operation the orchestra, a large choral body and famous soloists.

But the significant feature of the festal week was, after all, its tribute to the memory of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, who founded the Boston Symphony orchestra half a century ago, and paid its lusty deficits from his private funds during forty years thereafter.

John C. Wilcox.

Older residents of Boston probably needed no reminder of their obligation to Major Higginson, who, in creating the symphony orchestra and providing funds for its maintenance, had so enriched their lives; but it was fitting that one session of last week's festival should be devoted to publicly honoring his memory. The bust of Major Higginson, which ordinarily stands in the lobby of Symphony hall, was set on the stage in the center of a floral display, and his aged widow—now in her ninety-third year—occupied a chair beside it, while Prof. Bliss Perry of Harvard and President Hadley of Yale paid tribute to the orchestra's founder and benefactor. In their remark it was brought out that Major Higginson was not, as commonly supposed, so rich a man that his huge contributions to the orchestra entailed no serious burden upon him. On the contrary, he twice failed in business, and as late as 1914, when he was in his eightieth year, his generosities carried him so near to bankruptcy that his brother, Francis Lee Higginson, anonymously took over the burden of the orchestra.

MADE A NAME FOR HIS CITY.

Comparatively few men of wealth are moved to devote to the nurture of cultural projects such vast sums as Major Higginson bestowed upon the Boston Symphony orchestra. Most capitalists, learning how deeply his benefactions in that direction drained his personal resources, doubtless would vote him a visionary and impractical man. But what other Boston citizen has, in the use of wealth or talents, created and fostered any project that has enriched the community and national life, earned renown for the city and gratitude for its sponsor, to an equal degree with Major Higginson's orchestra?

Is it not likely that Major Higginson's aged widow, contemplating the far-reaching and joy-giving results of his gifts to the Boston Symphony orchestra, is more grateful for his vision and generosity in this enterprise than she would be for a larger personal inheritance from his wealth?

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
APR 12 1931

New Records Merit Place in Music Library

'Pictures at an Exhibition' by Boston Symphony.

By Edward Moore.

"PICTURES AT AN EXHIBITION" is a set of records that should not be missed by the one who is building up a library of the better class of disks. In Victor's Musical Masterpieces, it fully deserves its name. The album number is M-102.

This is a suite originally composed for piano by Modest Petrovich Moussorgsky, one of the most original musicians who ever lived, some sixty years ago, then taken in hand about eight years ago by that great master of orchestration, Maurice Ravel, and transcribed for orchestra at the request of Serge Koussevitzky. It was first conducted by Koussevitzky in Paris May 3, 1923, and Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony orchestra presents it now in recorded form. Those who live in Chicago will remember that the set has been played a few times by Dr. Stock and the Chicago Symphony orchestra.

* *

Excellent Recording.

Koussevitzky and his band have made some good recordings in the past; this is one of the best. The character of the piece is indicated by its title. Moussorgsky sought to put into music the impressions made by a gallery exhibition of water colors and drawings by his deceased friend, Victor Hartmann. Generally, he has kept within the true province of music, that of suggesting without portraying. At least once, however, in the section named "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," he has become positively pictorial. It is a lively bit of humorous caricature, and its humor is deftly established in the orchestration. But the work as a whole is one of the most notable pieces of music that have come to us.

Seven sides are employed in the recording. The eighth is also Ravel-Koussevitzky-Boston. It is Ravel's orchestration of Debussy's "Sarabande."

Boston Symphony to Offer Popular Bach Composition

Suite in D-Major Best Known of His Larger Instrumental Works, Says Commentator.—Other Items of Coming Concert Program Described.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not long ago the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered as the chief event of its 50th season a six-day Bach Festival. Choral music predominated, since the orchestra as we understand it did not exist in Bach's time. But there were orchestral pieces, among them the Suite in D-major, for strings, oboes, trumpets and kettle-drums, which Dr. Koussevitzky has placed at the head of the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening.

This Suite is the best known of Bach's larger instrumental compositions, and to no small extent its renown is attributable to the presence, as second movement, of the so-called Air for the G-string, the only one of Bach's compositions which may be said to have attained popularity in the wider sense. In the transcription for violin, from which its generally accepted title is derived, this beautiful air is transposed to the key of C-major. In the original version it is played by all the violins an octave and a tone higher. But it remains the same melody, even if it does not exploit the possibilities of the instrument's lowest string. This second movement may be the crowning glory of the Suite in D-major, but it is by no means all that it offers in the way of attractive music. There is a stately Overture with animated close, and there are dances of decided charm: two Gavottes, a Bourree and a Gigue or, as we would say Jig.

The programs of symphony concerts often make disconcerting leaps across the centuries, as when that of Tuesday passes abruptly from Bach's Suite of about 1720 to Debussy's "Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Faun'" that in 1896 made history as the first orchestral composition of the French impressionist school. For long this tonal commentary on the strange creation of the imagist poet Stephen Mallarme, which has to do with the reveries of a bemused creature of the pagan world, seemed to be compounded of pure magic. Now both the structure and the contents of the Prelude have become crystal-clear, yet without robbing the music of its rare evocative power. That which once seemed chaotic and formless, and to some even a little mad, is now revealed as one of the most finely articulated and beautifully logical of compositions. Once more the daring experiment of yesterday has become the classic of today.

It has been agreed that in order to interest future generation music should be, as the expression goes, in advance of its time. Certainly Bach was not properly appreciated by his contemporaries nor Debussy always understood by his, while Brahms, whose First Symphony concludes Tuesday's program, has only recently come completely into his own. On the other hand Mendelssohn, the remaining composer on this Tuesday list, was idolized by his contemporaries, yet after the inevitable period of reaction he has once more come into favor. Even the London audience which first heard the incidental music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," on May 27, 1844, could not have received the Scherzo more rapturously or have been more completely charmed by it, than was the recent company which heard it in Boston's Symphony Hall 87 years later. The decades that have passed have taken no toll of this music, extracted nothing from its happy fancifulness or from its inimitably deft scoring. Mendelssohn's range was not wide. He has been accused, and rightly, of a lack of depth. But certain things were said by him once and for all. The composer of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and the overture "Fingal's Cave" had nothing to fear from the future.

Hearing Brahms' First Symphony in Boston the other afternoon it was difficult to believe that this music had ever seemed formidable, cryptic, abstruse, or "depressing and unedifying, coldly elaborated and artificial," as John F. Dwight's Journal of Music described it in 1878. "Certainly," wrote Mr. Dwight, "it cannot be popular." Today it would be difficult to name half a dozen symphonies more truly popular than this one, which offers virtually everything that the average modern listener desires in such a work. The C-minor Symphony of Brahms satisfies our sense of form and balance, of musical development, continuity and logical progress. It satisfies as well our craving for harmonic and orchestral richness, for warmly emotional melody, for stirring rhythm and exciting climax.

In short the symphonies of Brahms in general and of this one in particular come nearer to meeting the several demands of mind, ear, heart and imagination than do those of any other composer. The first movement of this C-minor Symphony gives a stimulating sense of struggle and striving. The second is a romantic song. The third is a charming interlude. The introduction to the fourth is a poem in tones, and that Finale itself is both an inspiring paean and an imposing musical monument. Fifty years from now, one wonders, will yet another metamorphosis in the attitude towards this Symphony have taken place?

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
APR 12 1931

Boston Symphony Gives Bach Music

Festival Marks Peak of 50th Anniversary Year

The Bach Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed in Symphony Hall, Boston, proved the peak of the fiftieth anniversary season of the great orchestra, which has been celebrated with many events. The Bach Festival, which was given on six days, from March 24 to 29, was attended by overflowing audiences. At the concusion of the mass in B minor Dr. Serge Koussevitcky, the conductor, together with the chorus, the orchestra, and the soloists were given a prolonged demonstration.

Wednesday evening, March 25, was devoted to the memory of Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra and its sole sustainer for thirty-seven years, when an address was delivered by Blies Perry, his friend and biographer.

The festival included the mass in B minor, the Magnificat, four cantatas, orchestral concertos and suites, and music for piano, harpsichord and organ. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and the Bach Cantata Club of Radcliffe performed the choral scores. Alexander Borovsky and Mme. Patorni-Casadesus came from Europe to appear as pianist and harpsichordist, respectively. The vocal soloists were Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer, Adelle Alberts, Richard Crooks and Fraser Gange.

1821

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 12 1931

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Plays Berlioz.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Further echoes of the Bach Festival held with impressive success by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in recent days in Boston were wafted to us yesterday afternoon when Mr. Koussevitzky and his host began the program of their last New York concert of the season with two delightful Bach scores, the familiar orchestral suite in D and the concerto in D minor for two violins and strings, the solo parts played by Mr. Burgin, concert-master, and Mr. Theodorowicz, distinguished veteran of the orchestra.

The audience welcomed this music and it was justly chastened when the conductor stopped short in the performance of the Berlioz "Fantastic" symphony, which followed, and rapped sharply with his bâton to silence rustling and whispers. Technically the performance of the suite was of exceptional virtuosity, though some might take issue with one or another detail of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading, as, for instance, the slow and somewhat sentimental treatment of the famous air or fluctuations of pace not hallowed by tradition.

But it is a rash man who talks of the Bach tradition.

For those of us who approach our Bach only with the expectation that we shall be given enjoyment by his music there was immense pleasure in the performances, even when the occasional question mark reared its head. The quality of the strings of the Boston Symphony, the superb playing of the wood-winds, even more impressive in the wonderful performance of the Berlioz "Fantastic" symphony which came later, would have been enough for a treasurable experience.

The performance of the concerto was marked by the brilliant and dominating character of Mr. Burgin's performance, and the very fine musicianship and artistic character of Mr. Theodorowicz, who also knows his traditions, and who was well entrusted with his part. The strings were reduced for the performance to such an extent that there was the balance of tone which the composer had presumably in mind. The applause for performance and music was long and heartily sustained.

The climax of the concert, however, one which stands out in the retrospect of the six seasons that Mr. Koussevitzky has led the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city was the interpretation of Berlioz's incredible symphony. For the "Fantistic" symphony, viewed in the light of its age and period, is simply incredible. What other composer started his symphonic career with such a revolutionary gesture? Literally none.

In the history of the symphony we find composers greater than Berlioz, but we find nowhere else in the symphonic field such an "original" or one to whom so many modern composers owe unpayable debts. One does not speak only of Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff and the whole Russian school of their period, but of the entire literature of modern music.

What an immense and empty space there would be in this literature if Berlioz were taken from it!

But granting all the historical significance of a score that you please: how does it sound and actually affect the modern listener? Before Mr. Koussevitzky had yesterday's performance to his credit an estimate of the actual effect of the symphony would necessarily have been conditional. The symphony, in certain places, is too long, this being especially the case with the scene in the fields. But undue lengths hold truth of even such giants as Wagner and Beethoven.

The work as a whole, when the composer is met half-way by a conductor of virtuoso technic and creative imagination, is astonishing.

Mr. Koussevitzky interpreted the symphony with a special intuition and sensitiveness for its slightest nuance and shade of color. He gave the composition all of its just romantic color and passion. He also accomplished what very few conductors do. He understood not only the extravagance, but the extremely poetical and refined character of much of Berlioz's instrumentation. Thus the first movement was of the rarest intimacy—one could well have said, shyness.

It made one think, with its outbursts of extravagant rhetoric and its pervading poetry and tenderness of the remark made of calf-love—customarily sneered at and made the butt of jests, but actually, perhaps, the noblest and the purest attachment to which the man at the end of his life can look back.

And so with this music, the creation of a young genius of 26 or 27, in a period when serious orchestral composition was almost unattempted in France. This score holds, preeminently, the dear illusions, the mad dreams of youth, especially youth in the romantic period, and for once a conductor realized the fact. It is difficult to praise this interpretation too highly. It was Berlioz redivivus, after long years of partial coma and oblivion. Sooner or later every conductor plays this "Fantastic" symphony. We are tempted to say that the interpretation of yesterday was not the best interpretation, but the only interpretation of the work the writer has been privileged to hear.

Each movement should be discussed in detail. How masterfully did Mr. Koussevitzky treat the two final movements—not by the tonal extravagance and lurid rhetoric which misguided conductors believe to be the secret of Berlioz's music. Only at certain moments were there sudden and ferocious outbreaks of the orchestra.

For the greater part, the dynamic scheme of these movements was very carefuly controlled, leaving plenty of room for the outbursts of the instruments and giving the effect, which was surely what Berlioz intended, not of mere unrestrained orgies for the final movements, but of a vision of the march to the scaffold and the hellish ensuing revels, seen in the glare and unreality of an opium dream. Then, indeed, the orchestra became fantastic. Huge and terrible shapes could have beckoned from the shadows. Choruses, some of them noisy and ribald, some little secret ceremonies of the satanic elect, were heard.

For no detail of Berlioz's instrumentation was missed, and a hundred unaccustomed effects fell upon the ear.

The tolling of the bell, the terrible enunication of the old chant, the "Dies irae," were climactic moments. But the whole orchestra was shrouded in mystery and terror, terror that haunts dreams and not the waking hours—this was the keynote of the more sensational pages of the symphony. Nor must the exquisite playing of the English horn and of other of the wind parts in the third movement, and the evocation of the atmosphere of the fields, of endless gray skies and the roll of distant sultry thunder be forgotten.

If Mr. Koussevitzky can interpret all of Berlioz as he interpreted the "Fantastic" symphony yesterday, let us please have more of it from him, for such performances are rare, and Berlioz is too little understood, even today, for us to be without them. A performance of Berlioz's "Faust" from this same leader might well constitute a further revelation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 12 1931

...makes Final Appearance Here

Bach and Berlioz were the composers represented on the final program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Koussevitzky chose the former's third Suite in D major, the D minor concerto for two violins and the French composer's Fantastic Symphony as his vehicles. The solosits in the Bach work were the concert master of the orchestra, Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the Bach Suite was straightforward, planned on broad lines and without much subtlety of nuance. The string section of the orchestra sounded rich and luminous in the famous air. The performance of double concerto was not consistently felicitous. The tonal equilibrium suffered somewhat because the two players were rather unevenly matched. While Mr. Burgin's tone was more brilliant and penetrating, it was not without its squeaky moments on the E string. The two vigorous end movements were more successfully presented than was the slow movement, where the mood of religious exaltation was realized only partly.

Berlioz's high-flown Fantastic Symphony had been heard earlier in the season under Mr. Kleiber with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. It must be confessed that the Austrian conductor's conception was more exciting than Mr. Koussevitzky's. This music, despite all attempts to vitalize it, is moribund. Its adolescent romanticism is hopelessly dated. Its inherent weaknesses were rather emphasized by Mr. Koussevitzky's anticipations of the composer's tempo indications, both for retarding and eccelerating, and his tendency to dwell on purely transitional passages.

J. D. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

APR 3 1931

In the World of Music

Closing Concerts by Boston and Manhattan Orchestras and Recital by Chevalier

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra and Manhattan Symphony Orchestra have given their last concerts of the season here. Both organizations offered programs unusual in content and played before audiences that applauded with enthusiasm, although the Manhattan audience was by no means capacity. To make it plain that extreme contrast was the feature of the Boston concert it is necessary only to say that it consisted entirely of compositions by Bach and Berlioz. These two composers, about a century apart in the history of music, and in the temper of their work as different as can be, were separated on Saturday only by an intermission.

Unity and a sure mathematical continuity with which a great peace descends upon those who hear are generally characteristic of Bach, whereas Berlioz is vividly episodic, exciting, even explosive. The noble melodies of Bach seem to have an existence of their own, and all that he asks of the orchestra is that it play beautifully, and still it cannot play beautifully enough. It is as if the music always existed and Bach just made a written record of it. Berlioz requires considerable virtuosity, a flair for the spectacular. He is not utterly satisfying.

Berlioz requires considerable virtuosity to make him interesting and a flair for the spectacular. Whereas Bach is utterly satisfying although he takes his time. Berlioz's outbursts grow wearisome.

Such distinctions were emphasized at Saturday's concert, when with a glorious fullness of tone and tempo of easeful dignity the orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky played the suite in D and the concerto in D minor for two violins and strings, with Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz doing distinguished work in the solo parts.

Despite the warmth of the afternoon the audience sat blissfully through Bach, and not until the more sensational "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz got under way did the influences of ...m-
...ibly
...a
...ular
...ped
...and
...ex-
...or-
...em-
...ions
...the
...h in
...grim,
...its
...Dies
...ality
...stion,
...was
...ston
...this
...oon
...om-
...ar-

two violins and orchestra and Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." The solo players in the concerto were Richard Burginand Julius Theodorowicz, who sit at the first desk of the first violins of the organization. Their contribution to the artistic pleasure of the afternoon was of high excellence. Both musicians revealed command of tone and technic and also of the character of Bach's musice.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented the suite with a nice appreciation of its style. The famous air which is the second movement of the composition, gave the strings of the orchestra an opportunity which was not lost. The performance of the Berlioz composition, which followed the intermission, was received with prolonged applause, and the gentlemen from Boston were able to depart for the season feeling that they had done a good job.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST

APR 13 1931

Gossip of the Town

about to beg... for five cents p... garage advertises: "Au...

* * * *

One reason Serge Koussevitsky loves his Jamaica Plain home (leased from ... Traffic Commissioner Conry), is because in the winter, he says, the snow on the trees reminds him of Russia. What it reminds him of in summer will be the subject for another very solemn interview because he's never in this country in July. . . . Recommended for the "Gossip of the Town" medal for intrepid nonchalance, high courage and heroism in face of danger, the pushcart pedler, Antonio Sharapetello, orange, asparagus and banana magnate, who propelled his two-wheeled, overloaded property through the maze of downtown automobile traffic, through vexacious traffic signs and traffic cops, without showing even a little of that Latin temperament so often slanderously charged against his gentle, courteous and wholly amiable people. In our judgment, Mr. Sarapetello, you're a very great man and now you know why we stopped to ask you your name.

THIS CLIPPING FROM JOHNSTOWN, PA.
DEMOCRAT

APR 14 1931

Monumental Festivals

BY MRS. EMMA RAAB

...anniversary of ... annals of tonal art. The Boston Symphony, conducted by Sergei Koussevitsky, presented a Bach festival, embracing the most representative orchestral, choral and chamber music of Johann Sebastian Bach, at Symphony hall, Boston.

But one that stands out ... above any held in America recently was the Bach festival, March 24, 1930, just concluded.

This was the celebration of a glorious half-century of musical attainment that is unsurpassed in the

This highlight of the musical season was given in honor of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson, and there could be no more fitting tribute to the man and art devotee whose love for music made possible one of the world's greatest orchestras, the Boston Symphony.

Would that other cities could point with pride to music-conscious men and women like Mr. Higginson, who for a period of 37 years was the sole sustainer of this orchestra It is the man or woman with a vision who bring their ideals to life and give us what is so essential to beautiful living.

Richard Wagner once wrote: "Whatever the relations of music, it will never cease to be the noblest and purest of arts. It is the truth and reality, what other arts cannot imply. It's inherent solemnity makes it so chaste and wonderful that it ennobles whatever comes in contact with it."

FOUR SYMPHONY VISITS EXPECTED

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe Announces Concerts Are Virtually Assured.

$4500 NEEDED; $3331 GIVEN

Music Association Is Collecting Funds to Underwrite Expenses of Theatre

Four concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city next season virtually are assured, according to announcement yesterday by Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, which raises the money necessary to underwrite the expenses of the theatre at which the orchestra appears.

In response to letters sent by Mrs. Sharpe last month, a group of sponsors already have subscribed $3331 of the $4500 needed. Mrs. Sharpe said yesterday.

The underwriting of the Boston Symphony concerts, according to the Music Association, is separate from the financing of the Community Concert Association series of concerts. The plan of the Community Concert Association, provides for a membership of 1500 persons whose membership dues will pay for a series of four or five concerts of outstanding character during the coming season.

Contributions received to date are as follows:

$250—Mrs. C. Prescott Knight; $150—Mrs. Murray S. Danforth, Mrs. George Hall; $100—Herbert W. Rice, Samuel M. Nicholson, Stephen O. Metcalf, Mrs. Houghton P. Metcalf, G. Pierce Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. Matteson, Mr. and Mrs. William L. Hodgman, Mrs. Peter G. Gerry, Mr. and Mrs. R. Clinton Fuller, Mrs. Gammell Cross, Mrs. Walter Callender, Mr. and Mrs. Walter R. Callender, Mrs. Frank A. Sayles.

$75—James C. Collins; $50—William J. Sweet, The Mary C. Wheeler School, Marsden J. Perry, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur B Lisle, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. E. Jones, Mrs. S Foster Hunt, Mrs. John S. Holbrook, Theodore Francis Green, W. W. Dempster, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Chaminade Club, Mrs James Richardson.

$30—Dr. and Mrs. Henry A Whitmarsh, Olive B. DeWolf; $25—Mrs. Kenneth Wood, Helen C. Robertson, Mrs. James B. Richardson, Mrs. William Davis Miller, Mrs. Frederic W. Howe, Miss Louise C. Hoppin, Mrs. Lizzie D. Hinckley, Eleanor B. Green, William C. Fry, Mrs. Robert B. Dresser, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Anthony Cummings, Mrs. R. B. Comstock, Helen G. Chase, Irene B. Butler, Mr. and Mrs. William Ely, Mrs. Morell Mackenzie, Mrs. Henry S. Lanpher, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Kelley; $20—Dr. and Mrs. Clarence A. Barbour, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene S. Graves.

$15—Mrs. Ashbel T. Wall, Jr., Mrs David P. Moulton, Mrs. Austin T. Levy, Mrs. Albert A. Baker; $10—Mrs. George H. Webb, Mrs. George B. Waterhouse, J. D Tamarkin, Mrs. Frank D. Simmons, Max A. Saugy, Mrs. Arthur T. Jones, Mrs. W. B. Greenough, Mrs. Willis C. Greene Mrs. Richard Rathborne Graham, Emily Diman, The Dilettanti, Mrs. Archibald Silverman.

$5—Ellis L. Yatman, C. S. Wood, Carrie Schmitt, Rev. Henry M. Saville, George F Phillips, Mrs. Hovey T. Freeman, Emily Fairbanks, Anna L. Evans, Evangeline Larry; $3—Harriet C. Whitaker, Helen D. Loring, Martha B. W. Day; $2—Helen H. Hatch.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, made their last local appearance of the season in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Their visit here this time was a curious medley of B's. Not only were their two programs made up of works by Bach, Brahms and Berlioz, but their soloist on Thursday was Alexander Borowsky, Richard Burgin was one of Saturday's soloists, and the orchestra's town and title are Boston.

The program on Saturday comprised the D major suite and the D minor concerto for two violins of Bach, with Mr. Burgin, the concertmaster, and Julius Theodorowicz as soloists in the latter and the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 14 1931

ONLY $150 NOW LACKING FOR SYMPHONY GUARANTEE

Engagement Next Year to Mark Orchestra's 50th Season Here

Only $150 remains to be subscribed to guarantee the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year for its 50th season in Providence Harry Parsons Cross of the Music Association told last night's audience in the Albee Theatre, before Dr. Serge Koussevitzky raised his baton for the first number of its final concert of this season. Mr Cross said Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, and Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer, had received pledges approximating the quota sought from guarantors.

In a graceful tribute to the Boston Symphony and its conductor, Mr. Cross said this season was the golden jubilee of the orchestra's founding and the fifty consecutive year of concert visits to Providence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

Symphony's 50th Year

At Carnegie the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its final ... season. Also its 50th ... gram chiefly of Bach ... Serge Koussevitzky ...

1821

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 12 1931

, SUNDAY, APRIL 12,

Koussevitzky Plays Berlioz.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Further echoes of the Bach Festival held with impressive success by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in recent days in Boston were wafted to us yesterday afternoon when Mr. Koussevitzky and his host began the program of their last New York concert of the season with two delightful Bach scores, the familiar orchestral suite in D and the concerto in D minor for two violins and strings, the solo parts played by Mr. Burgin, concert-master, and Mr. Theodorowicz, distinguished veteran of the orchestra.

The audience welcomed this music and it was justly chastened when the conductor stopped short in the performance of the Berlioz "Fantastic" symphony, which followed, and rapped sharply with his bâton to silence rustling and whispers. Technically the performance of the suite was of exceptional virtuosity, though some might take issue with one or another detail of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading, as, for instance, the slow and somewhat sentimental treatment of the famous air or fluctuations of pace not hallowed by tradition.

But it is a rash man who talks of the Bach tradition.

For those of us who approach our Bach only with the expectation that we shall be given enjoyment by his music there was immense pleasure in the performances, even when the occasional question mark reared its head. The quality of the strings of the Boston Symphony, the superb playing of the wood-winds, even more impressive in the wonderful performance of the Berlioz "Fantastic" symphony which came later, would have been enough for a treasurable experience.

The performance of the concerto was marked by the brilliant and dominating character of Mr. Burgin's performance, and the very fine musicianship and artistic character of Mr. Theodorowicz, who also knows his traditions, and who was well entrusted with his part. The strings were reduced for the performance to such an extent that there was the balance of tone which the composer had presumably in mind. The applause for performance and music was long and heartily sustained.

The climax of the concert, however, one which stands out in the retrospect of the six seasons that Mr. Koussevitzky has led the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city was the interpretation of Berlioz's incredible symphony. For the "Fantastic" symphony, viewed in the light of its age and period, is simply incredible. What other composer started his symphonic career with such a revolutionary gesture? Literally none.

In the history of the symphony we find composers greater than Berlioz, but we find nowhere else in the symphonic field such an "original" or one to whom so many modern composers owe unpayable debts. One does not speak only of Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff and the whole Russian school of their period, but of the entire literature of modern music.

What an immense and empty space there would be in this literature if Berlioz were taken from it!

But granting all the historical significance of a score that you please: how does it sound and actually affect the modern listener? Before Mr. Koussevitzky had yesterday's performance to his credit an estimate of the actual effect of the symphony would necessarily have been conditional. The symphony, in certain places, is too long, this being especially the case with the scene in the fields. But undue lengths hold truth of even such giants as Wagner and Beethoven.

The work as a whole, when the composer is met half-way by a conductor of virtuoso technic and creative imagination, is astonishing.

Mr. Koussevitzky interpreted the symphony with a special intuition and sensitiveness for its slightest nuance and shade of color. He gave the composition all of its just romantic color and passion. He also accomplished what very few conductors do. He understood not only the extravagance, but the extremely poetical and refined character of much of Berlioz's instrumentation. Thus the first movement was of the rarest intimacy—one could well have said, shyness.

It made one think, with its outbursts of extravagant rhetoric and its pervading poetry and tenderness of the remark made of calf-love—customarily sneered at and made the butt of jests, but actually, perhaps, the noblest and the purest attachment to which the man at the end of his life can look back.

And so with this music, the creation of a young genius of 26 or 27, in a period when serious orchestral composition was almost unattempted in France. This score holds, preeminently, the dear illusions, the mad dreams of youth, especially youth in the romantic period, and for once a conductor realized the fact. It is difficult to praise this interpretation too highly. It was Berlioz redivivus, after long years of partial coma and oblivion. Sooner or later every conductor plays this "Fantastic" symphony. We are tempted to say that the interpretation of yesterday was not the best interpretation, but the only interpretation of the work the writer has been privileged to hear.

Each movement should be discussed in detail. How masterfully did Mr. Koussevitzky treat the two final movements—not by the tonal extravagance and lurid rhetoric which misguided conductors believe to be the secret of Berlioz's music. Only at certain moments were there sudden and ferocious outbreaks of the orchestra.

For the greater part, the dynamic scheme of these movements was very carefuly controlled, leaving plenty of room for the outbursts of the instruments and giving the effect, which was surely what Berlioz intended, not of mere unrestrained orgies for the final movements, but of a vision of the march to the scaffold and the hellish ensuing revels, seen in the glare and unreality of an opium dream. Then, indeed, the orchestra became fantastic. Huge and terrible shapes could have beckoned from the shadows. Choruses, some of them noisy and ribald, some little secret ceremonies of the satanic elect, were heard.

For no detail of Berlioz's instrumentation was missed, and a hundred unaccustomed effects fell upon the ear.

The tolling of the bell, the terrible enunication of the old chant, the "Dies irae," were climactic moments. But the whole orchestra was shrouded in mystery and terror, terror that haunts dreams and not the waking hours—this was the keynote of the more sensational pages of the symphony. Nor must the exquisite playing of the English horn and of other of the wind parts in the third movement, and the evocation of the atmosphere of the fields, of endless gray skies and the roll of distant sultry thunder be forgotten.

If Mr. Koussevitzky can interpret all of Berlioz as he interpreted the "Fantastic" symphony yesterday, let us please have more of it from him, for such performances are rare, and Berlioz is too little understood.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 12 1931

Boston Symphony Gives Bach, Berlioz Numbers

Visiting Orchestra Makes Final Appearance Here

Bach and Berlioz were the composers represented on the final program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Koussevitzky chose the former's third Suite in [illegible] major, the D minor concerto for two violins and the French composer's Fantastic Symphony as his vehicles. The solosits in the Bach work were the concert master of the orchestra, Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the Bach Suite was straightforward, planned on broad lines and without much subtlety of nuance. The string section of the orchestra sounded rich and luminous in the famous air. The performance of double concerto was not consistently felicitous. The tonal equilibrium suffered somewhat because the two players were rather unevenly matched. While Mr. Burgin's tone was more brilliant and penetrating, it was not without its squeaky moments on the E string. The two vigorous end movements were more successfully presented than was the slow movement, where the mood of religious exaltation was realized only partly.

Berlioz's high-flown Fantastic Symphony had been heard earlier in the season under Mr. Kleiber with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. It must be confessed that the Austrian conductor's conception was more exciting than Mr. Koussevitzky's. This music, despite all attempts to vitalize it, is moribund. Its adolescent romanticism is hopelessly dated. Its inherent weaknesses were rather emphasized by Mr. Koussevitzky's anticipations of the composer's tempo indications, both for retarding and eccelerating, and his tendency to dwell on purely transitional passages.

J. D. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

HIGHWAYS GIVE JOBS TO JOBLES

Greatest Construction Pr[illegible] gram in Nation's History Moves Forward

Washington, April 11.—(AP)—T[illegible] greatest highway construction progr[illegible] in the nation's history is moving forwa[illegible] to provide jobs for the idle.

More than 100,000 men soon are [illegible] pected to be working on new networks [illegible] roads linking cities, towns and villa[illegible] in every State.

Projects are being approved today, the Bureau of Public Roads and preli[illegible] inary surveys speeded to get as ma[illegible] men as possible at work this month. T[illegible] Bureau sanctioned Federal aid proje[illegible] totalling $63,719,612 during the fi[illegible] three months of this year as compar[illegible] with $24,391,562 last year.

The States in this period obligat[illegible] $57,884,789 of the $80,000,000 emerger[illegible] money voted by Congress to permit th[illegible] to take up a larger percentage of t[illegible] Federal Aid Highway Fund which w[illegible] increased from $75,000,000 to $125,00[illegible] 000.

The total mileage States will build t[illegible] year is expected to exceed by far t[illegible] 1930 buildings and the 1929 total of 2[illegible] 071 miles of surfacing and 7451 miles[illegible] grading.

During the first quarter of the ye[illegible] the total of regular Federal aid a[illegible] emergency funds was $121,604,401.

Six States—Connecticut, Delawa[illegible] vides for a [illegible] whose membership dues will pay for a series of four or five concerts of outstanding character during the coming season.

Contributions received to date are as follows:

$250—Mrs. C. Prescott Knight; $150—Mrs. Murray S. Danforth, Mrs. George Hall; $100—Herbert W. Rice, Samuel M. Nicholson, Stephen O. Metcalf, Mrs. Houghton P. Metcalf, G. Pierce Metcalf.

WORL[illegible]

The Boston Symphony O[illegible] and its Russian conductor, S[illegible] Koussevitzky, made their last local appearance of the season in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Their visit here this time was a curious medley of B's. Not only were their two programs made up of works by Bach, Brahms and Berlioz, but their soloist on Thursday was Alexander Borowsky, Richard Burgin was one of Saturday's soloists, and the orchestra's town and title are Boston.

The program on Saturday comprised the D major suite and the D minor concerto for two violins of Bach, with Mr. Burgin, the concertmaster, and Julius Theodorowicz as soloists in the latter and the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

[illegible] 3 1931

In the World of Music

Closing Concerts by Boston and Manhattan Orchestras and Recital by Chevalier

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra and Manhattan Symphony Orchestra have given their last concerts of the season here. Both organizations offered programs unusual in content and played before audiences that applauded with enthusiasm, although the Manhattan audience was by no means capacity. To make it plain that extreme contrast was the feature of the Boston concert it is necessary only to say that it consisted entirely of compositions by Bach and Berlioz. These two composers, about a century apart in the history of music, and in the temper of their work as different as can be, were separated on Saturday only by an intermission.

Unity and a sure mathematical continuity with which a great peace descends upon those who hear are generally characteristic of Bach, whereas Berlioz is vividly episodic, exciting, even explosive. The noble melodies of Bach seem to have an existence of their own, and all that he asks of the orchestra is that it play beautifully, and still it cannot play beautifully enough. It is as if the music always existed and Bach just made a written record of it. Berlioz requires considerable virtuosity, a flair for the spectacular. He is not utterly satisfying.

Berlioz requires considerable virtuosity to make him interesting and a flair for the spectacular. Whereas Bach is utterly satisfying although he takes his time. Berlioz's outbursts grow wearisome.

Such distinctions were emphasized at Saturday's concert, when with a glorious fullness of tone and tempo of easeful dignity the orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky played the suite in D and the concerto in D minor for two violins and strings, with Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz doing distinguished work in the solo parts.

Despite the warmth of the afternoon the audience sat blissfully through Bach, and not until the more sensational "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz got under way did the influences of the spring distract from the performance enough to make people audibly restless. Then they did, and with a wrathful glance toward a particular box Mr. Koussevitzky sharply clapped his hands and the music broke up and the orchestra made another start.

Gorgeous pyrotechnics would be expected from Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra in this biographical and tempestuous symphony, and expectations were surpassed. All the way from the extravagantly sweet dreams of youth in love to the scaffold and the grim, shrieking witches' Sabbath, with its funeral knells and parody on the Dies iræ, this symphony moved with vitality and a wealth of theatrical suggestion, and if it dragged at times that was the fault of Mr. Berlioz.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

[illegible]

Boston Symphony Closes Its Season Here

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in this city took place Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Bach's D major suite for archestra and concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra and Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." The solo players in the concerto were Richard Burginand Julius Theodorowicz, who sit at the first desk of the first violins of the organization. Their contribution to the artistic pleasure of the afternoon was of high excellence. Both musicians revealed command of tone and technic and also of the character of Bach's musice.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented the suite with a nice appreciation of its style. The famous air which is the second movement of the composition, gave the strings of the orchestra an opportunity which was not lost. The performance of the Berlioz composition, which followed the intermission, was received with prolonged applause, and the gentlemen from Boston were able to depart for the season feeling that they had done a good job.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST

APR 13 1931

Gossip of the Town

about to beg[illegible] for five cents [illegible] garage advertises: "Au[illegible]

* * * *

One reason Serge Koussevitsky [illegible] his Jamaica Plain home ceased from [illegible] Traffic Commissioner Conry), is be[illegible] cause in the winter, he says, the snow on the trees reminds him of Russia. What it reminds him of in summer will be the subject for another very solemn interview because he's never in this country in July. . . . Recommended for the "Gossip of the Town" medal for intrepid nonchalance, high courage and heroism in face of danger, the pushcart pedler, Antonio Sharapetello, orange, asparagus and banana magnate, who propelled his two-wheeled, overloaded property through the maze of downtown automobile traffic, through vexacious traffic signs and traffic cops, without showing even a little of that Latin temperament so often slanderously charged against his gentle, courteous and wholly amiable people. In our judgment, Mr. Sarapetello, you're a very great man and now you know why we stopped to ask you your name.

THIS CLIPPING FROM JOHNSTOWN, PA.
DEMOCRAT

APR 14 1931

Monumental Festivals

BY MRS. EMMA RAAB

[illegible] anniversary [illegible]

But one that stands out fa[illegible] annals of tonal art. The Boston [illegible] Symphony, conducted by Sergei [illegible] above any held in America recent[illegible] ly was the Bach festival, March 24 [illegible] Koussevitsky, presented a Bach fes[illegible] 1930, just concluded. [illegible] ival, embracing the most represen[illegible]

This was the celebration of a [illegible] ative orchestral, choral and cham[illegible] glorious half-century of musical at[illegible] er music of Johann Sebastian [illegible] tainment that is unsurpassed in the [illegible] Bach, at Symphony hall, Boston.

This highlight of the musical season was given in honor of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson, and there could be no more fitting tribute to the man and art devotee whose love for music made possible one of the world's greatest orchestras, the Boston Symphony.

Would that other cities could point with pride to music-conscious men and women like Mr. Higginson, who for a period of 37 years was the sole sustainer of this orchestra It is the man or woman with a vision who bring their ideals to life and give us what is so essential to beautiful living.

Richard Wagner once wrote: "Whatever the relations of music, it will never cease to be the noblest and purest of arts. It is the truth and reality, what other arts cannot imply. It's inherent solemnity makes it so chaste and wonderful that it ennobles whatever comes in contact with it."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

[illegible]

ONLY $150 NOW LACKING FOR SYMPHONY GUARANTEE

Engagement Next Year to Mark Orchestra's 50th Season Here

Only $150 remains to be subscribed to guarantee the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year for its 50th season in Providence. Harry Parsons Cross of the Music Association told last night's audience in the Albee Theatre, before Dr. Serge Koussevitzky raised his baton for the first number of its final concert of this season. Mr. Cross said Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, and Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer, had received pledges approximating the quota sought from guarantors.

In a graceful tribute to the Boston Symphony and its conductor, Mr. Cross said this season was the golden jubilee of the orchestra's founding and the 49th consecutive year of concert visits to Providence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

Symphony's 50th Year

At Carnegie the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its final concert of the season. Also its 50th year. Program chiefly of Bach music.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE
APR 15 1931

-:- MUSIC -:-

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT

One of the best of the New York critics paid tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky the other day not only for his well-known virtuosity, but for his ability to make things understandable in music that had previously been shrouded in comparative darkness, and, above all, for his ability to grow in the scope and depth of his musicianship and his imagination.

No one, of open mind, who listened to the Boston Symphony at the Albee Theatre last night could refuse to indorse that judgment. It was the last concert of the season here, and it was the most brilliant of the series.

* * *

Yet the numbers that made up the programme were familiar to most of the audience. If there was one which was not, it was the Suite in D-major, No. 3 by Johann Sebastian Bach. If any music has ever been played more beautifully than the second movement of this suite was played last night, we have not heard it. No doubt some of the most orthodox admirers of Bach would say the reading was at times a little arbitrary. But it is with Bach as it is with Shakespeare and all outstanding geniuses; they are great not only through what they said, but through what their work inspires others to say. As usual, the strings and woodwind of the Bostonians were simply magnificent under the richness and dominance of a great directing intuition, intelligence and will.

We heard also Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and it, too, seemed better than ever. How many times we have heard it we have not counted, but more than two score certainly. Yet Mr. Koussevitzky gave it such freshness as—again to resort to a literary analogy—one feels whenever one returns to two lines of poetry such as—

> Full many a glorious morning have I seen
> Flatter the mountain tops with sovereign eye.

There was also Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," music which in substance is more akin to Tennyson than to Shakespeare, but which was also utterly charming last night.

* * *

Finally, there was the Brahms first symphony. If Dr. Koussevitzky had never shown his capacity for growth but in his interpretation of Brahms, it would have been enough to justify the encomium of the New York critic we have quoted. The First Symphony is becoming one of the most familiar of works, and we have discussed it in these columns previously. Can we say more about it than that we are more than ever convinced that it does carry the symphony on where Beethoven left off? It is not a throw-back, but a glorious development of what seemed to have reached a point beyond development.

And that remark leads to a question. Is it possible for the Boston Symphony to grow into a more perfect instrument than it is? Our own small circumference of possibility might lead us to say it is not. But we should probably prove wrong. The limits of this orchestra will be set only by itself. It is one of the supreme achievements in the work of music, and its possible field of conquest is far beyond our ken to define.

J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
APR 15 1931

Boston Programs.

Back from its regular visit to New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard again in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. For these concerts a Schumann program has been arranged in which the assisting artist will be Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, who will be heard in the composer's concerto for that instrument. Listed for performance also are the Overture to Byron's "Manfred;" and the Symphony in B flat. Meanwhile the season is rapidly drawing to a close. Yesterday the orchestra gave its last concert this season in the Tuesday afternoon series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 15 1931

Boston Symphony Gives Final Concert of This Year's Series

Critic Declares No Suggestion of Mediocrity Could Be Found in Superb Program or Perfect Rendition. Program Includes Celebrated Work from Bach's Time to Our Own

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of this year's series in the Albee Theatre last night.

The program consisted of famous works from the time of Bach to our own. No suggestion of mediocrity could be found in this superb program or its perfect rendition. Times there have been when, at the conclusion of its concerts here, the orchestra has shown signs of fatigue, the results of the relentless grind of overwork. But no such thoughts were in evidence last night. Rather, one would have said that it had returned from a vacation, for perfect technique and the genius of consummate artistry gave convincing proof that this was one of the finest of all orchestras.

The Bach Suite No. 3, remembered from the Bach Festival in Boston less than a month ago, gave expression of the composer's varying moods. A "Grave," the slowest of all musical tempi, extremely stately and impressive, "with measured tread and slow," punctuated by the tympani, gave way to a sprightly "Vivace" in strictly contrapuntal development of highly florid type, which soon yielded to the slow pace with which the movement began, as if to prepare for the exquisite "Aria" to follow.

This "Aria," beloved of violinists, is one of the most graceful and winsome of all musical utterances. It is susceptible of infinite and searching tenderness. The incomparable strings of the orchestra were most skilfully guided along the paths of peace by Dr. Koussevitzky, who imparted to his men the finest of interpretative artistry. Gavotte, Bourree and Gigue, in double time, full of contrapuntal weavings and glistening lustre, showed perfection of orchestral and technical brilliance and rhythmic verve. Serious musicians and the public unite in their gratitude for so much of Bach, and for its splend presentation.

Sharp Contrast Offered

Never did medieval creature go forth on romantic conquest with more delectable musical voice than that which Debussy has furnished forth to his prelude. It is a far cry from the time of Debussy to that of Bach; it is a far different musical speech that these different composers employ to express their musical minds and clothe their message. When we add to the now famous whole-toned scale the new figures of melodic and harmonic invention which are original with Debussy, with his inimitable orchestral configurations, we have a method of musical expression very different from that of Mendelssohn.

In this, one of the most beautiful utterances of Debussy, the orchestra, through its gifted virtuosi revealed qualities of tone color and nuance that are well nigh indescribable. Consider the ravishing tones of the solo flute which begin the prelude and the muted horns and string tone, followed by the antique cymbal which bring this sublime work to a close.

It is superb performance such as this that glorifies composer, conductor and musicians.

Mr. Laurent, solo flutist, was twice called to acknowledge applause.

The charming and delicate "Scherzo" from Mendelssohn's incidental music to Midsummer Night's Dream was played with an airy lightness and finely spun shimmerings that its fairly tale subject requires. The unrivalled wood wind choir showed perfection of ensemble and eloquence of the individual voices that sing this beautiful orchestral toccata. This was surely a concert for the flutes and wood wind which are heard frequently in their perfection of tone and articulation in this Mendelssohn Scherzo and in their most compelling richness in the "Afternoon of a Faun."

The cordial response of the audience to the Mendelssohn number showed plainly that his compositions are still admired and his works enjoyed.

Music of Grandeur

From these moods of mystical and illusive necromancy we turn to music more solid and substantial and less visionary; to sterner poetic material, to colors more glaring in their contrasts and more positive in their declaration. No "program" has been ascribed to this colossal symphony of Brahms by composer or devotees.

One must make his own words to correspond if he would translate music into words, hence there is left only sense of massive grandeur, beautiful melody and throbbing impulse which finds expression of reaction and impression according to the fancy and erudition of the hearer. Most of us are content to admire or worship without giving each emotion or delight a name. All ordinary adjectives of praise are soon exhausted as this symphony proceeds, because its moods are so varied, the solo instruments stand forth with such glowing beauties, the supporting contrapuntal weavings are so delicate and beautiful in their configurations and the musical form and texture of the work are so engrossing and fascinating. It is difficult to understand at this time why this symphony, which is now so popular and so admired, was, within easy memory, almost without champions or adherents, and even the composer himself was daunted. There are no arid wastes in this symphony, there is no cessation of interest as it proceeds, only increased attention and appreciation amounting to rapt fascination.

Brings Out New Values

Dr. Koussevitzky was particularly eloquent and persuasive in his treatment of the "Andante sostenuto," which he read more slowly than is his custom and with consummate interpretative insight he revealed every artistic phase of this movement and vitalized many entrances of melodic thought which are not always in evidence.

Nothing could be finer than the performance of this great symphony of last night. In massive ensemble, in plaintive appeal of the sonorous horns in the now familiar "horn motive," in tremulous strings and answering clarinet, the orchestra merited admiration and praise. We venture to say that no finer performance of this symphony was ever given anywhere.

Occasionally one hears, here and there a particularly fine English horn or oboe, an exceptionally fine flute or bass clarinet, a violin or 'cello of unusual tonal beauty, but rarely, as in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, does one hear so many players of unusual tonal and technical artistry in one organization. These features, together with the genius of the conductor go to make this the greatness of this orchestra.

As this series of splendid concerts draws to a close everyone must feel a sense of gratitude to the Music Association whose painstaking liberality has made these concerts possible and whose continued interest vouchsafes another season of concerts from this magnificent orchestra.

PROGRAMME

Bach. Suite for Orchestra No. 3, in D major
- I. Overture.
- II Air.
- III Gavotte I; Gavotte II.
- IV Bourree.
- V Gigue.

Debussy. "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune
- "Eglogue de S. Mallarme"
- Prelude to the afternoon of a Faun
- "Eclogue by S. Mallarme)

Mendelssohn. From the Incidental Music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"
- Scherzo. Allegro vivace.

Brahms. Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
- I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
- II. Andante sostenuto.
- III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
- IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

ONLY $150 NOW LACKING FOR SYMPHONY GUARANTEE.

Engagement Next Year to Mark Orchestra's 50th Season Here

Only $150 remains to be subscribed to guarantee the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year for its 50th season in Providence, Harry Parsons Cross of the Music Association told last night's audience in the Albee Theatre, before Dr. Serge Koussevitzky raised his baton for the first number of its final concert of this season. Mr. Cross said Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, and Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer, had received pledges approximating the quota sought from guarantors.

In a graceful tribute to the Boston Symphony and its conductor, Mr. Cross said this season was the golden jubilee of the orchestra's founding and the 49th consecutive year of concert visits to Providence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE
APR 15 1931

FAREWELL AND HAIL!

With last night's concert of the Boston Symphony in the Albee Theatre, the music season here came to an end, but at the same time two announcements were made for next season which should gladden the heart of music-lovers. The first was that four concerts by Dr. Koussevitzky and his men are again assured for next winter and spring; the second is that the Music Association, co-operating with the Community Concerts Corporation, will bring here Lily Pons and Lawrence Tibbett, two very famous artists. The organization makes the promise also that it will sponsor at least two other concerts of equal standing to be announced later. If it is possible to announce them before the opening of next week's drive for members, the drive will get an immense impetus.

In addition to all this, there is the definite announcement of the coming of Kreisler, Rachmaninoff and John McCormack under private management. Thus local music lovers seem assured of such a season next year as Providence has not had in many a day—if ever. Individuals will have to pick and choose for themselves from what is offered them if they cannot afford to pay for all of it. This newspaper's fervent hope is that the patronage of all the concerts will be such as to make at least equally fine programmes a permanent feature of our civic life. A certain amount of healthy rivalry between programmes will do no harm. If, instead of trying to cry down each other's wares or methods, all concerned will get together in a common determination to give Providence the music which, this newspapers believes, the people of the city desire, it will be found that we have here a field large enough and resourceful enough to make a success of every worthy plan to cultivate it.

1911

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 15 1931

IN TERMS OF MUSIC,
Comment in Season

Dr. Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Give Final Concert of Year at Albee.—Program Includes Famous Works From Time of Bach to Present.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of this year's series in the Albee Theatre last night.

The program consisted of famous works from the time of Bach to our own. No suggestion of mediocrity could be found in this superb program or its perfect rendition. Times there have been when, at the conclusion of its concerts here, the orchestra has shown signs of fatigue, the results of the relentless grind of overwork. But no such thoughts were in evidence last night. Rather, one would have said that it had returned from a vacation, for perfect technique and the genius of consummate artistry gave convincing proof that this was one of the finest of all orchestras.

The Bach Suite No. 3, remembered from the Bach Festival in Boston less than a month ago, gave expression of the composer's varying moods. A "Grave," the slowest of all musical tempi, extremely stately and impressive, "with measured tread and slow," punctuated by the tympani, gave way to a sprightly "Vivace" in strictly contrapuntal development of highly florid type, which soon yielded to the slow pace with which the movement began, as if to prepare for the exquisite "Aria" to follow.

This "Aria," beloved of violinists, is one of the most graceful and winsome of all musical utterances. It is susceptible of infinite and searching tenderness. The incomparable strings of the orchestra were most skilfully guided along the paths of peace by Dr. Koussevitzky, who imparted to his men the finest of interpretative artistry. Gavotte, Bourree and Gigue, in double time, full of contrapuntal weavings and glistening lustre showed perfection of orchestral and technical brilliance and rhythmic verve. Serious musicians and the public unite in their gratitude for so much of Bach, and for its splend presentation.

Sharp Contrast Offered

Never did medieval creature go forth on romantic conquest with more delectable musical voice than that which Debussy has furnished forth to his prelude. It is a far cry from the time of Debussy to that of Bach; it is a far different musical speech that these different composers employ to express their musical minds and clothe their message. When we add to the now famous whole-toned scale the new figures of melodic and harmonic invention which are original with Debussy, with his inimitable orchestral configurations, we have a method of musical expression very different from that of Mendelssohn.

In this, one of the most beautiful utterances of Debussy, the orchestra, through its gifted virtuosi revealed qualities of tone color and nuance that are well nigh indescribable. Consider the ravishing tones of the solo flute which begin the prelude and the muted horns and string tone, followed by the antique cymbal which bring this sublime work to a close.

It is superb performance such as this that glorifies composer, conductor and musicians.

Mr. Laurent, solo flutist, was twice called to acknowledge applause.

The charming and delicate "Scherzo" from Mendelssohn's incidental music to Midsummer Night's Dream was played with an airy lightness and finely spun shimmering that its fairy tale subject requires. The unmuted wood wind choir showed perfection of ensemble and eloquence of the individual voices that sing this beautiful orchestral toccata. This was surely a concert for the flutes and wood wind which are heard frequently in their perfection of tone and articulation in this Mendelssohn Scherzo and in their most compelling richness in the "Afternoon of a Faun."

The cordial response of the audience to the Mendelssohn number showed plainly that his compositions are still admired and his works enjoyed.

Music of Grandeur

From these moods of mystical and illusive necromancy we turn to music more solid and substantial and less visionary; to sterner poetic material, to colors more glaring in their contrasts and more positive in their declaration. No "program" has been ascribed to this colossal symphony of Brahms by composer or devotees.

One must make his own words to correspond if he would translate music into words, hence there is left only sense of massive grandeur, beautiful melody and throbbing impulse which finds expression of reaction and impression according to the taste and erudition of the hearer. Most musicians content to admire or worship without giving vent in emotion or delight a name. All ordinary adjectives of praise are soon exhausted as this symphony proceeds, because its moods are so varied, the solo instruments stand forth with such glowing beauties, the supporting contrapuntal weavings are so delicate and beautiful in their configurations and the musical form and texture of the work are so engrossing and fascinating. It is difficult to understand at this time why this symphony, which is now so popular and so admired, was, within easy memory, almost without champions or adherents, and even the composer himself was daunted. There are no arid wastes in this symphony, there is no cessation of interest as it proceeds, only increased attention and appreciation amounting to rapt fascination.

Brings Out New Values

Dr. Koussevitzky was particularly eloquent and persuasive in his treatment of the "Andante sostenuto," which he read more slowly than is his custom and with consummate interpretative insight he revealed every artistic phase of this movement and vitalized many entrances of melodic thought which are not always in evidence.

Nothing could be finer than the performance of this great symphony of last night. In massive ensemble, in plaintive appeal of the sonorous horns in the now familiar "horn motive," in tremulous strings and answering clarinet, the orchestra merited admiration and praise. We venture to say that no finer performance of this symphony was ever given anywhere.

Occasionally one hears, here and there a particularly fine English horn or oboe, an exceptionally fine flute or bass clarinet, a violin or 'cello of unusual tonal beauty, but rarely, as in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, does one hear so many players of unusual tonal and technical artistry in one organization. These features, together with the genius of the conductor go to make this the greatness of this orchestra

As this series of splendid concerts draws to a close everyone must feel a sense of gratitude to the Music Association whose painstaking liberality has made these concerts possible and whose continued interest vouchsafes another season of concerts from this magnificent orchestra.

PROGRAMME

Bach...Suite for Orchestra No. 3, in D major
I. Overture.
II. Air.
III. Gavotte I. Gavotte II.
IV. Bourree.
V. Gigue

Debussy...Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune
(Eglogue de S. Mallarme)
Prelude to the afternoon of a Faun
Eclogue by S. Mallarme

Mendelssohn...From the Incidental Music to Shakespeare's "Mid-summer Night's Dream"
Scherzo. Allegro vivace.

Brahms. Symphony No. 1 in C minor. Op. 68
I. Un poco sostenuto—allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 15 1931

Symphony Concert Season Concluded

Dr. Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra in Final Offering.

If simple fidelity is the greatest of tributes—and after all it is difficult to see what could be greater—Providence and Rhode Island last evening paid the most eloquent tribute possible to its ideal of the best in music. It was the fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's local season. The evening was perfect and spring had come. One could be forgiven for turning to some lighter entertainment, but if any one patron of the symphony concerts did so it was not apparent, for the Albee Theatre, as usual, was filled to overflowing with lovers of the best available anywhere in the world of music. The theatre is not large enough to hold any more than were present.

Unless one chooses to discuss Dr. Koussevitzky's programmes in an analytical mood or to consider his selections from the vantage ground of history, there is hardly anything to say in review of these concerts except words of praise. The Boston orchestra has been a great organization for many years. It is now ending its fiftieth year and only for brief periods has it faltered in its onward progress. Today, under the baton of the gifted Russian now its director, it probably is at its superlative best. Certainly it would seem impossible for any reasonable being to ask for a more beautiful performance than that of last evening.

Beginning with Bach's suite for orchestra, with its soothingly beautiful "Air," the second movement, the programme moved smoothly through the works of Debussy and Mendelssohn to Brahms, concluding with the Brahms first symphony in C minor. The Debussy number was the delightful "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and the Mendelssohn contribution was the familiar "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. These numbers were, of course, beautifully played, bringing the audience to the mood necessary for full enjoyment and appreciation of the symphony, the final number. It is sufficient to say that Dr. Koussevitzky interpreted Brahms with the same sympathy he would lend to one of his own Russians, and it is impossible to imagine anything more satisfying than the playing of the second movement, the andante sostenuto.

To say farewell to winter is not so easy for the devotee of the symphony concerts when he recalls that it means saying farewell to Dr. Koussevitzky and his great organization until another season

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 17 1931

Four Symphony Concerts Here Now Assured

Music Association Is Collecting Funds to Underwrite Expenses of Theatre

Four concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in this city next season virtually are assured, according to announcement by Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, which raises the money necessary to underwrite the expenses of the theatre at which the orchestra appears.

In response to letters sent by Mrs. Sharpe last month, a group of sponsors already have subscribed $3331 of the $4500 needed, Mrs. Sharpe said.

The underwriting of the Boston Symphony concerts, according to the Music Association, is separate from the the financing of the Community Concert Association series of concerts. The plan of the Community Concert Association, provides for a membership of 1500 persons whose membership dues will pay for a series of four or five concerts of outstanding character during the coming season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MUSICAL LEADER

* * *

The president of the Republic of Finland has awarded the cross of the Commander of the Order of the White Cross to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The decoration was conferred in token of Mr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for Finnish music in general and Jean Sibelius in particular.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH HERALD

APR 19 1931

The death, the other day, of Eugene Strasser, ont of the original members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, recalls an interesting little story published by Walter Kramer. Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the orchestra some few years ago, watched Strasser play first clarinet, then second clarinet and then bass clarinet. Finally the conductor called him in and said, "You are getting old." He went on to explain that the older he got the less proficient became his technical ability and said that he would have to discontinue to be an active member of the orchestra. To which Strasser replied, 'You are growing old, too." And the conductor said, "Oh yes, but one can always manage a little conducting." This was very evidently before the days when prima donna conductors reigned, when conducting was a gentle art, and when extravagant gestures were not used "in the concert hall but in the circus."

* * *

Mr. Kramer published two unemployment stories" which are certainly in a light vein. One concerns the Boston Symphony again. There was a second violin player who got into the orchestra at its beginning, firmly entrenched himself and went on fiddling for some thirty years, his peccadillos passing unnoticed in the midst of the second-violin section. But when Karl Muck of the sharp ears came, he singled out this fiddler and said, "I want to hear you play." The result of which was, that the fiddler received notice. But was he bitter and vengeful? Not he. He simply said, "Discovered at last!"

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

MAY 3 1931

In recognition of his many performances of music of Sibelius, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been decorated by the Finnish government.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

APR 19 1931

THANK OR CUSS, as you may, Don Azpiazu for bringing "The Peanut Vendor" to these parts. Now Don brings its successor, "The Voodoo," fast, furious, sinister, but provoking echo from the jungle. Atavistic it is, and so impressively native that Stokowski and Koussevitsky are arranging it for symphony in Philadelphia and Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

APR 22 1931

"OEDIPUS REX" GIVEN BY LEAGUE OF COMPOSERS

Stravinsky's Oratorio Staged with Philadelphia Orchestra.

ACTING BY MARIONETTES

New York Premiere of Ballet by Prokofieff on Same Program.

By PITTS SANBORN.

When the hounds of spring are on winter's traces and Mr. Gatti-Casazza's aviary is carolling its benison to the people of other cities the local League of Composers and the Philadelphia Orchestra have formed a pleasant habit of uniting in an important production at the deserted Metropolitan.

A year ago the distinguished collaborators introduced here "Die glueckliche Hand" by the problematic and alarming Arnold Schoenberg of Vienna, besides affording the first stage performance in New York of Stravinsky's ballet "Le Sacre du Printemps"

Last night they presented as their program what I presume was the first stage performance anywhere, except for the previous showing of this bill earlier in the month in Philadelphia, of Stravinsky's oratorio "Oedipus Rex," followed by the New York premiere of Serge Prokofieff's ballet, "Le Pas d'Acier."

Composed in 1927.

To the best of my belief Stravinsky never intended that his "Oedipus" should be staged otherwise than as an oratorio, or "static opera." Composed in 1927, it belongs to the "Back to Bach and Handel" period of the foremost Russian composer now living.

When Serge Koussevitzky, that untiring prophet of Stravinsky, gave it twice in New York in 1928 he treated it as a concert work in the regular course of the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall series.

The staging devised for last evening unmistakably stems from the Diaghileff production of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Coq d'Or," which was long a familiar sight at the Metropolitan. However, there are important differences.

Designs by Jones.

In "Le Coq d'Or" the singers were banked in two jury boxes, so to say, on either side of the stage, while members of the ballet mimed and danced in the intervening space.

In "Oedipus" the ranks of singers, uniformly garbed in blue, stretched across most of the stage, and the acting—what there was of it—was reserved for gigantic marionettes set off against a dark background behind and above the vocal host.

These were executed by Remo Bufano after the designs of Robert Edmond Jones, who was also responsible for the settings (principally invisible) and the costumes. Whether or not these figures, which were mercifully economical of movement, added to the effectiveness of "Oedipus" is a matter of individual taste.

Latin Text.

When Stravinsky decided to base on oratorio on the "Oedipus" of Sophocles, he abstained from taking the original play as text, either in Greek or in translation. Instead, that fellow of infinite wit, Jean Cocteau, provided him with a tabloid version, employing, of all things, Latin as its language.

Now, it's an extremely ticklish thing to slash into a play that is so spare and taut in its procedure, so inevitable in its logic, and so flawless in its finish as the "Oedipus" of Sophocles. I have been told that Stravinsky insisted on Latin as the language of the tabloid in order that the audience might never be diverted from the music by the words!

Without examining the various intimations of so droll a purpose, one may doubt the efficacy of the result. If only Cocteau had succeeded in making us oblivious of Stravinsky! The opening measures are indisputably impressive and so is the closing chorus. What goes on between these extremes seems to me at each repeated hearing less worth listening to at all.

Mme. Matzenauer Sings.

The majesty of Handel is far indeed from these largely trivial pages. They testify to a memory like a well stuffed scrap-bag and sometimes you cannot escape the suspicion that the composer is bent on seeing how shrewdly he can fool the public.

The entire part of Jocasta, sung last evening with superb breadth and musicianship by Mme. Matzenauer, sounded like a dreary burlesque of Donizetti and the early Verdi.

Leopold Stokowski seemed to have a gorgeous time conducting "Oedipus," and the Philadelphia Orchestra and a chorus from the Harvard University Glee Club both distinguished themselves under his guidance.

Althouse As Oedipus.

Besides Mme. Matzenauer the singers were Paul Althouse (Oedipus), M. Rudinov (Creon and a Messenger), Sigurd Nilssen (Tiresias), and Daniel Healy (a Shepard). The spoken narrative, which is a not inconsiderable part of the business, was delivered in round, lugubrious tones by Wayland Rudd, a Negro actor.

"Le Pas d'Acier" struck me as a far more vital affair than "Oedipus." This superiority was due first of all to Prokofieff's score. Were it not for the recent "Symphony of Psalms," I should be inclined to agree that Stravinsky, despite his orchestral virtuosity, ceased to be a composer with "Le Sacre du Printemps," in 1913. Certainly a rehash of leftovers like "Oedipus" is powerless to prove the contrary.

"The Age of Steel."

On the other hand, "Le Pas d'Acier," which yesterday's program freely rendered "The Age of Steel," possessed a spare, direct, incisive impetuosity that claimed your attention at the getaway and held it to the end. And Prokofieff's rhythm, Prokofieff's harmony, Prokofieff's instrumentation all had a distinguishing character of their own.

It seems that the composer's scenario for "Les Pas d'Acier" is a glorification of the age of steel. Lee Simonson, who did last night's scenario, as well as the settings and costumes, has seen fit to turn Prokofieff's tune into a mockery.

The machine moves on victorious at the expense of human dignity, human health, human happiness. "All is for the best in the best of all possible machine worlds. And the efficiency experts pirouette in triumph."

Eyeful and Earful.

Whether Mr. Simonson's ingenious satire, worked out in adroit choreography by Edwin Strawbridge, fits the music as well as Prokofieff's own scenario does the writer is unable to determine, never having seen the original. But yesterday it all seemed to hang together very well and certainly supplied both an eyeful and an earful.

A splendidly vivid orchestral performance under Mr. Stokowski was supplemented by an engrossing and symbolic stage picture, stretching up to a skyward opening like an inverted anvil, through which played in shadowy outlines a huge scythe and a huge hammer.

Of the mimes Edwin Strawbirdge and Yeichi Nimura embodied the Efficiency Experts; Pauline Koner, Grace Cornell and Ruth Wilton were respectively Steel, Iron and Coal; Martha Eaton, John Glenn and Mary Rivoire portrayed "Bucolic Laborers."

Who's Who of Music.

Besides all these, a Labor Leader, a Clergyman, Foreman, Wood Scouts, Uplift Army Leaders, Dowagers, Blue Cross Nurses, Flappers, College Professors, a Financier, Soldiers, a Human Belt, a Symbolic Belt and two Shadow Figures were pros and cons intrusted to the corps de ballet.

An audience that was a veritable "Who's Who" of music and the other arts crowded the Metropolitan and lavished applause.

This performance, which was given for the benefit of the National Music League and a Composers' Fund, will be followed by a repetition tonight constituting the last program in the annual New York series of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN

APR 22 1931

Stokowski Offers 'Oedipus Rex'

Stravinsky's Opera Oratorio Is Given Its First Stage Performance in New York.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Leopold Stokowski, with the Philadelphia Orchestra soloists, chorus and dancers, gave at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening, under the auspices of the League of Composers, the first New York stage performance of Stravinsky's opera oratorio "Oedipus Rex," book by Jean Cocteau, and Serge Prokofieff's ballet "Pas d'Acier" (called in English "The Age of Steel"). The former was given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky on March 8, 1928, in concert form and was received with recognition of its moments of deep impressiveness.

For the stage production last night the characters were represented by large puppets designed by Robert Edmond Jones and made by Remo Bufano, who directed their operation. The singers were massed on a lower level and shrouded in shadow. The narrator, who explains the story, was invisible. He was the Negro actor, Wayland Rudd. The principals in the vocal music were Mme. Matzenauer as Jocasta, which role she sang here at the concert performance in 1928; Paul Althouse as Oepidus, M. Rudinov as Creon and a messenger, Sigurd Nilssen as Tiresias and Daniel Healy as a shepherd. The choruses were sung by the Harvard University Glee Club.

For the Prokofieff ballet, which had a choreography by Massine when it was done by the Diaghileff Ballet in Paris four years ago, a new scenario, shifting the action to this country, had been made by Lee Simonson and a new choreography by Edwin Strawbridge, introducing efficiency experts, flappers and other figures of local character. The principal dancers and mimes in the production were Edwin Strawbridge and Yeichi Nimura as the efficiency gentlemen; Pauline Kroner as Steel, Grace Cornell as Iron, Ruth Wilton as Coal and Martha Eaton, John Glenn and Mary Rivoire as bucolic laborers.

Mr. Simonson's scenario shows us labor in an antique period working to slow and ponderous rhythms. Iron, coal and steel are liberated and the action speeds up. Bucolic figures dance. The bourgeoisie appears on the scene and joins in the dance. A clergyman and a labor leader make exhortations. Always the efficiency experts try to get more speed. The action grows swifter. The workers revolt and endeavor to strangle the bourgeoisie. Soldiers with tear bombs defeat them. They are driven back to the machine. The finale shows us labor enslaved to it, the bourgeoisie in satisfied contemplation and the orators discovering a new moral. And, as Mr. Simonson has put it, "the efficiency experts pirouette in triumph," as we suppose in a ballet an efficiency expert may properly do.

Those who know the lines of Prokofieff's music, its melodic curtness, its succinct phrases, its emphatic and staccato rhythms, will readily understand that in this ballet it should find a congenial field. Mr. Stokowski, waxing eloquent about it, said: "The regular throb of its rhythms, the clear, incisive orchestration, the long, swinging strokes of the musical fabric, stun and dazzle and bewilder and fascinate." This is good talk and fairly true. But possibly it may be convenient to defer profound critical ponderings till after the second performance which takes place tonight. For the present we may content ourselves with a word about the first impression of the work, not on the audience, already mostly committed to faith in the new thought in music, but on a disinterested seeker after the true in art if any one can recognize it when it is found.

The pantomime of action would have been meaningless without the explanatory program notes. With them it was seen to be well devised and pleasing to the eye. There are touches of humor and some bits of amusing satire in the work, as in the condescending efforts of the dowagers to interest themselves in the bucolic dance. But on the whole the action easily places itself in the class of "skyscrapers." Labor labors in the same way and machines drive men faster than handicraft.

As for Prokofieff's music it appeared to this listener to be a repetition of hammering rhythms and broken phraselogy long familiar to us in the compositions of this young Russian. Of course, we are going to hear again about brutal presentation of facts and stark realism or pitiless symbolism or whatever other ism happens to come along at the moment and make itself convenient. But the most stark and brutal fact is that there is precious little substance in this score and that the ballet is a mighty weak thing to have been created out of the dust and sweat and relentless rhythms of modern industrialism. Mass production and the machine have made labor no lighter, only faster. And there's a tragedy in that at which the ballet gives but a puerilo hint.

The ballet was well done. No one need be singled out for special praise. When [illegible] kowski got all out of the score that was in it. The light effects and general stage management were laudable. The audience was evidently interested; but one wonders how often the same persons would desire to witness the work.

Stravinsky's long and lugubrious treatment of one of the most powerful stories of the ancient Greek stage has been discussed before and may be again, but not today. It was not as compelling last evening as it was when done in concert form in Carnegie Hall. The fifteen-foot puppets were skillfully constructed and handled with discretion, but they added nothing to the value of the music. The solo voices did not sound as well as they did in the concert. Mme. Matzenauer's Jocasta was less steady and lost some of its tragic nobility. Paul Althouse delivered most of the Oedipus music well. But the vocal star of the performance was the Harvard Glee Club, which sang the choruses superbly. The audience made no imposing display of emotion after the impressive finale, the strongest page in the score. In fact, the production seemed to fall flat.

1,85

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN

APR 22 1931

MARY GARDEN'S PLANS

She Has Not Renewed Her Chicago Opera Contract.

While Mary Garden has not renewed her contract with the Chicago Civic Opera Company this year, she will sing again before American audiences, her representatives disclosed today.

For the first time in her varied operatic career, Miss Garden will sing with a symphony orchestra accompaniment. She will open under this new arrangement on October 23, when she plans to present a special De Bussey program with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

After filling a series of engagements with the Minneapolis orchestra, Miss Garden will present the same program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the first week in December. Her representative said she had reserved the season commencing December 28 for operatic appearances in New York.

No statement could be obtained as to whether Miss Garden had been approached with a contract by the Metropolitan Opera Company or whether she would, as has been reported, organize her own company in New York.

She will remain at her Monte Carlo estate until early October, arriving in New York about October 15.

Flats and Naturals

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

STRAVINSKY AND STOKOWSKI

THE audience of the staid old Metropolitan Opera House, unaccustomed to new and radical departures in the operatic arts, was treated to unprecedented sights and sounds last night in the stage premiere here of Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and Serge Prokofieff's "Pas D'Acier" ("Dance of the Age of Steel").

With Leopold Stokowski wielding the baton, ideas never previously attempted on any stage and in musical presentation in the history of the world gave an epochal aspect to the occasion. Awesome fifteen-foot figures appeared mysteriously from impenetrable shadows and moved and gestured high above the stage as protagonists in "Oedipus Rex," while soloists grouped on the stage with the entire personnel of the Harvard Glee Club, sang the various roles, the chorus impersonating the Greek populace.

Out front the Philadelphia Orchestra, cooperating with the League of Composers, played the instrumental music of Stravinsky's provocative and powerful score to this most famous tragedy of ancient Greece. At intervals, a greatly magnified voice boomed observations and explanations from loud speakers as Wayland Rudd, Negro actor, took the role of reader or speaker.

These difficult and dissimilar elements were coordinated with perfection under the alertly intense hands of Stokowski. The whole thing had nothing short of a hypnotic effect, for as the various roles were sung and declaimed by Paul Althous as Oedipus, Margaret Matzenauer as Jocasta, M. Rudinov doubling as Creon and the Messenger, Sigurd Nilssen as Tiresias and Daniel Healy as the shepherd, the eyes of all in the house were compellingly focused on the huge, inscrutable figures spotlighted above the stage, exponents of the grim, stark, classic tale of Sophocles upon fate and irony as Oedipus fulfills the prophecy of the Oracle that he would murder his father and marry his mother.

A curiously archaic quality is achieved by having the cast and chorus sing in Latin. Ordinarily this would make for utter unintelligibility, but the audience is fully prepared by the words of explanation uttered by the Reader from his vantage of invisibility.

A spectral effect was produced by the gaunt, enshrouding shadows in which the colossal figures—six in all—appeared to float. These were designed by Robert Edmond Jones and executed by Remo Bufano and were operated from the rear with, it was said, three men assigned to each.

The current staging had its American premiere in Philadelphia on April 10 to 13 and will be repeated at the Metropolitan to-night. While these performances are the first in stage form in this country, "Oedipus Rex" was given its premier with different staging by the Diaghileff Ballet Russe in Paris on May 30, 1927. In concert form it was played by the Boston Symphony several seasons ago.

In sharp contrast to "Oedipus Rex" followed Prokofieff's "Pas D'Acier" for which an entirely new scenario was provided by Lee Simonson. Both in musical material and pictorial and dramatic treatment the two works virtually represent opposite poles.

Where the music of "Oedipus" is stark, the music of Prokofieff for "The Age of Steel" is smartly satirical and where the pace of "Oedipus" is leisurely that of "The Age of Steel" is lively.

The work might be termed a Bolshevik ballet, for it is a satiric dance commentary on the rhythm of machine industry and its efficiency, visualized in an American environment. The choreography has been worked out in detail by Edwin Strawbridge. He and Yeichi Nimura present the leading roles of Efficiency Experts. They are supported by a corps de ballet of over sixty dancers. Three figures, Steel, Iron and Coal are personified by the Misses Pauline Koner, Grace Cornell and Ruth Wilton. Minor roles of peasants are enacted by Martha Eaton, John Glenn and Mary Rivoire. The stage is a free arrangement of various levels connected by ramps and with a background allowing for an impressive screen play of symbolic shadows.

The story of the ballet is briefly as follows: Human laborers driven by foremen go through weary motions on an upper level; first of primitive slave work, then of machine routine. Two efficiency experts try to stir them to faster movement. Below, a belt, symbolizing natural forces not yet liberated, heaves unformed. Three carefree bucolic figures enter; then the bourgeoisie—preachers, professors, flappers, etc., who dance with the peasants. Suddenly the three central figures of the symbolic belt, Coal, Iron and Steel, plunge into their midst and throw them into confusion. The efficiency experts unable to control the scene, strangle the peasants. Finally the human belt, animated to a point of frenzy, rush down in revolt. Their attempt to throttle the bourgeoisie is subdued by soldiers with bombs and gas masks. They return to their belt, to its monotonous routine, and the efficiency experts drive them on at an ever more rapid tempo.

Thus, this adroit and ingenious ballet presents a cynical survey of the grinding wheels of the machine age with red flags waving in revolution as the scythe and hammer, in gigantic silhouette, revolve relentlessly upon the backdrop.

The adaptation of this Prokofieff score to the contemporary American score contributes something definitely creative to the presentation of the work which was originally offered under totally different auspices in Paris in 1927 by the Ballet Russe. F. W. BUSCH.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

APR 22 1931

"OEDIPUS REX" GIVEN BY LEAGUE OF COMPOSERS

Stravinsky's Oratorio Staged with Philadelphia Orchestra.

ACTING BY MARIONETTES

New York Premiere of Ballet by Prokofieff on Same Program.

By PITTS SANBORN.

When the hounds of spring are on winter's traces and Mr. Gatti-Casazza's aviary is carolling its benison to the people of other cities the local League of Composers and the Philadelphia Orchestra have formed a pleasant habit of uniting in an important production at the deserted Metropolitan.

A year ago the distinguished collaborators introduced here "Die gluecklicne Hand" by the problematic and alarming Arnold Schoenberg of Vienna, besides affording the first stage performance in New York of Stravinsky's ballet "Le Sacre du Printemps"

Last night they presented as their program what I presume was the first stage performance anywhere, except for the previous showing of this bill earlier in the month in Philadelphia, of Stravinsky's oratorio "Oedipus Rex," followed by the New York premiere of Serge Prokofieff's ballet, "Le Pas d'Acier."

Composed in 1927.

To the best of my belief Stravinsky never intended that his "Oedipus" should be staged otherwise than as an oratorio, or "static opera." Composed in 1927, it belongs to the "Back to Bach and Handel" period of the foremost Russian composer now living.

When Serge Koussevitzky, that untiring prophet of Stravinsky, gave it twice in New York in 1928 he treated it as a concert work in the regular course of the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall series.

The staging devised for last evening unmistakably stems from the Diaghileff production of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Coq d'Or," which was long a familiar sight at the Metropolitan. However, there are important differences.

Designs by Jones.

In "Le Coq d'Or" the singers were banked in two jury boxes, so to say, on either side of the stage, while members of the ballet mimed and danced in the intervening space.

In "Oedipus" the ranks of singers, uniformly garbed in blue, stretched across most of the stage, and the acting—what there was of it—was reserved for gigantic marionettes set off against a dark background behind and above the vocal host.

These were executed by Remo Bufano after the designs of Robert Edmond Jones, who was also responsible for the settings (principally invisible) and the costumes. Whether or not these figures, which were mercifully economical of movement, added to the effectiveness of "Oedipus" is a matter of individual taste.

Latin Text.

When Stravinsky decided to base on oratorio on the "Oedipus" of Sophocles, he abstained from taking the original play as text, either in Greek or in translation. Instead, that fellow of infinite wit, Jean Cocteau, provided him with a tabloid version, employing, of all things, Latin as its language.

Now, it's an extremely ticklish thing to slash into a play that is so spare and taut in its procedure, so inevitable in its logic, and so flawless in its finish as the "Oedipus" of Sophocles. I have been told that Stravinsky insisted on Latin as the language of the tabloid in order that the audience might never be diverted from the music by the words!

Without examining the various intimations of so droll a purpose, one may doubt the efficacy of the result. If only Cocteau had succeeded in making us oblivious of Stravinsky! The opening measures are indisputably impressive and so is the closing chorus. What goes on between these extremes seems to me at each repeated hearing less worth listening to at all.

Mme. Matzenauer Sings.

The majesty of Handel is far indeed from these largely trivial pages. They testify to a memory like a well stuffed scrap-bag and sometimes you cannot escape the suspicion that the composer is bent on seeing how shrewdly he can fool the public.

The entire part of Jocasta, sung last evening with superb breadth and musicianship by Mme. Matzenauer, sounded like a dreary burlesque of Donizetti and the early Verdi.

Leopold Stokowski seemed to have a gorgeous time conducting "Oedipus," and the Philadelphia Orchestra and a chorus from the Harvard University Glee Club both distinguished themselves under his guidance.

Althouse As Oedipus.

Besides Mme. Matzenauer the singers were Paul Althouse (Oedipus), M. Rudinov (Creon and a Messenger), Sigurd Nilssen (Tiresias), and Daniel Healy (a Shepard). The spoken narrative, which is a not inconsiderable part of the business, was delivered in round, lugubrious tones by Wayland Rudd, a Negro actor.

"Le Pas d'Acier" struck me as a far more vital affair than "Oedipus." This superiority was due first of all to Prokofieff's score. Were it not for the recent "Symphony of Psalms," I should be inclined to agree that Stravinsky, despite his orchestral virtuosity, ceased to be a composer with "Le Sacre du Printemps," in 1913. Certainly a rehash of leftovers like "Oedipus" is powerless to prove the contrary.

"The Age of Steel."

On the other hand, "Le Pas d'Acier," which yesterday's program freely rendered "The Age of Steel," possessed a spare, direct, incisive impetuosity that claimed your attention at the getaway and held it to the end. And Prokofieff's rhythm, Prokofieff's harmony, Prokofieff's instrumentation all had a distinguishing character of their own.

It seems that the composer's scenario for "Les Pas d'Acier" is a glorification of the age of steel. Lee Simonson, who did last night's scenario, as well as the settings and costumes, has seen fit to turn Prokofieff's tune into a mockery.

The machine moves on victorious at the expense of human dignity, human health, human happiness. "All is for the best in the best of all possible machine worlds. And the efficiency experts pirouette in triumph."

Eyeful and Earful.

Whether Mr. Simonson's ingenious satire, worked out in adroit choreography by Edwin Strawbridge, fits the music as well as Prokofieff's own scenario does the writer is unable to determine, never having seen the original. But yesterday it all seemed to hang together very well and certainly supplied both an eyeful and an earful.

A splendidly vivid orchestral performance under Mr. Stokowski was supplemented by an engrossing and symbolic stage picture, stretching up to a skyward opening like an inverted anvil, through which played in shadowy outlines a huge scythe and a huge hammer.

Of the mimes Edwin Strawbirdge and Yeichi Nimura embodied the Efficiency Experts; Pauline Koner, Grace Cornell and Ruth Wilton were respectively Steel, Iron and Coal; Martha Eaton, John Glenn and Mary Rivoire portrayed "Bucolic Laborers."

Who's Who of Music.

Besides all these, a Labor Leader, a Clergyman, Foreman, Wood Scouts, Uplift Army Leaders, Dowagers, Blue Cross Nurses, Flappers, College Professors, a Financier, Soldiers, a Human Belt, a Symbolic Belt and two Shadow Figures were pros and cons intrusted to the corps de ballet.

An audience that was a veritable "Who's Who" of music and the other arts crowded the Metropolitan and lavished applause.

This performance, which was given for the benefit of the National Music League and a Composers' Fund, will be followed by a repetition tonight constituting the last program in the annual New York series of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN

APR 22 1931

Stokowski Offers 'Oedipus Rex'

Stravinsky's Opera Oratorio Is Given Its First Stage Performance in New York.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Leopold Stokowski, with the Philadelphia Orchestra soloists, chorus and dancers, gave at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening, under the auspices of the League of Composers, the first New York stage performance of Stravinsky's opera oratorio "Oedipus Rex," book by Jean Cocteau, and Serge Prokofieff's ballet "Pas d'Acier" (called in English "The Age of Steel"). The former was given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky on March 8, 1928, in concert form and was received with recognition of its moments of deep impressiveness.

For the stage production last night the characters were represented by large puppets designed by Robert Edmond Jones and made by Remo Bufano, who directed their operation. The singers were massed on a lower level and shrouded in shadow. The narrator, who explains the story, was invisible. He was the Negro actor, Wayland Rudd. The principals in the vocal music were Mme. Matzenauer as Jocasta, which role she sang here at the concert performance in 1928; Paul Althouse as Oepidus, M. Rudinov as Creon and a messenger, Sigurd Nilssen as Tiresias and Daniel Healy as a shepherd. The choruses were sung by the Harvard University Glee Club.

For the Prokofieff ballet, which had a choreography by Massine when it was done by the Diaghileff Ballet in Paris four years ago, a new scenario, shifting the action to this country, had been made by Lee Simonson and a new choreography by Edwin Strawbridge, introducing efficiency experts, flappers and other figures of local character. The principal dancers and mimes in the production were Edwin Strawbridge and Yeichi Nimura as the efficiency gentlemen; Pauline Kroner as Steel, Grace Cornell as Iron, Ruth Wilton as Coal and Martha Eaton, John Glenn and Mary Rivoire as bucolic laborers.

Mr. Simonson's scenario shows us labor in an antique period working to slow and ponderous rhythms. Iron, coal and steel are liberated and the action speeds up. Bucolic figures dance. The bourgeoisie appears on the scene and joins in the dance. A clergyman and a labor leader make exhortations. Always the efficiency experts try to get more speed. The action grows swifter. The workers revolt and endeavor to strangle the bourgeoisie. Soldiers with tear bombs defeat them. They are driven back to the machine. The finale shows us labor enslaved to it, the bourgeoisie in satisfied contemplation and the orators discovering a new moral. And, as Mr. Simonson has put it, "the efficiency experts pirouette in triumph," as we suppose in a ballet an efficiency expert may properly do.

Those who know the lines of Prokofieff's music, its melodic curtness, its succinct phrases, its emphatic and staccato rhythms, will readily understand that in this ballet it should find a congenial field. Mr. Stokowski, waxing eloquent about it, said: "The regular throb of its rhythms, the clear, incisive orchestration, the long, swinging strokes of the musical fabric, stun and dazzle and bewilder and fascinate." This is good talk and fairly true. But possibly it may be convenient to defer profound critical ponderings till after the second performance which takes place tonight. For the present we may content ourselves with a word about the first impression of the work, not on the audience, already mostly committed to faith in the new thought in music, but on a disinterested seeker after the true in art if any one can recognize it when it is found.

The pantomime of action would have been meaningless without the explanatory program notes. With them it was seen to be well devised and pleasing to the eye. There are touches of humor and some bits of amusing satire in the work, as in the condescending efforts of the dowagers to interest themselves in the bucolic dance. But on the whole the action easily places itself in the class of "skyscrapers." Labor labors in the same way and machines drive men faster than handicraft.

As for Prokofieff's music it appeared to this listener to be a repetition of hammering rhythms and broken phraselogy long familiar to us in the compositions of this young Russian. Of course, we are going to hear again about brutal presentation of facts and stark realism or pitiless symbolism or whatever other ism happens to come along at the moment and make itself convenient. But the most stark and brutal fact is that there is precious little substance in this score and that the ballet is a mighty weak thing to have been created out of the dust and sweat and relentless rhythms of modern industrialism. Mass production and the machine have made labor no lighter, only faster. And there's a tragedy in that at which the ballet gives but a puerilo hint.

The ballet was well done. No one need be singled out for special praise. Where Stokowski got all out of the score that was in it. The light effects and general stage management were laudable. The audience was evidently interested; but one wonders how often the same persons would desire to witness the work.

Stravinsky's long and lugubrious treatment of one of the most powerful stories of the ancient Greek stage has been discussed before and may be again, but not today. It was not as compelling last evening as it was when done in concert form in Carnegie Hall. The fifteen-foot puppets were skillfully constructed and handled with discretion, but they added nothing to the value of the music. The solo voices did not sound as well as they did in the concert. Mme. Matzenauer's Jocasta was less steady and lost some of its tragic nobility. Paul Althouse delivered most of the Oedipus music well. But the vocal star of the performance was the Harvard Glee Club, which sang the choruses superbly. The audience made no imposing display of emotion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

APR 22 1931

Sharps, Flats and Naturals

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

STRAVINSKY AND STOKOWSKI

THE audience of the staid old Metropolitan Opera House, unaccustomed to new and radical departures in the operatic arts, was treated to unprecedented sights and sounds last night in the stage premiere here of Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and Serge Prokofieff's "Pas D'Acier" ("Dance of the Age of Steel").

With Leopold Stokowski wielding the baton, ideas never previously attempted on any stage and in musical presentation in the history of the world gave an epochal aspect to the occasion. Awesome fifteen-foot figures appeared mysteriously from impenetrable shadows and moved and gestured high above the stage as protagonists in "Oedipus Rex," while soloists grouped on the stage with the entire personnel of the Harvard Glee Club, sang the various roles, the chorus impersonating the Greek populace.

Out front the Philadelphia Orchestra, cooperating with the League of Composers, played the instrumental music of Stravinsky's provocative and powerful score to this most famous tragedy of ancient Greece. At intervals, a greatly magnified voice boomed observations and explanations from loud speakers as Wayland Rudd, Negro actor, took the role of reader or speaker.

These difficult and dissimilar elements were coordinated with perfection under the alertly intense hands of Stokowski. The whole thing had nothing short of a hypnotic effect, for as the various roles were sung and declaimed by Paul Althous as Oedipus, Margaret Matzenauer as Jocasta, M. Rudinov doubling as Creon and the Messenger, Sigurd Nilssen as Tiresias and Daniel Healy as the shepherd, the eyes of all in the house were compellingly focused on the huge, inscrutable figures spotlighted above the stage, exponents of the grim, stark, classic tale of Sophocles upon fate and irony as Oedipus fulfills the prophecy of the Oracle that he would murder his father and marry his mother.

A curiously archaic quality is achieved by having the cast and chorus sing in Latin. Ordinarily this would make for utter unintelligibility, but the audience is fully prepared by the words of explanation uttered by the Reader from his vantage of invisibility.

A spectral effect was produced by the gaunt, enshrouding shadows in which the colossal figures—six in all—appeared to float. These were designed by Robert Edmond Jones and executed by Remo Bufano and were operated from the rear with, it was said, three men assigned to each.

The current staging had its American premiere in Philadelphia on April 10 to 13 and will be repeated at the Metropolitan to-night. While these performances are the first in stage form in this country, "Oedipus Rex" was given its premier with different staging by the Diaghileff Ballet Russe in Paris on May 30, 1927. In concert form it was played by the Boston Symphony several seasons ago.

In sharp contrast to "Oedipus Rex" followed Prokofieff's "Pas D'Acier" for which an entirely new scenario was provided by Lee Simonson. Both in musical material and pictorial and dramatic treatment the two works virtually represent opposite poles.

Where the music of "Oedipus" is stark, the music of Prokofieff for "The Age of Steel" is smartly satirical and where the pace of "Oedipus" is leisurely that of "The Age of Steel" is lively.

The work might be termed a Bolshevik ballet, for it is a satiric dance commentary on the rhythm of machine industry and its efficiency, visualized in an American environment. The choreography has been worked out in detail by Edwin Strawbridge. He and Yeichi Nimura present the leading roles of Efficiency Experts. They are supported by a corps de ballet of over sixty dancers. Three figures, Steel, Iron and Coal are personified by the Misses Pauline Koner, Grace Cornell and Ruth Wilton. Minor roles of peasants are enacted by Martha Eaton, John Glenn and Mary Rivoire. The stage is a free arrangement of various levels connected by ramps and with a background allowing for an impressive screen play of symbolic shadows.

The story of the ballet is briefly as follows: Human laborers driven by foremen go through weary motions on an upper level; first of primitive slave work, then of machine routine. Two efficiency experts try to stir them to faster movement. Below, a belt, symbolizing natural forces not yet liberated, heaves unformed. Three carefree bucolic figures enter; then the bourgeoisie—preachers, professors, flappers, etc., who dance with the peasants. Suddenly the three central figures of the symbolic belt, Coal, Iron and Steel, plunge into their midst and throw them into confusion. The efficiency experts unable to control the scene, strangle the peasants. Finally the human belt, animated to a point of frenzy, rush down in revolt. Their attempt to throttle the bourgeoisie is subdued by soldiers with bombs and gas masks. They return to their belt, to its monotonous routine, and the efficiency experts drive them on at an ever more rapid tempo.

Thus, this adroit and ingenious ballet presents a cynical survey of the grinding wheels of the machine age with red flags waving in revolution as the scythe and hammer, in gigantic silhouette, revolve relentlessly upon the backdrop.

The adaptation of this Prokofieff score to the contemporary American score contributes something definitely creative to the presentation of the work which was originally offered under totally different auspices in Paris in 1927 by the Ballet Russe. F. W. BUSCH.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN

1,85

APR 22 1931

MARY GARDEN'S PLANS

She Has Not Renewed Her Chicago Opera Contract.

While Mary Garden has not renewed her contract with the Chicago Civic Opera Company this year, she will sing again before American audiences, her representatives disclosed today.

For the first time in her varied operatic career, Miss Garden will sing with a symphony orchestra accompaniment. She will open under this new arrangement on October 23, when she plans to present a special De Bussey program with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

After filling a series of engagements with the Minneapolis orchestra, Miss Garden will present the same program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the first week in December. Her representative said she had reserved the season commencing December 28 for operatic appearances in New York.

No statement could be obtained as to whether Miss Garden had been approached with a contract by the Metropolitan Opera Company or whether she would, as has been reported, organize her own company in New York.

She will remain at her Monte Carlo estate until early October, arriving in New York about October 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 22 1931

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

LAST evening at the Metropolitan Opera House the League of Composers invited the attention of its New York clientele to the productions of Strawinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and Prokofieff's "Pas d'Acier," which it had prepared in collaboration with the Philadelphia Orchestra Association and exhibited in Philadelphia a week or more ago. Both works—the one an opera-oratorio, the other a ballet—were elaborately mounted, and performed with the distinguished assistance of Mr. Leopold Stokowski and of several vocal soloists, a large chorus and a numerous corps of dancers.

* * *

Curiously enough, both "Oedipus Rex" and "Le Pas d'Acier" were composed in 1926-27. The premieres, given in Paris by the Diaghilew troupe, occurred within a week of one another—that of "Oedipus" on the 30th of May, that of "Le Pas d'Acier" on the 7th of June, 1927. Both are the works of Russian composers of, roughly, the same generation and of nearly equal prominence among their contemporaries. Yet in character and intention they are radically dissimilar — Strawinsky's "Oedipus," static in form, objective in ideal; Prokofieff's "Pas d'Acier," vigorously dynamic and highly emotional in its appeal; the one an experiment in neo-classicism along Handelian lines, the other an attempt to apotheosize the machine in music.

* * *

Strawinsky's "Oedipus Rex" was first performed in New York in concert form by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, in March of 1928. It will suffice to recall that the text, by Jean Cocteau, paraphrases the tragedy by Sophocles, is sung in Latin, and that from time to time pauses in the music permit a Speaker (whose role is similar to that of the Evangelist in classic Passion oratorio) to interpret the action of the drama to the audience. Musically, the work has the form of oratorio: it was the intention of the authors that it should be presented with a minimum of operatic effect.

* * *

Last evening this intention was admirably realized. The production, devised by Robert Edmond Jones, employed marionettes of heroic size to represent the characters of the tragedy—Oedipus, Jocasta, Tiresias, Creon. Softly illuminated, appearing in silhouette against a dark background, these puppets enacted the visible action of the drama in few and stately gestures; below them, on the stage, were indistinctly grouped the singers interpreting their words, and the chorus, which in Strawinsky's "Oedipus" Greek-wise makes its commentary on the events of the play. Mr. Jones was happily inspired in this scheme for staging "Oedipus," for the results of the experiment were not only novel, they were also both beautiful and appropriate. Musically, the performance reflected greatly to the credit of Mr. Stokowski and his orchestra, and of the Harvard Glee Club. The soloists contributed rather less to its distinction—though among them were Mme. Matzenauer and Mr. Althouse, artists both from whom better was to be expected than they gave.

* * *

Prokofieff's "Pas d'Acier" was last evening not only seen, it was also heard for the first time in New York. A suite from the score of this ballet has been prepared for concert performance, but Mr. Koussewitsky, who introduced it to this country some time ago, neglected to give New York as well as Boston an opportunity to hear it. The diversion provided last evening by the action of the ballet prevented a proper assimilation of the music; the score is not, however, among Prokofieff's most impressive recent productions. It is rhythmically vigorous, melodically fertile, brilliantly constructed and instrumentated, but the quality of the invention that it reveals is inferior to that which Prokofieff has exhibited in other works.

* * *

The scenario of "Le Pas d'Acier," as well as the setting and the costumes for the production, was devised by Lee Simonson. Mr. Simonson allows himself the liberty of interpreting Prokofieff's score as a satire on the machine age: "Le Pas d'Acier" as he conceived it, as it was last evening set forth in choreographic patterns composed by Edwin Strawbridge and ealized by several solo dancers and a large corps de ballet, visualizes the struggle of Labor against the dehumanizing influence of the machine and against the tyranny of a machine civilization incarnate in two Efficiency Experts (danced by Mr. Strawbridge and Yeichi Nimura). Several of Mr. Simonson's satirical shafts are aimed at the bourgeoise, whose stupidity and hypocrisy and vain pretensions are objects of his ridicule. It was wise, however, of the league to provide in the program for the performance a synopsis of the action of the ballet, for otherwise it is improbable that it would have been possible for the audience to realize Mr. Simonson's intention. The choreography of the ballet was extremely unimaginative and its realization hopelessly confused. Nor were Mr. Simonson's setting and costumes particularly striking. Surely an artist as gifted as he might have done better with the opportunities provided by "Le Pas d'Acier." It was again to Mr. Stokowski and the players of the Philadelphia Orchestra that the audience was indebted for what pleasure it derived from the performance.

'Oedipus Rex'

Opera-oratorio, text by Jean Cocteau, music by Igor Strawinsky.

THE CAST

Jocasta.....Margaret Matzenauer
Oedipus.....Paul Althouse
Crean.....M. Rudinov
Messenger.....M. Rudinov
Tiresias.....Sigurd Nilssen
Shepherd.....Daniel Healey
The Reader.....Wayland Rudd

Production designed by Robert Edmond Jones; puppets executed by Remo Buffano. Chorus from the Harvard University Glee Club.

'Le Pas d'Acier'

Ballet by Serge Prokofieff. Scenario by Lee Simonson, choreography by Edwin Strawbridge.

THE CAST

Efficiency Experts,
Edwin Strawbridge, Yeichi Nimura
Steel.....Pauline Koner
Iron.....Grace Cornell
Coal.....Ruth Wilton
Bucolic Laborers,
Martha Eaton, John Glenn, Mary Rivoire

Corps de ballet representing Labor and the Bourgeoise. Production designed by Lee Simonson.

Both "Oedipus Rex" and "Pas d'Acier" conducted by Leopold Stokowski.

Presented at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening by the League of Composers, in collaboration with the Philadelphia Orchestra Association and Mr. Stokowski.

A New Book

"THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: 1881-1931"

Semi-Centennial Edition, combining a revision of M. A. De Wolfe Howe's book of 1914, with new chapters and appendices, carrying the narrative and record of the Orchestra through fifty years.

At leading bookstores, or by application to Symphony Hall, Boston

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 23 1931

Mary Garden to Appear With Concert Orchestras

Also Reported Quitting Chicago to Return to Opera Here

While Mary Garden has not renewed her contract with the Chicago Civic Opera Company for next season, she is planning to reappear in opera in New York after devoting the fall to concert appearances, it was reported yesterday in a statement made to the Associated Press, by representatives of the singer.

For the first time in her varied career, it was stated, Miss Garden will sing with a symphony orchestra accompaniment, beginning with an appearance with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on October 23, when she will present a special Debussy program. After engagements with this orchestra, she will also be heard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the first week of December. Her representatives said that she had reserved the season beginning December 28 for operatic appearances in New York. She will remain at her Monte Carlo estate until early October, arriving here about October 15.

Charles L. Wagner, concert manager for Miss Garden, confirmed the announcement of her concert plans, and added the Cleveland Orchestra to the list of orchestras with which she will appear. He said it was probable that Miss Garden would be heard in opera, in New York and on tour, after December 28, but was not able to say whether it would be with an existing or a specially recruited organization, or with a company brought from Europe. He also thought it probable that if she appeared here in opera she would add several roles to those in which she already has been heard in New York.

Officials of the Metropolitan Opera Company said that no overtures had been made to Miss Garden to appear with that organization next season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
APR 23 1931

MARY GARDEN TO GIVE PROGRAMS OF DEBUSSY

Concerts Will Engage Diva's Time, but Manager Hints at Opera Appearance Here.

Mary Garden, whose retirement from the Chicago Civic Opera Company has just been announced, has no intention of retiring from opera or of giving so-called farewell recitals, Charles L. Wagner, concert manager, who has been associated with the singer in the past, announced yesterday.

The diva's engagements next season will be divided between her appearances in opera and those with symphony orchestras. For the first time in her career she will be able to do, according to Mr. Wagner, what she has always greatly desired, but could find no time for—that is, to give all-Debussy programs with symphony orchestras. It will be recalled that her last appearance in New York was an all-Debussy program with Walter Gieseking on Oct. 25 at Carnegie Hall and that she was chosen by the French composer to create the rôle of Mélisande in "Pelléas et Mélisande" in 1902 and that he composed especially for her his "Ariette" and "Green."

Miss Garden intends to return to this country on Oct. 15 to appear with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 23 and to present the same Debussy program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra early in December. Between these two engagements she will fill concert engagements in various localities.

The singer's time after Dec. 28 will be reserved for operatic appearances in New York, though no statement was vouchsafed whether these included participation in the presentations of the Metropolitan Opera Company, or whether she plans to organize her own company, as did Melba and Geraldine Farrar. The information that Miss Garden is planning to study the rôle of Kundry in Wagner's "Parsifal" was, however, elicited.

Until Miss Garden returns to the United States she plans to remain at her Monte Carlo estate. She has been appearing in operatic performances at the Opéra in that city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been awarded the Cross of Commander of the Order of the White Cross, the highest honor of the Finnish government.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL
APR 24 1931

Orchestral Season Shows Dearth Of New Music of Value and Supremacy

By IRVING WEIL.

[illegible] Philadelphia they have

NOVELTIES DISAPPOINTING.

The search of orchestral conductors for novelties seems generally to be disappointingly rewarded. The Philharmonic's four conductors brought forward twenty-two new works during the season. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, on their visits here, introduced a half dozen more. And there were still a few thing older and better, or intrinsically too second-rate (for, unfortunately, there are numerous degrees of the second-rate).

Igor Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra was little better than trivial and his "Symphony of the Psalms," although touched with the man's immense talent here and there, displayed a recession of his powers. Both were Mr. Koussevitzky's choice.

The most striking and forceful new works played here this year, according to our own notion, were the excerpts from the Austrian, Alban Berg's opera, "Wozzek" (introduced by Erich Kleiber at the beginning of the Philharmonic season), and Albert Roussel's symphony in G-minor, written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Orchestra and offered by Mr. Koussevitzky. Both revealed talent of the first order. Ildebrando Pizzetti's "Introduction to the 'Agamemnon' of Aeschylus," given a world-premiere by Mr. Toscanini, was excellently made and rather impressive, but without any real originality.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
APR 24 1931

LEFT-HANDED COMPLIMENT.

Arthur Nikish, a former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was once invited to conduct an orchestra in Milan, Italy, at that time presided over by the eminent Toscanini. After the performance Toscanini congratulated Nikish.

"Excellent, my dear man, excellent!" he assured him, with a pat on the shoulder.

"Oh, no," replied Nikish, gracefully, "you know your orchestra is exceptionally good!"

"Well, no," Toscanini replied thoughtfully. "The orchestra did not play so well, but you, my friend conducted wonderfully!"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
APR 25 1931

BOSTON GREETS PRINCE, UNDER HEAVY GUARD

Takamatsu and Bride Are Officially Welcomed—Attend Concert and State Dinner.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, April 24.—Still heavily guarded by police on the strength of reported plots ranging from assassination to Communist demonstrations, Prince Takamatsu and his bride visited the State House and City Hall today, attended a gala performance of the Boston Symphony concert this afternoon and ended their day at a State dinner this evening.

Mayor James M. Curley presided at the banquet and Governor Joseph B. Ely extended a welcome from the State.

Prince Takamatsu, long before reaching Boston, had expressed a wish to hear the symphony orchestra and a special box in the second balcony, made possible because several regular patrons freely gave up their season seats for the occasion, was occupied by the royal party. Both the Prince and Princess applauded frequently. The Princess continued her handclapping, after her husband had ceased, in particular delight at the piano solo by Jesus Maria Sanroma.

At the City Hall both occupied the Mayor's chair for a brief moment while they signed the visitors' book.

Governor Ely presented the Prince with a gold paper cutter, bearing the seal of the Commonwealth, and a shining new penny. The Governor drew one of the infrequent smiles which occasionally lighten the Prince's face when he explained that a sharp article must be presented only with a penny as guarantee that friendship will not be cut.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.

[illegible]AL COUPLE "RUSHED" [illegible]Y CONCERT AUDIENCE

[illegible]te" and "A Knockout" by Thousands [illegible]am—Would Like to Attend Tonight

[illegible]terday
[illegible] party,
Prince
[illegible]ularly
[illegible]arked
The [illegible]cute," [illegible]e on-
[illegible]vored
[illegible]lation
[illegible]n the [illegible]anese
[illegible]people
[illegible]ts at [illegible] tney
[illegible]s not some-
[illegible]mong
[illegible]e was scene.
[illegible]l offi-
[illegible]' offi-
as in-
Takassion.
the cus-

[illegible] usually observes, but this time he was more than usually eloquent.

The Princess is one of the most charming visitors Boston has ever had. She has American mannerisms, walks like a happy, energetic American girl instead of with mincing steps as one might possibly expect in a Japanese young woman. She blushes and smiles, letting her big brown eyes play over the new scenes before her, enjoying it all to the full.

Princess in Red

Her choice of apparel yesterday afternoon made her easily distinguishable in the large party which accompanied the Prince and Princess. Her little red straw hat could be seen beyond the myriads of heads looking in her direction. It marked her in the geographic center of the royal party in the improvised box on the right first balcony at Symphony Hall, but more than that it was wonderfully becoming. The hat perfectly matched a long cherry red flat crepe dress figured in flecks of white and blue for all the world as if confetti had been showered over it.

It might seem a hardship for an American bride and groom on a honeymoon to be followed everywhere by a large party of attendants and dignitaries, added to in every country by more escorts and guards for courtesy's and safety's sake.

The Prince and Princess with their suite occupy nearly the entire fourth floor of the Copley Plaza. There are ladies in waiting, valets, secretaries, the official doctor, a comptroller a master of ceremonies, consuls, so that when the royal party is about to go anywhere Japanese and a few American escorts emerge from doors in every direction to accompany the royal couple. The ladies in waiting are very attractive also. They wear either black or black, white and gray.

Neither the Prince nor Princess seem the least bit disturbed by the perpetual round of festivities which attend their wedding tour. They can both speak English, so that they carry on an animated conversation with hosts and hostesses, avoiding any awkward dead silence in formal moments. Otherwise they are rather quiet.

Talks With Koussevitsky

Prince Takamatsu discussed music with Director Koussevitzky while Princess Takamatsu, Mrs Koussevitzky and Mrs N. Penrose Hallowell were conversing. The Prince said he enjoyed the symphony so well he should like to attend the concert "tomorrow night," meaning this (Saturday) evening. It is doubtful if the royal party will attend as there is a formal reception at Gardner Museum at the same time. Few spare moments have been left on the program during the visit of the democratic Japanese couple in this city.

The bride and groom had been escorted to Symphony Hall from the Copley-Plaza by Courtenay Crocker of the Japanese Society, and met by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mr and Mrs N. Penrose Hallowell, Mr and Mrs William Phillips and Edward M. Pickman of the trustees, who greeted them and went with them to the improvised box, where the ordinary seats had been removed and blue leather upholstered chairs placed. The box arrangement was marked by a gilded railing, maroon velvet draperies and oriental rugs.

An office on the same floor, directly across the corridor from the door to the "box" was furnished for the occasion in Colonial antiques and decorated with Spring flowers and Japanese cherry blossoms.

Japanese cherry trees in bloom, Japanese quince bushes in pots are used profusely in the suite at the hotel to make the couple feel more at home, and, while they were away attending the concert, dozens of men were busy twining wisterias, cherry blossoms and quince blossoms into a floral setting appropriate for the formal dinner last evening.

In connection with that event the Japanese visitors were much like anybody in one respect certainly. They were talking yesterday morning about what they would wear to it.

The Prince dislikes ostentatious progress in American traffic. He wishes the chauffeurs to obey traffic signals—insists upon it. Making them stop at the Tremont and Boylston-st intersections was a notable incident, and after that the custom of halting where lights turned red was observed to the letter. Guards do not ride on the running board either. The guards are on hand, surrounding the party, but in other cars. Anything that savors of undue pomp and circumstance is not in keeping with the simple tastes of the small, smiling pair.

They like simple food also. Dishes of ever so complicated delicacies are passed by on the menu in favor of plain roasts, slices of chicken, steak, lamb. Strawberries and cream are more to their liking than ice cream.

They say "good morning" to the elevator boy, or "good evening," as it happens, and the white painted wheel which controls the elevator cables is cause for their conjecture. Their conversation about it is in Japanese, but the inference is that the Princess has dared the Prince to persuade the elevator boy into letting the Prince experiment with the large wheel and see what happens.

In order to make the entrance and exit of the party as untroubled by throngs as possible, a special exit at the rear of Symphony Hall was opened for the party yesterday. Crowds awaited in the street and upstairs there were throngs of the regular Friday afternoon symphony-goers agog for a glimpse of royalty.

A spontaneous reception was accorded them as they stepped down into the "box." The audience applauded, the orchestra stood in their honor. The couple were on time to the dot.

During the entire concert the Prince and Princess were alert, sitting erect and visibly attentive. The Princess clapped approval. She held in her lap a bouquet of rare orchids, presented her from Mr and Mrs Ernest B. Dane, who have exceptionally fine private conservatories. Mr Dane is treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 22 1931

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

LAST evening at the Metropolitan Opera House the League of Composers invited the attention of its New York clientele to the productions of Strawinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and Prokofieff's "Pas d'Acier," which it had prepared in collaboration with the Philadelphia Orchestra Association and exhibited in Philadelphia a week or more ago. Both works—the one an opera-oratorio, the other a ballet—were elaborately mounted, and performed with the distinguished assistance of Mr. Leopold Stokowski and of several vocal soloists, a large chorus and a numerous corps of dancers.

* * *

Curiously enough, both "Oedipus Rex" and "Le Pas d'Acier" were composed in 1926-27. The premieres, given in Paris by the Diaghilew troupe, occurred within a week of one another—that of "Oedipus" on the 30th of May, that of "Le Pas d'Acier" on the 7th of June, 1927. Both are the works of Russian composers of, roughly, the same generation and of nearly equal prominence among their contemporaries. Yet in character and intention they are radically dissimilar — Strawinsky's "Oedipus," static in form, objective in ideal; Prokofieff's "Pas d'Acier," vigorously dynamic and highly emotional in its appeal; the one an experiment in neo-classicism along Handelian lines, the other an attempt to apotheosize the machine in music.

* * *

Strawinsky's "Oedipus Rex" was first performed in New York in concert form by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, in March of 1928. It will suffice to recall that the text, by Jean Cocteau, paraphrases the tragedy by Sophocles, is sung in Latin, and that from time to time pauses in the music permit an Speaker (whose role is similar to that of the Evangelist in classic Passion oratorio) to interpret the action of the drama to the audience. Musically, the work has the form of oratorio; it was the intention of the authors that it should be presented with a minimum of operatic effect.

* * *

Last evening this intention was admirably realized. The production, devised by Robert Edmond Jones, employed marionettes of heroic size to represent the characters of the tragedy—Oedipus, Jocasta, Tiresias, Creon. Softly illuminated, appearing in silhouette against a dark background, these puppets enacted the visible action of the drama in few and stately gestures; below them, on the stage, were indistinctly grouped the singers interpreting their words, and the chorus, which in Strawinsky's "Oedipus" Greek-wise makes its commentary on the events of the play. Mr. Jones was happily inspired in this scheme for staging "Oedipus," for the results of the experiment were not only novel, they were also both beautiful and appropriate. Musically, the performance reflected greatly to the credit of Mr. Stokowski and his orchestra, and of the Harvard Glee Club. The soloists contributed rather less to its distinction—though among them were Mme. Matzenauer and Mr. Althouse, artists both from whom better was to be expected than they gave.

* * *

Prokofieff's "Pas d'Acier" was last evening not only seen, it was also heard for the first time in New York. A suite from the score of this ballet has been prepared for concert performance, but Mr. Koussewitsky, who introduced it to this country some time ago, neglected to give New York as well as Boston an opportunity to hear it. The diversion provided last evening by the action of the ballet prevented a proper assimilation of the music; the score is not, however, among Prokofieff's most impressive recent productions. It is rhythmically vigorous, melodically fertile, brilliantly constructed and instrumentated, but the quality of the invention that it reveals is inferior to that which Prokofieff has exhibited in other works.

* * *

The scenario of "Le Pas d'Acier," as well as the setting and the costumes for the production, was devised by Lee Simonson. Mr. Simonson allows himself the liberty of interpreting Prokofieff's score as a satire on the machine age: "Le Pas d'Acier" as he conceived it, as it was last evening set forth in choreographic patterns composed by Edwin Strawbridge and ealized by several solo dancers and a large corps de ballet, visualizes the struggle of Labor against the dehumanizing influence of the machine and against the tyranny of a machine civilization incarnate in two Efficiency Experts (danced by Mr. Strawbridge and Yeichi Nimura). Several of Mr. Simonson's satirical shafts are aimed at the bourgeoise, whose stupidity and hypocrisy and vain pretensions are objects of his ridicule. It was wise, however, of the league to provide in the program for the performance a synopsis of the action of the ballet, for otherwise it is improbable that it would have been possible for the audience to realize Mr. Simonson's intention. The choreography of the ballet was extremely unimaginative and its realization hopelessly confused. Nor were Mr. Simonson's setting and costumes particularly striking. Surely an artist as gifted as he might have done better with the opportunities provided by "Le Pas d'Acier." It was again to Mr. Stokowski and the players of the Philadelphia Orchestra that the audience was indebted for what pleasure it derived from the performance.

'Oedipus Rex'

Opera-oratorio, text by Jean Cocteau, music by Igor Strawinsky.

THE CAST

Jocasta.....Margaret Matzenauer
Oedipus.....Paul Althouse
Creon.....M. Rudinov
Messenger.....M. Rudinov
Tiresias.....Sigurd Nilssen
Shepherd.....Daniel Healey
The Reader.....Wayland Rudd

Production designed by Robert Edmond Jones; puppets executed by Remo Buffano. Chorus from the Harvard University Glee Club.

'Le Pas d'Acier'

Ballet by Serge Prokofieff. Scenario by Lee Simonson, choreography by Edwin Strawbridge.

THE CAST

Efficiency Experts,
Edwin Strawbridge, Yeichi Nimura
Steel.....Pauline Koner
Iron.....Grace Cornell
Coal.....Ruth Wilton
Bucolic Laborers,
Martha Eaton, John Glenn, Mary Rivoire

Corps de ballet representing Labor and the Bourgeoise. Production designed by Lee Simonson.

Both "Oedipus Rex" and "Pas d'Acier" conducted by Leopold Stokowski.

Presented at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening by the League of Composers, in collaboration with the Philadelphia Orchestra Association and Mr. Stokowski.

A New Book

"THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: 1881-1931"

Semi-Centennial Edition, combining a revision of M. A. De Wolfe Howe's book of 1914, with new chapters and appendices, carrying the narrative and record of the Orchestra through fifty years.

At leading bookstores, or by application to Symphony Hall, Boston

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

NY Tribune
Apr 26

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 23 1931

Mary Garden to Appear With Concert Orchestras

Also Reported Quitting Chicago to Return to Opera Here

While Mary Garden has not renewed her contract with the Chicago Civic Opera Company for next season, she is planning to reappear in opera in New York after devoting the fall to concert appearances, it was reported yesterday in a statement made to the Associated Press, by representatives of the singer.

For the first time in her varied career, it was stated, Miss Garden will sing with a symphony orchestra accompaniment, beginning with an appearance with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on October 23, when she will present a special Debussy program. After engagements with this orchestra, she will also be heard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the first week of December. Her representatives said that she had reserved the season beginning December 28 for operatic appearances in New York. She will remain at her Monte Carlo estate until early October, arriving here about October 15.

Charles L. Wagner, concert manager for Miss Garden, confirmed the announcement of her concert plans, and added the Cleveland Orchestra to the list of orchestras with which she will appear. He said it was probable that Miss Garden would be heard in opera, in New York and on tour, after December 28, but was not able to say whether it would be with an existing or a specially recruited organization, or with a company brought from Europe. He also thought it probable that if she appeared here in opera she would add several roles to those in which she already has been heard in New York.

Officials of the Metropolitan Opera Company said that no overtures had been made to Miss Garden to appear with that organization next season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
APR 23 1931

MARY GARDEN TO GIVE PROGRAMS OF DEBUSSY

Concerts Will Engage Diva's Time, but Manager Hints at Opera Appearance Here.

Mary Garden, whose retirement from the Chicago Civic Opera Company has just been announced, has no intention of retiring from opera or of giving so-called farewell recitals, Charles L. Wagner, concert manager, who has been associated with the singer in the past, announced yesterday.

The diva's engagements next season will be divided between her appearances in opera and those with symphony orchestras. For the first time in her career she will be able to do, according to Mr. Wagner, what she has always greatly desired, but could find no time for—that is, to give all-Debussy programs with symphony orchestras. It will be recalled that her last appearance in New York was an all-Debussy program with Walter Gieseking on Oct. 25 at Carnegie Hall and that she was chosen by the French composer to create the rôle of Mélisande in "Pelléas et Mélisande" in 1902 and that he composed especially for her his "Ariette" and "Green."

Miss Garden intends to return to this country on Oct. 15 to appear with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 23 and to present the same Debussy program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra early in December. Between these two engagements she will fill concert engagements in various localities.

The singer's time after Dec. 28 will be reserved for operatic appearances in New York, though no statement was vouchsafed whether these included participation in the presentations of the Metropolitan Opera Company, or whether she plans to organize her own company, as did Melba and Geraldine Farrar. The information that Miss Garden is planning to study the rôle of Kundry in Wagner's "Parsifal" was, however, elicited.

Until Miss Garden returns to the United States she plans to remain at her Monte Carlo estate. She has been appearing in operatic performances at the Opéra in that city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been awarded the Cross of Commander of the Order of the White Cross, the highest honor of the Finnish government.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL
APR 24 1931

Half Price! 3.98

Regularly $7.95! Th good-looking and practic book trough End Table sturdily made and has rich mahogany veneer to

Half Price! 15.95

Regularly $32.50! Th oughly comfortable Ch with large lounge prop

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
APR 24 1931

LEFT-HANDED COMPLIMENT.

Arthur Nikish, a former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was once invited to conduct an orchestra in Milan, Italy, at that time presided over by the eminent Toscanini. After the performance Toscanini congratulated Nikish.

"Excellent, my dear man, excellent!" he assured him, with a pat on the shoulder.

"Oh, no," replied Nikish, gracefully, "you know your orchestra is exceptionally good!"

"Well, no," Toscanini replied thoughtfully. "The orchestra did not play so well, but you, my friend conducted wonderfully!"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
APR 25 1931

BOSTON GREETS PRINCE, UNDER HEAVY GUARD

Takamatsu and Bride Are Officially Welcomed—Attend Concert and State Dinner.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, April 24.—Still heavily guarded by police on the strength of reported plots ranging from assassination to Communist demonstrations, Prince Takamatsu and his bride visited the State House and City Hall today, attended a gala performance of the Boston Symphony concert this afternoon and ended their day at a State dinner this evening.

Mayor James M. Curley presided at the banquet and Governor Joseph B. Ely extended a welcome from the State.

Prince Takamatsu, long before reaching Boston, had expressed a wish to hear the symphony orchestra and a special box in the second balcony, made possible because several regular patrons freely gave up their season seats for the occasion, was occupied by the royal party. Both the Prince and Princess applauded frequently. The Princess continued her handclapping, after her husband had ceased, in particular delight at the piano solo by Jesus Maria Sanroma.

At the City Hall both occupied the Mayor's chair for a brief moment while they signed the visitors' book.

Governor Ely presented the Prince with a gold paper cutter, bearing the seal of the Commonwealth, and a shining new penny. The Governor drew one of the infrequent smiles which occasionally lighten the Prince's face when he explained that a sharp article must be presented only with a penny as guarantee that friendship will not be cut.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
APR 25 1931

JAPANESE ROYAL COUPLE "RUSHED" BY SYMPHONY CONCERT AUDIENCE

Princess Acclaimed as "Cute" and "A Knockout" by Thousands —Visitors Enjoy Program—Would Like to Attend Tonight

The Symphony audience yesterday afternoon "rushed" the royal party, in its Boston enthusiasm to see Prince and Princess Takamatsu, particularly the Princess, whom everyone remarked is either "cute" or "a knockout." The Symphony audience murmured "cute," while the equally demonstrative onlookers outside Symphony Hall favored "knockout" as the term of adulation which yesterday was inspired in the thousands who saw the Japanese Princess on her honeymoon.

Internationally prominent people have come and gone as guests at Symphony concerts and often tney were not noticed because it was not known they were there. It is something new for royalty to be among those present. Accordingly there was excitement and a veritable mob scene, nicely handled by Symphony Hall officials and attendants and police officers from Headquarters.

Director Serge Koussevitzky was introduced to Prince and Princess Takamatsu during the intermission. Director Koussevitzky kissed the Princess' hand. This European custom Director Koussevitzky usually observes, but this time he was more than usually eloquent.

The Princess is one of the most charming visitors Boston has ever had. She has American mannerisms, walks like a happy, energetic American girl instead of with mincing steps as one might possibly expect in a Japanese young woman. She blushes and smiles, letting her big brown eyes play over the new scenes before her, enjoying it all to the full.

Princess in Red

Her choice of apparel yesterday afternoon made her easily distinguishable in the large party which accompanied the Prince and Princess. Her little red straw hat could be seen beyond the myriads of heads looking in her direction. It marked her in the geographic center of the royal party in the improvised box on the right first balcony at Symphony Hall, but more than that it was wonderfully becoming. The hat perfectly matched a long cherry red flat crepe dress figured in flecks of white and blue for all the world as if confetti had been showered over it.

It might seem a hardship for an American bride and groom on a honeymoon to be followed everywhere by a large party of attendants and dignitaries, added to in every country by more escorts and guards for courtesy's and safety's sake.

The Prince and Princess with their suite occupy nearly the entire fourth floor of the Copley Plaza. There are ladies in waiting, valets, secretaries, the official doctor, a comptroller a master of ceremonies, consuls, so that when the royal party is about to go anywhere Japanese and a few American escorts emerge from doors in every direction to accompany the royal couple. The ladies in waiting are very attractive also. They wear either black or black, white and gray.

Neither the Prince nor Princess seem the least bit disturbed by the perpetual round of festivities which attend their wedding tour. They can both speak English, so that they carry on an animated conversation with hosts and hostesses, avoiding any awkward dead silence in formal moments. Otherwise they are rather quiet.

Talks With Koussevitsky

Prince Takamatsu discussed music with Director Koussevitzky while Princess Takamatsu, Mrs Koussevitzky and Mrs N. Penrose Hallowell were conversing. The Prince said he enjoyed the symphony so well he should like to attend the concert "tomorrow night," meaning this (Saturday) evening. It is doubtful if the royal party will attend as there is a formal reception at Gardner Museum at the same time. Few spare moments have been left on the program during the visit of the democratic Japanese couple in this city.

The bride and groom had been escorted to Symphony Hall from the Copley-Plaza by Courtenay Crocker of the Japanese Society, and met by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mr and Mrs N. Penrose Hallowell, Mr and Mrs William Phillips and Edward M. Pickman of the trustees, who greeted them and went with them to the improvised box, where the ordinary seats had been removed and blue leather upholstered chairs placed. The box arrangement was marked by a gilded railing, maroon velvet draperies and oriental rugs.

An office on the same floor, directly across the corridor from the door to the "box" was furnished for the occasion in Colonial antiques and decorated with Spring flowers and Japanese cherry blossoms.

Japanese cherry trees in bloom, Japanese quince bushes in pots are used profusely in the suite at the hotel to make the couple feel more at home, and, while they were away attending the concert, dozens of men were busy twining wisterias, cherry blossoms and quince blossoms into a floral setting appropriate for the formal dinner last evening.

In connection with that event the Japanese visitors were much like anybody in one respect certainly. They were talking yesterday morning about what they would wear to it.

The Prince dislikes ostentatious progress in American traffic. He wishes the chauffeurs to obey traffic signals—insists upon it. Making them stop at the Tremont and Boylston-st intersections was a notable incident, and after that the custom of halting where lights turned red was observed to the letter. Guards do not ride on the running board either. The guards are on hand, surrounding the party, but in other cars. Anything that savors of undue pomp and circumstance is not in keeping with the simple tastes of the small, smiling pair.

They like simple food also. Dishes of ever so complicated delicacies are passed by on the menu in favor of plain roasts, slices of chicken, steak, lamb. Strawberries and cream are more to their liking than ice cream.

They say "good morning" to the elevator boy, or "good evening," as it happens, and the white painted wheel which controls the elevator cables is cause for their conjecture. Their conversation about it is in Japanese, but the inference is that the Princess has dared the Prince to persuade the elevator boy into letting the Prince experiment with the large wheel and see what happens.

In order to make the entrance and exit of the party as untroubled by throngs as possible, a special exit at the rear of Symphony Hall was opened for the party yesterday. Crowds awaited in the street and upstairs there were throngs of the regular Friday afternoon symphony-goers agog for a glimpse of royalty.

A spontaneous reception was accorded them as they stepped down into the "box." The audience applauded, the orchestra stood in their honor. The couple were on time to the dot.

During the entire concert the Prince and Princess were alert, sitting erect and visibly attentive. The Princess clapped approval. She held in her lap a bouquet of rare orchids, presented her from Mr and Mrs Ernest B. Dane, who have exceptionally fine private conservatories. Mr Dane is treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
APR 25 1931

Musical Notes

FINAL CONCERT BOSTON SYMPHONY

The sixth and last concert of the Tuesday afternoon series, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place Tuesday afternoon in Symphony hall. The Herald gives the program as follows: George W. Chadwick, "Noel," from the Symphonic Sketches. Schumann, Symphony in B flat major, op. 38. Stravinsky, Capriccio for piano and orchestra. Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the old-fashioned, roguish manner, in rondo form, Op. 28.

"Noel," from the Symphonic Sketches, was played in memory of the composer, Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it left none of its loveliness wanting. The exquisite pianissimo with which it opened grew by a sequence of delicate gradation into the tranquil climax, then was hushed—a marvel in tonal balance. The calm tempo was singularly appropriate.

Perhaps because it came right after this serene nocturne the Schumann symphony seemed even more delightful than usual in its exuberance and the freshness and variety of its many themes.

Mr. Sanroma played Stravinsky's Capriccio with fine understanding of the content. No touch of humor escaped him; no sardonic thrust missed the mark. Clear cut phrases, snapped out in tones that never accon artee rhyth If h Stravi was c Eulen cannot

THIS CLIPPING FROM MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES

'Pictures at Exhibition' Is Fine Example

Ravel Arrangment of Moussorgsky Suite Is Recorded

TONAL imagery of distinct charm is included in one of the finest special record releases announced in recent months — Moussorgsky-Ravel's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

This type of music, perhaps more social than musical, has often been accorded favor here. The "Londoners" presented a Pixy Ring in their chamber music recital last year that was long remembered.

No finer example of the modern music which is above all descriptive, and distinctly at variance with "musical mathematics," than the Pictures can be found.

Victor's Set M-102 (7272-7375) is recorded by Serge Koussevitzky and the well known Boston Symphony orchestra. The suite include such unusual titles as "Bydlo," "Ballet of the Unhatched Chickens," "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," and "The Hut of Fowls' Legs."

Ravel has done the orchestrating of Moussorgsky's suite. His knowledge of Russian music particularly suits him for the task. The actual work was done at the request of Koussevitzky, in whose presence Ravel praised the suite. It was first performed in the Ravel orchestration in Paris eight years ago. The first American performance was in Boston, in 1926, under Koussevitzky's direction.

The music begins with the "Promenade," in which one may imagine a visitor to an art gallery entering spiritedly, in search of some picture which may please him. This promenade is martial and pleasing in quality. It recurs throughout the suite, as the visitor progresses from picture to picture.

The pictures which inspired Moussorgsky's suite were done by Victor Hartmann, a member of the "Invincible Band" which included the former, Alexander Borodin, Cesar Cui, and Rimsky-Korsakow. The 10 pieces thus are musical portraits of Hartmann's pictures.

"The Old Castle," one of the more prominently romantic of the portraits, represents a wistful, rather mournful melody which Ravel gives to the alto saxophone appropriately. Despite its obvious sentimental tunefulness, the picture nevertheless is fascinating in its appeal.

Other pictures done by Moussorgsky include the bandy-legged "Gnomes," a capricious "Tuileries," the animated "Market Place in Limoges," "Catacombs," and the massive "Great Gate at Kiev." A gigantic climax, characteristically Russian, brings the suite to a close in the latter number.

A stately dance, Debussy's "Sarabande," is included on the eighth side of the set. The work is an orchestration from piano also done by Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES
APR 26 1931

n' Is mple

nt of e Is t charm is finest spe- nounced in ky-Ravel's

s more so- cial than musical, has often been accorded favor here. The "Londoners" presented a Pixy Ring in their chamber music recital last year that was long remembered.

No finer example of the modern music which is above all descriptive, and distinctly at variance with "musical mathematics," than the Pictures can be found.

Victor's Set M-102 (7272-7375) is recorded by Serge Koussevitzky and the well known Boston Symphony orchestra. The suite include such unusual titles, as "Bydlo," "Ballet of the Unhatched Chickens," "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," and "The Hut of Fowls' Legs."

Ravel has done the orchestrating of Moussorgsky's suite. His knowledge of Russian music particularly suits him for the task. The actual work was done at the request of Koussevitzky, in whose presence Ravel praised the suite. It was first performed in the Ravel orchestration in Paris eight years ago. The first American performance was in Boston, in 1926, under Koussevitzky's direction.

The music begins with the "Promenade," in which one may imagine a visitor to an art gallery entering spiritedly, in search of some picture which may please him. This promenade is martial and pleasing in quality. It recurs throughout the suite, as the visitor progresses from picture to picture.

The pictures which inspired Moussorgsky's suite were done by Victor Hartmann, a member of the "Invincible Band" which included the former Alexander Borodin, Cesar Cui, and Rimsky-Korsakow. The 10 pieces thus are musical portraits of Hartmann's pictures.

"The Old Castle," one of the more prominently romantic of the portraits, represents a wistful, rather mournful melody which Ravel gives to the alto

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

New Loeffler Work

The Juilliard School of Music, according to an announcement made by the president, Dr. John Erskine, will publish a new orchestral composition by Charles Martin Loeffler, called "Evocation." It is written for symphony orchestra and a chorus of women's voices. The first performance was given recently by the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, under Nicolai Sokoloff. The excellence of the work and its remarkable success brought it to the attention of the Juilliard School of Music and as a mark of its appreciation of Mr. Loeffler's position in contemporary musical life the Juilliard School is making the composition available to symphonic orchestras.

Mr. Loeffler, who was born in Alsace, came to the United States in 1881, and in 1887 became an American citizen. Upon arrival in America Mr. Loeffler played under the late Dr. Leopold Damrosch, Theodore Thomas, and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra where he shared the first violin desk with Franz Kneisel. During the twenty-one years of his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Loeffler composed a number of symphonic and chamber music works which won him conspicuous recognition. This led him to resign from the orchestra in order to devote himself completely to composition.

New Book on Boston Symphony

In this, the last week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth anniversary season, a new book is being brought out, called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. de Wolfe Howe. This semi-centennial edition republishes Mr. Howe's narrative of the orchestra's beginning and earlier years, published in 1914. New chapters are added, recording the last years of Dr. Muck's conductorship and those of Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky. New appendices will list the complete repertory, soloists and personnel of the orchestra through its fifty years; likewise the address on Henry Lee Higginson, made by Bliss Perry at the Bach Festival in Boston last month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 26 1931

A Prince in the Balcony

Those familiar with Boston and its institutions will find no cause for surprise in the fact that when last week the Prince and Princess of Japan attended a regular Friday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall the only seats available to royalty were in the second balcony.

Prince Takamatsu, long before reaching Boston, according to dispatches, had expressed a wish to hear this renowned orchestra, but a second-balcony section was the only one available to the royal party, and that only because regular subscribers freely gave up their season seats for the occasion.

It must not be supposed that this circumstance is indicative of any indifference on the part of Bostonians to their distinguished visitors, for the Japanese party was later entertained at a state banquet which was attended by Mayor Curley, Governor Ely and other prominent Bay State citizens and presented with suitable souvenirs of the occasion, but it is a circumstance which adequately reflects the attitude of the people of Boston toward their own traditions and institutions, and Friday afternoon symphony is one of the most notable of these.

Nothing can interfere with this weekly festival of the Back Bay. Symphony is no movable feast, no casual social gathering, but an unchanging ritual, an irrevocable law to itself, transcending and surpassing all other customs and obligations, a veritable and authentic manifestation of the absolute. Neither membership in the Union Club nor attendance at debutante balls at the Somerset partake of its implications and inviolability. It is the utter epitome of things Bostonian.

So Prince Takamatsu and his bride may feel fortunate that their imperial motor car found itself in Huntington Avenue among the pre-Cambrian limousines and other vehicles of heroic vintage affected by the residents of Beacon Hill and the Avenue, for if Judgment Day itself should fall on a Friday in the Season, it is probable that the Angel Gabriel would be roundly shushed by good Bostonians for introducing a discord into the regular performance of symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
APR 26 1931

Simultaneously with the conclusion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth season next week, a new book, called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931" by M. A. de Wolfe Howe, is being brought out. This semi-centennial edition republishes Mr. Howe's narrative of the orchestra's beginning and early years, which was published in 1914. New chapters are added recording the last years of Dr. Karl Muck's conductorship and those of Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky.

New appendices will list the complete repertory, soloists and personnel of the orchestra through its fifty years, and the address on Henry Lee Higginson made by Bliss Perry at the Bach Festival in Boston last month. Copies may be had by application to Symphony Hall, Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 26 1931

History of Symphony Released This Week

In this the last week of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 50th anniversary season, a new book is being broght out. It is called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra—1881-1931," by M. A. de Wolfe Howe. This semicentennial edition republishes Mr Howe's narrative of the orchestra's beginning and earlier years which was published in 1914. New chapters are added, recording the last years of Dr Muck's conductorship and those of Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux, and Serge Koussevitzky.

New appendices will list the complete repertory, soloists, and personnel of the orchestra through its 50 years; likewise the address on Henry Lee Higginson made by Bliss Perry at the Bach festival in Boston last month.

Copies may be had by application to Symphony hall, Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN
Lawrence, Mass
APR 26 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY JAZZES IT UP

BOSTON, April 25 (UP)—Critics and music lovers debated today over the merits or demerits of the first 100 per cent jazz composition ever played by the Boston symphony orchestra during a regular symphony season.

For half a century there had been a ritual-like atmosphere among audiences attending concerts of this 105-piece virtuoso orchestra, now led by the elegant and superbly-tailored Serge Koussevitzky. Such titillating numbers as George Gershwin's "Rhapsody In Blue" had been relegated to the popular or "Pops" programs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
SUNDAY SUN
APR 26 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY JAZZES IT UP

BOSTON, April 25 (UP)—Critics and music lovers debated today over the merits or demerits of the first 100 per cent jazz composition ever played by the Boston symphony orchestra during a regular symphony season.

For half a century there had been a ritual-like atmosphere among audiences attending concerts of this 105-piece virtuoso orchestra, now led by the elegant and superbly-tailored Serge Koussevitzky. Such titillating numbers as George Gershwin's "Rhapsody In Blue" had been relegated to the popular or "Pops" programs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BEDFORD, MASS
MERCURY
APR 2 1931

A Prince in the Balcony

(New York Herald-Tribune.)

Those familiar with Boston and its institutions will find no cause for surprise in the fact that when last week the Prince and Princess of Japan attended a regular Friday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall the only seats available to royalty were in the second balcony.

Prince Takamatsu, long before reaching Boston, according to dispatches, had expressed a wish to hear this renowned orchestra, but a second-balcony section was the only one available to the royal party, and that only because regular subscribers freely gave up their season seats for the occasion.

It must not be supposed that this circumstance is indicative of any difference on the part of Bostonians to their dsitinguished visitors, for the Japanese party was later entertained at a state banquet which was attended by Mayor Curley, Governor Ely and other prominent Bay State citizens and presented with suitable souvenirs of the occasion, but it is a circumstance which adequately reflects the attitude of the people of Boston toward their own traditions and institutions, and Friday afternoon symphony is one of the most notable of these.

Nothing can interfere with this weekly festival of the Back Bay. Symphony is no movable feast, no casual social gathering, but an unchanging ritual, an irrevocable law to itself, transcending and surpassing all other customs and obligations, a veritable and authentic manifestation of the absolute. Neither membership in the Union club nor attendance at debutaute balls at the Somerset partake of its implications and inviolability. It is the utter epitome of things Bostonian.

So Prince Takamatsu and his bride may feel fortunate that their imperial motor car found itself in Huntington avenue among the pre-Cambrian limousines and other vehicles of heroic vintage affected by the residents of Beacon Hill and the avenue, for if Judgment Day itself should fall on a Friday in the season, it is probable that the Angel Gabriel would be roundly shushed by good Bostonians for introducing a discord into the regular performance of symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN
APR 27 1931

FULL DAY FOR ROYAL VISITORS

Official Calls, Symphony, Dinner on List

BOSTON (AP)—Prince and Princess Takamatsu, imperial honeymooners from Japan, had planned for them today a morning of official visits, an afternoon at the symphony concert and a dinner by the City of Boston at night.

Their schedule called for a visit to Gov. Joseph B. Ely at the State House and a brief stop at Mayor James M. Curley's office at City hall.

An extra police guard surrounded the imperial couple today as a result of a conversation overheard yesterday by a hostess at their hotel shortly before their arrival here. The hostess said that she overheard two men talking outside the hotel. They appeared to be plotting the assassination of somebody, she said.

The hotel management notified Supt. of Police Michael H. Crowley who ordered the guard for the distinguished visitors doubled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
APR 25 1931

News

F[illegible]

The six[illegible]s Violet A. Dysart was one very Tuesday e[illegible] the Bosto[illegible]ealing one, "A Little Bit of Dr. Kousaven Shining Thru" the words place Tu[illegible] which were written by Dr. phony ha[illegible]n F. Holmes of Manchester, N program formerly of Belfast, and the Chadwick[illegible]sic by Miss Gladys Pitcher phonic [illegible]ughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. S. phony in[illegible]cher of Auburn, also formerly vinsky, C[illegible] Belfast. The accompanist for orchestra[illegible] the musical numbers was Mrs. spiegel's[illegible]hn F. Holmes, formerly Miss old-fashi[illegible]

PROGRAM FOR MI[illegible]

rondo for[illegible] "Noel," Sketches, was played in memory of the composer, Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it left none of its loveliness wanting. The exquisite pianissimo with which it opened grew by a sequence of delicate gradation into the tranquil climax, then was hushed—a marvel in tonal balance The calm tempo was singularly appropriate.

Perhaps because it came right after this serene nocturne the Schumann symphony seemed even more delightful than usual in its exuberance and the freshness and variety of its many themes.

Mr. Sanroma played Stravinsky's Capriccio with fine understanding of the content. No touch of humor escaped him; no sardonic thrust missed the mark. Clear cut phrases, snapped out in tones that were never harsh. Dr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment was brilliant repartee to the pianist's incisive and rhythmic playing.

If he had not already got it in Stravinsky's Capriccio, the devil was certainly given his due. Till Eulenspiegel's marked resemblance cannot be gainsaid—in Strauss's

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES
APR 26 1931

'Pictures at Exhibition' Is Fine Example

Ravel Arrangment of Moussorgsky Suite Is Recorded

TONAL imagery of distinct charm is included in one of the finest special record releases announced in recent months — Moussorgsky-Ravel's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

This type of music, perhaps more social than musical, has often been accorded favor here. The "Londoners" presented a Pixy Ring in their chamber music recital last year that was long remembered.

No finer example of the modern music which is above all descriptive, and distinctly at variance with "musical mathematics," than the Pictures can be found.

Victor's Set M-102 (7272-7375) is recorded by Serge Koussevitzky and the well known Boston Symphony orchestra. The suite include such unusual titles as "Bydlo," "Ballet of the Unhatched Chickens," "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," and "The Hut on Fowls' Legs."

Ravel has done the orchestrating of Moussorgsky's suite. His knowledge of Russian music particularly suits him for the task. The actual work was done at the request of Koussevitzky, in whose presence Ravel praised the suite It was first performed in the Ravel orchestration in Paris eight years ago The first American performance was in Boston, in 1926, under Koussevitzky's direction.

The music begins with the "Promenade," in which one may imagine a visitor to an art gallery entering spiritedly, in search of some picture which may please him. This promenade is martial and pleasing in quality. It recurs throughout the suite, as the visitor progresses from picture to picture.

The pictures which inspired Moussorgsky's suite were done by Victor Hartmann, a member of the "Invincible Band" which included the former Alexander Borodin, Cesar Cui, and Rimsky-Korsakow. The 10 pieces thus are musical portraits of Hartmann's pictures.

"The Old Castle," one of the more prominently romantic of the portraits, represents a wistful, rather mournful melody which Ravel gives to the alto saxophone appropriately. Despite its obvious sentimental tunefulness, the picture nevertheless is fascinating in its appeal.

Other pictures done by Moussorgsky include the bandy-legged "Gnomes," a capricious "Tuileries," the animated "Market Place in Limoges," "Catacombs," and the massive "Great Gate at Kiev." A gigantic climax, characteristically Russian, brings the suite to a close in the latter number.

A stately dance, Debussy's "Sarabande," is included on the eighth side of the set. The work is an orchestration from piano also done by Ravel.

Ravel Arrangment of Moussorgsky Suite Is Recorded

TONAL imagery of distinct charm is included in one of the finest special record releases announced in recent months — Moussorgsky-Ravel's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

This type of music, perhaps more social than musical, has often been accorded favor here. The "Londoners" presented a Pixy Ring in their chamber music recital last year that was long remembered.

No finer example of the modern music which is above all descriptive, and distinctly at variance with "musical mathematics," than the Pictures can be found.

Victor's Set M-102 (7272-7375) is recorded by Serge Koussevitzky and the well known Boston Symphony orchestra. The suite include such unusual titles as "Bydlo," "Ballet of the Unhatched Chickens," "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," and "The Hut on Fowls' Legs."

Ravel has done the orchestrating of Moussorgsky's suite. His knowledge of Russian music particularly suits him for the task. The actual work was done at the request of Koussevitzky, in whose presence Ravel praised the suite It was first performed in the Ravel orchestration in Paris eight years ago The first American performance was in Boston, in 1926, under Koussevitzky's direction.

The music begins with the "Promenade," in which one may imagine a visitor to an art gallery entering spiritedly, in search of some picture which may please him. This promenade is martial and pleasing in quality. It recurs throughout the suite, as the visitor progresses from picture to picture.

The pictures which inspired Moussorgsky's suite were done by Victor Hartmann, a member of the "Invincible Band" which included the former Alexander Borodin, Cesar Cui, and Rimsky-Korsakow. The 10 pieces thus are musical portraits of Hartmann's pictures.

"The Old Castle," one of the more prominently romantic of the portraits, represents a wistful, rather mournful melody which Ravel gives to the alto saxophone appropriately. Despite its obvious sentimental tunefulness, the picture nevertheless is fascinating in its appeal.

Other pictures done by Moussorgsky include the bandy-legged "Gnomes," a capricious "Tuileries," the animated "Market Place in Limoges," "Catacombs," and the massive "Great Gate at Kiev." A gigantic climax, characteristically Russian, brings the suite to a close in the latter number.

A stately dance, Debussy's "Sarabande," is included on the eighth side of the set. The work is an orchestration from piano also done by Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 26 1931

A Prince in the Balcony

Those familiar with Boston and its institutions will find no cause for surprise in the fact that when last week the Prince and Princess of Japan attended a regular Friday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall the only seats available to royalty were in the second balcony.

Prince Takamatsu, long before reaching Boston, according to dispatches, had expressed a wish to hear this renowned orchestra, but a second-balcony section was the only one available to the royal party, and that only because regular subscribers freely gave up their season seats for the occasion.

It must not be supposed that this circumstance is indicative of any indifference on the part of Bostonians to their distinguished visitors, for the Japanese party was later entertained at a state banquet which was attended by Mayor Curley, Governor Ely and other prominent Bay State citizens and presented with suitable souvenirs of the occasion, but it is a circumstance which adequately reflects the attitude of the people of Boston toward their own traditions and institutions, and Friday afternoon symphony is one of the most notable of these.

Nothing can interfere with this weekly festival of the Back Bay. Symphony is no movable feast, no casual social gathering, but an unchanging ritual, an irrevocable law to itself, transcending and surpassing all other customs and obligations, a veritable and authentic manifestation of the absolute. Neither membership in the Union Club nor attendance at debutante balls at the Somerset partake of its implications and inviolability. It is the utter epitome of things Bostonian.

So Prince Takamatsu and his bride may feel fortunate that their imperial motor car found itself in Huntington Avenue among the pre-Cambrian limousines and other vehicles of heroic vintage affected by the residents of Beacon Hill and the Avenue, for if Judgment Day itself should fall on a Friday in the Season, it is probable that the Angel Gabriel would be roundly shushed by good Bostonians for introducing a discord into the regular performance of symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
APR 26 1931

Simultaneously with the conclusion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth season next week, a new book, called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931" by M. A. de Wolfe Howe, is being brought out. This semi-centennial edition republishes Mr. Howe's narrative of the orchestra's beginning and early years, which was published in 1914. New chapters are added recording the last years of Dr. Karl Muck's conductorship and those of Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky.

New appendices will list the complete repertory, soloists and personnel of the orchestra through its fifty years, and the address on Henry Lee Higginson made by Bliss Perry at the Bach Festival in Boston last month. Copies may b[illegible]d by application to Symphony Hall, Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 26 1931

History of Symphony Released This Week

In this the last week of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 50th anniversary season, a new book is being brought out. It is called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra—1881-1931," by M. A. de Wolfe Howe. This semicentennial edition republishes Mr Howe's narrative of the orchestra's beginning and earlier years which was published in 1914. New chapters are added, recording the last years of Dr Muck's conductorship and those of Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux, and Serge Koussevitzky.

New appendices will list the complete repertory, soloists, and personnel of the orchestra through its 50 years; likewise the address on Henry Lee Higginson made by Bliss Perry at the Bach festival in Boston last month.

Copies may be had by application to Symphony hall, Boston.

New Book on Boston Symphony

In this, the last week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth anniversary season, a new book is being brought out, called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. de Wolfe Howe. This semi-centennial edition republishes Mr. Howe's narrative of the orchestra's beginning and earlier years, published in 1914. New chapters are added, recording the last years of Dr. Muck's conductorship and those of Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky. New appendices will list the complete repertory, soloists and personnel of the orchestra through its fifty years; likewise the address on Henry Lee Higginson, made by Bliss Perry at the Bach Festival in Boston last month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
APR [illegible]

A Prince in the Balcony

(New York Herald-Tribune.)

Those familiar with Boston and its institutions will find no cause for surprise in the fact that when last week the Prince and Princess of Japan attended a regular Friday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall the only seats available to royalty were in the second balcony.

Prince Takamatsu, long before reaching Boston, according to dispatches, had expressed a wish to hear this renowned orchestra, but a second-balcony section was the only one available to the royal party, and that only because regular subscribers freely gave up their season seats for the occasion.

It must not be supposed that this circumstance is indicative of any difference on the part of Bostonians to their dsitinguished visitors, for the Japanese party was later entertained at a state banquet which was attended by Mayor Curley, Governor Ely and other prominent Bay State citizens and presented with suitable souvenirs of the occasion, but it is a circumstance which adequately reflects the attitude of the people of Boston toward their own traditions and institutions, and Friday afternoon symphony is one of the most notable of these.

Nothing can interfere with this weekly festival of the Back Bay. Symphony is no movable feast, no casual social gathering, but an unchanging ritual, an irrevocable law to itself, transcending and surpassing all other customs and obligations, a veritable and authentic manifestation of the absolute. Neither membership in the Union club nor attendance at debutante balls at the Somerset partake of its implications and inviolability. It is the utter epitome of things Bostonian.

So Prince Takamatsu and his bride may feel fortunate that their imperial motor car found itself in Huntington avenue among the pre-Cambrian limousines and other vehicles of heroic vintage affected by the residents of Beacon Hill and the avenue, for if Judgment Day itself should fall on a Friday in the season, it is probable that the Angel Gabriel would be roundly shushed by good Bostonians for introducing a discord into the regular performance of symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN
Lawrence, Mass
APR 26 1931

187

BOSTON SYMPHONY JAZZES IT UP

BOSTON, April 25 (UP)—Critics and music lovers debated today over the merits or demerits of the first 100 per cent jazz composition ever played by the Boston symphony orchestra during a regular symphony season.

For half a century there had been a ritual-like atmosphere among audiences attending concerts of this 105-piece virtuoso orchestra, now led by the elegant and superbly-tailored Serge Koussevitzky. Such titillating numbers as George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" had been relegated to the popular or "Pops" programs.

BOSTON SYMPHONY JAZZES IT UP

BOSTON, April 25 (UP)—Critics and music lovers debated today over the merits or demerits of the first 100 per cent jazz composition ever played by the Boston symphony orchestra during a regular symphony season.

For half a century there had been a ritual-like atmosphere among audiences attending concerts of this 105-piece virtuoso orchestra, now led by the elegant and superbly-tailored Serge Koussevitzky. Such titillating numbers as George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" had been relegated to the popular or "Pops" programs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
SUNDAY SUN
APR 26 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN
APR 27 1931

FULL DAY FOR ROYAL VISITORS

Official Calls, Symphony, Dinner on List

BOSTON (AP)—Prince and Princess Takamatsu, imperial honeymooners from Japan, had planned for them today a morning of official visits, an afternoon at the symphony concert and a dinner by the City of Boston at night.

Their schedule called for a visit to Gov. Joseph B. Ely at the State House and a brief stop at Mayor James M. Curley's office at City hall.

An extra police guard surrounded the imperial couple today as a result of a conversation overheard yesterday by a hostess at their hotel shortly before their arrival here. The hostess said that she overheard two men talking outside the hotel. They appeared to be plotting the assassination of somebody, she said.

The hotel management notified Supt. of Police Michael H. Crowley who ordered the guard for the distinguished visitors doubled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
APR 28 1931

Musical Notes

JAPANESE ROYALTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT KOUSSEVITSKY PRESENTS UNUSUAL PROGRAM

The presence of Prince Takamatsu and Princess Kikuko of Japan roused much interest in the audience late Friday afternoon at the Boston Symphony orchestra concert. Said the Globe:

The visiting royalties and their entourage sat in the first balcony on the right of the stage. A section of seats midway down the balcony had been removed, and a kind of royal box improvised.

When the Prince and the Princess entered, just before the concert began, the entire audience rose and applauded them. They listened to a program which included Schubert's C major Symphony, Griffes' "Khubla Khan," Constant Lambert's "Rio Grande," and excerpts from Stravinsky's "Firebird" with close attention. Dr. Koussevitzky, acknowledging the applause, made each time a special low bow in the direction of the imperial visitors.

The novelty on the program, Constant Lambert's setting for chorus and orchestra of verses by Sacheverell Sitwell about the Brazillian Rio Grande, is the attempt of a young Englishman to employ the idiom and the procedures of present-day American jazz. Poet and composer are known by repute as modernists. But verses and music seemed rather tame and conventional.

Far more significant musically was the revival, after 10 years of inexplicable neglect, of "The Pleasure Dome of Khubla Khan," by the late Charles T. Griffes. This tone poem is in some ways the finest pieces of orchestral music yet written by an American. It was hailed as a masterpiece at the first performance, by the Boston Symphony in 1919. The program notes stated that the fatal illness of the composer was in part due to overwork in copying the orchestral parts for that performance. It is a regrettable fact that neither Boston Symphony nor the other leading American orchestras bear the expense of this necessary copying when a new work is played from manuscript. Griffes, a teacher in a boys' school, sat up nights copying. He caught pneumonia, and developed tuberculosis.

The scoring for orchestra has been revised by Frederick Stock, who claims to have done nothing that Griffes did not sanction before his death. One doubted the wisdom of this procedure, remembering the effectiveness of the performances in 1919 and 1920 of the tone poem in its original form. Hearing "Khubla Khan" again one was impressed by the imaginative power of the music. Griffes' death was a tragic loss to the art of music. His works, which reveal a talent not quite matured, but none the less compelling, are beautiful enough to retain a place in the orchestral repertory.

Schubert's C major Symphony, the work of another genius who died young and left masterpieces too long neglected by his contemporaries, began the concert. Dr. Koussevitzky stressed the dramatic rather than the lyric qualities of the music. His reading was eloquent and personal, but not quite the Schubert of one's dreams, or the Schubert once revealed here by Dr. Muck.

The remaining number, five fragments selected by Dr. Koussevitzky from Stravinsky's "Firebird," is also the work of a young man of genius. The "Dance of the Princesses," with its beautiful flowing melody, ought to refute the common conservative objection that Stravinsky is a mere juggler with rhythms and timbres. The whole suite is delightful music, and Friday's performance was a brilliant one.

LOWELL COURIER-CITIZEN,
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1931

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musi[illegible]

The Symphony Season's Close.

The 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to a close with the regular concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. During the season many new works have been presented, some of them composed especially for the anniversary year programs. Mr. Koussevitzky, in our opinion, has kept a just balance between the new and the old. Certainly he has not neglected the talent which our young American composers are developing.

For the final programs this week no novelties are announced. On the list are such familiar numbers as the prelude to Wagner's opera "Die Meistersinger;" Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun;" the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony."

The Pop concerts at Symphony hall under Arthur Fiedler's direction will begin on May 6.

A Commemoration History.

Through the courtesy of the management of Symphony Hall there comes to the desk a copy of a new edition of M. A. de Wolfe Howe's book called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931." This revised and extended edition of a book first published in 1914 commemorates the 50th anniversary of the founding of the orchestra. It includes the [illegible]er's interesting narrative of the [illegible]chestra's beginning and the re[illegible] of its early years and supplem[illegible] these by new chapters, bringing its remarkable musical history up to date with the triumphs of the orchestra under the inspiring conductorship of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The book is well illustrated and documented. Especially valuable are the new appendices which include a complete list of the music played and the dates of performance and a record of soloists and the changes in personnel of the orchestra.

In a preface to the semicentennial edition the author recalls the fears of the founder and sustainer of the orchestra when he put the original manuscript into his hands. That was in the fateful year of 1914 in the very month that saw the outbreak of the World war. Foreseeing what that might involve for the orchestra, Mr. Higginson was inclined to believe that it might be best to drop the idea of publication, saying: "By the time this book can be published, there may not be any orchestra to write about." Fortunately that foreboding was never fulfilled, although in the three and a half years which [illegible] it came dangerously near

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
APR 29 1931

The Symphony Season's Close.

The 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to a close with the regular concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. During the season many new works have been presented, some of them composed especially for the anniversary year programs. Mr. Koussevitzky, in our opinion, has kept a just balance between the new and the old. Certainly he has not neglected the talent which our young American composers are developing.

For the final programs this week no novelties are announced. On the list are such familiar numbers as the prelude to Wagner's opera "Die Meistersinger;" Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun;" the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
APR 29 1931

A Commemoration History.

Through the courtesy of the management of Symphony Hall there comes to the desk a copy of a new edition of M. A. de Wolfe Howe's book called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931." This revised and extended edition of a book first published in 1914 commemorates the 50th anniversary of the founding of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MORRISTOWN, N. J.
JERSEYMAN
APR 29 1931

Music In Boston

Many years ago—perhaps fifty or sixty or more—Major Henry L. Higginson, of Boston, conceived the idea of having a great orchestra in Boston. Major Higginson thereupon started the development of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It cost him a great deal of money to import the best of European conductors for this orchestra and to develop members of the organization into soloists, which is what he did. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, from this start given it by Major Higginson, has given two concerts a week in Boston for something like half a century. One concert is on Friday afternoon and is called a recital. It is really a rehearsal of the Saturday evening concert by the orchestra. The two concerts, one Friday afternoon and the other Saturday evening, are identical, and each is attended by the people of Boston and the suburbs, come what will. An earthquake in Boston would not stop one of these concerts.

Last Friday the Crown Prince of Japan and his bride were in Boston. They desired to go to the Friday afternoon concert. They went, but they sat in seats in the second balcony, which were the only seats available. No discourtesy was meant to the royal visitors by putting them in the second balcony. There simply were no other seats. There never are any other seats.

Henry L. Higginson has been dead for many years, but his orchestra goes on. His memorial is perpetual. He established an institution that has taken hold of a whole community. Major Higginson, now dead, is the musical life of Boston. It is amazing what one individual, with a little vision, can do for a whole community. Lucky is the community, large or small, in which there is one individual with real vision and public spirit. Boston has had many great citizens, but few of them ever did more for the city than Major Higginson and his orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NASHVILLE, TENN.
TENNESSEAN
APR 30 1931

Editorial of the Day

A PRINCE IN THE BALCONY

Those familiar with Boston and its institutions will find no cause for surprise in the fact that when last week the prince and princess of Japan attended a regular Friday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall the only seats available to royalty were in the second balcony.

Prince Takamatsu, long before reaching Boston, according to dispatches, had expressed a wish to hear this renowned orchestra, but a second balcony section was the only one available to the royal party, and that only because regular subscribers freely gave up their season seats for the occasion.

It must not be supposed that this circumstance is indicative of any indifference on the part of Bostonians to their distinguished visitors, for the Japanese party was later entertained at a state banquet which was attended by Mayor Curley, Governor Ely and other prominent Bay State citizens and presented with suitable souvenirs of the occasion, but it is a circumstance which adequately reflects the attitude of the people of Boston toward their own traditions and institutions, and Friday afternoon symphony is one of the most notable of these.

Nothing can interfere with this weekly festival of the Back Bay. Symphony is no movable feast, no casual social gathering, but an unchanging ritual, an irrevocable law to itself, transcending and surpassing all other clustoms and obligations, a veritable and authentic manifestation of the absolute. Neither membership in the Union Club nor attendance at debutante balls at the Somerset partake of its implications and inviolability. It is the utter epitome of things Bostonian.

So Prince Takamatsu and his bride may feel fortunate that their imperial motor car found itself in Huntington avenue among the pre-Cambrian limousines and other vehicles of heroic vintage affected by the residents of Beacon Hill and the avenue, for if Judgment day itself should fall on a Friday in the Season, it is probable that the Angel Gabriel would be roundly shushed by good Bostonians for introducing a discord into the regular performance of symphony.—New York Herald Tribune.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
APR 30 1931

DR. KARL MUCK'S WAR INTERNMENT TERMED UNJUST

New History of Boston Symphony Orchestra Featured by Defense of Former Conductor.

BOSTON, April 30—Simultaneously with the closing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th season there has come from the press of the Houghton Mifflin Company a new edition of M. A. De Wolfe Howe's history of the orchestra, first published in 1914, that carries the chronicle of that illustrous band straight up to the final programs. Mr. Howe's collaborator in this deed of efficiency was John N. Burk of the staff of the Symphony Hall, to whom is due the ninth and tenth chapters, that cover the conductorships of Rabaud of Monteux and that of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky; while from Mr. Howe himself comes Chapter VIII., captioned Interlude, that deals with the trying years of 1914-18.

Effect of the War.

The progress of the orchestra from its inception through the spring of 1914 was untroubled, save for minor disputations. Twice in the ensuing years its very existence was threatened. First, by the World War and its obvious effect upon an orchestra that from the beginning had been German trained and German led and, second, by the strike of 1920, when the defection of 36 musicians, a third of the entire personnel, precipitated an even more serious crisis.

In the prosperity, good feeling and general satisfactions of this anniversary year those dark and troublous days are easily forgotten. To read Mr. Howe's and Mr. Burk's pages is to have them vividly recalled and also to be grateful to those who safely piloted the band over such stormy seas.

When the orchestra entered upon the season of 1917-18 the feeling engendered by the war was growing in intensity. Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder and sustainer of the orchestra, was loyal to Dr. Karl Muck, then conductor and becoming more and more of a storm center; and he was loyal to his country. "It needed but a stray match," writes Mr. Howe, "to ignite the gunpowder that lay scattered all about. That match was dropped in Providence, R. I."

From then on, Mr. Howe tells how an overzealous and afterwards discredited spy-hunting editor of the Providence Journal dropped the match by declaring that Muck and his men should play the "Star Spangled Banner" at the orchestra's concert in Providence that evening. Various patriotic societies backed him up, and the matter was laid before Maj. Higginson and C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra. They decided since there was no time for rehearsal that the anthem had better not be played. Dr. Muck was not consulted and knew nothing of the affair until the next morning. Yet all over the country there spread like wildfire the false report that a German conductor had refused to play our national hymn.

Like a snowball rolling down hill the agitation against Muck grew. Scandaluous charges were laid at his door, and in March, 1918, he was interned at Atlanta by the Federal Government as an enemy alien "on grounds that were never made public."

Believing that the Symphony Orchestra through him as spokesman should exonerate the man who served the band so well, who is still, in his old age, one of the greatest masters of the baton and who is honored throughout Europe, Mr. Howe goes on to say: "In justice to both Mr. Higginson and Dr. Muck, it should be said at this later day that, in respect to the charge on which Dr. Muck was held, there has never been shown any reason why Mr. Higginson should not have stood behind him, or any reason why he should have been punished as an alien enemy. There were, of course, many instances in which government officials proved themselves incapable of resisting popular clamor, and adopted courses which would have been unthinkable in times of peace. This was one of the most conspicuous of those cases."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD
NEWS
APR 30 1931

DAY BY DAY

By CARROLL DULANEY

There is a bit of local war history—World War, I mean—in "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931," just published by Houghton-Mifflin Company. It refers to the celebrated incident, back in October, 1917, when Dr. Karl Muck, director of the orchestra, refused to play "The Star-Spangled Banner." The author of the book, M. A. De Wolfe Howe, says Dr. Muck's refusel was due to the fact that the orchestra had no time to rehearse the number. And then he continues:

"But the temper of the time, in the very nature of the case, was

—as it was harder to realize than it is now—quite abnormal. Newspapers continued to repeat the untruth that Dr. Muck had scornfully refused to play 'The Star-Spangled Banner,' and the flames spread far beyond Boston. Early in November the orchestra was scheduled for a concert in Baltimore. A former Governor of Maryland was reported as declaring that if Muck attempted to lead an orchestra in that city he would gladly lead a mob to prevent such an insult to his country and flag. Cardinal Gibbons gave his approval to the agitation on three grounds, the first of which was that 'The Star-Spangled Banner' had been [illegible]

[illegible] Hamlin prize of a grand pianoforte at the 22nd annual competition conducted by the New England Conservatory of Music in Jordan hall, Boston, yesterday.

Miss Nitkin, a graduate of Chelsea high in 1923, entered the Conservatory soon afterwards and was graduated in 1928 as a pupil of Mme. Antoinette Szumowska. Since graduation she has continued in the post graduate department as a pupil of Jesus Maria Sanroma, who was the Mason and Hamlin winner in 1920.

Her program in the contest, on which she was marked by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Harold Bauer and Joseph Lhevinne, noted pianists, the judges, was: Bach—Allemande and Gigue from the French Suite; Beethoven—first movement of the Sonata in E major, op. 109, and Chopin—Bellade in G minor.

Following the announcement of the award, Miss Nitkin received from Dr. Koussevitsky an invitation to play with the Boston Symphony at one of its concerts next season.

This year's field of contestants, drawn from the senior and post graduate pianoforte classes, was the largest in the history of the contests.

Carl Charles Feldman of Manchester, N. H., a graduate of the Conservatory in 1927, received honorable mention.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
APR 29 1931

Musical Notes

JAPANESE ROYALTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT KOUSSEVITSKY PRESENTS UNUSUAL PROGRAM

The presence of Prince Takamatsu and Princess Kikuko of Japan roused much interest in the audience late Friday afternoon at the Boston Symphony orchestra concert. Said the Globe:

The visiting royalties and their entourage sat in the first balcony on the right of the stage. A section of seats midway down the balcony had been removed, and a kind of royal box improvised.

When the Prince and the Princess entered, just before the concert began, the entire audience rose and applauded them. They listened to a program which included Schubert's C major Symphony, Griffes' "Khubla Khan," Constant Lambert's "Rio Grande," and excerpts from Stravinsky's "Firebird" with close attention. Dr. Koussevitzky, acknowledging the applause, made each time a special low bow in the direction of the imperial visitors.

The novelty on the program, Constant Lambert's setting for chorus and orchestra of verses by Sacheverell Sitwell about the Brazillian Rio Grande, is the attempt of a young Englishman to employ the idiom and the procedures of present-day American jazz. Poet and composer are known by repute as modernists. But verses and music seemed rather tame and conventional.

Far more significant musically was the revival, after 10 years of inexplicable neglect, of "The Pleasure Dome of Khubla Khan," by the late Charles T. Griffes. This tone poem is in some ways the finest pieces of orchestral music yet written by an American. It was hailed as a masterpiece at the first performance, by the Boston Symphony in 1919. The program notes stated that the fatal illness of the composer was in part due to overwork in copying the orchestral parts for that performance. It is a regrettable fact that neither Boston Symphony nor the other leading American orchestras bear the expense of this necessary copying when a new work is played from manuscript. Griffes, a teacher in a boys' school, sat up nights copying. He caught pneumonia, and developed tuberculosis.

The scoring for orchestra has been revised by Frederick Stock, who claims to have done nothing that Griffes did not sanction before his death. One doubted the wisdom of this procedure, remembering the effectiveness of the performances in 1919 and 1920 of the tone poem in its original form. Hearing "Khubla Khan" again one was impressed by the imaginative power of the music. Griffes' death was a tragic loss to the art of music. His works, which reveal a talent not quite matured, but none the less compelling, are beautiful enough to retain a place in the orchestral repertory.

Schubert's C major Symphony, the work of another genius who died young and left masterpieces too long neglected by his contemporaries, began the concert. Dr. Koussevitzky stressed the dramatic rather than the lyric qualities of the music. His reading was eloquent and personal, but not quite the Schubert of one's dreams, or the Schubert once revealed here by Dr. Muck.

The remaining number, five fragments selected by Dr. Koussevitzky from Stravinsky's "Firebird," is also the work of a young man of genius. The "Dance of the Princesses," with its beautiful flowing melody, ought to refute the common conservative objection that Stravinsky is a mere juggler with rhythms and timbres. The whole suite is delightful music, and Friday's performance was a brilliant one.

LOWELL COURIER-CITIZEN,
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1931

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed

The Symphony Season's Close.

The 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to a close with the regular concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. During the season many new works have been presented, some of them composed especially for the anniversary year programs. Mr. Koussevitzky, in our opinion, has kept a just balance between the new and the old. Certainly he has not neglected the talent which our young American composers are developing.

For the final programs this week no novelties are announced. On the list are such familiar numbers as the prelude to Wagner's opera "Die Meistersinger;" Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun;" the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony."

The Pop concerts at Symphony hall under Arthur Fiedler's direction will begin on May 6.

A Commemoration History.

Through the courtesy of the management of Symphony Hall there comes to the desk a copy of a new edition of M. A. de Wolfe Howe's book called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931." This revised and extended edition of a book first published in 1914 commemorates the 50th anniversary of the founding of the orchestra. It includes the writer's interesting narrative of the orchestra's beginning and the record of its early years and supplements these by new chapters, bringing its remarkable musical history up to date with the triumphs of the orchestra under the inspiring conductorship of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The book is well illustrated and documented. Especially valuable are the new appendices which include a complete list of the music played and the dates of performance and a record of soloists and the changes in personnel of the orchestra.

In a preface to the semicentennial edition the author recalls the fears of the founder and sustainer of the orchestra when he put the original manuscript into his hands. That was in the fateful year of 1914 in the very month that saw the outbreak of the World war. Foreseeing what that might involve for the orchestra, Mr. Higginson was inclined to believe that it might be best to drop the idea of publication, saying: "By the time this book can be published, there may not be any orchestra to write about." Fortunately that foreboding was never fulfilled, although in the three and a half years which followed, it came dangerously near to realization. The 50th anniversary season, all the details of which are included in the volume, together with Bliss Perry's address in memory of Mr. Higginson, found the orchestra firmly established and artistically at a peak of achievement which it had not hitherto attained.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
APR 29 1931

A Commemoration History.

Through the courtesy of the management of Symphony Hall there comes to the desk a copy of a new edition of M. A. de Wolfe Howe's book called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931." This revised and extended edition of a book first published in 1914 commemorates the 50th anniversary of the founding of presented, some of them composed especially for the anniversary year programs. Mr. Koussevitzky, in our opinion, has kept a just balance between the new and the old. Certainly he has not neglected the talent which our young American composers are developing.

For the final programs this week no novelties are announced. On the list are such familiar numbers as the prelude to Wagner's opera "Die Meistersinger;" Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun;" the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MORRISTOWN, N. J.
JERSEYMAN
APR 29 1931

Music In Boston

Many years ago—perhaps fifty or sixty or more—Major Henry L. Higginson, of Boston, conceived the idea of having a great orchestra in Boston. Major Higginson thereupon started the development of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It cost him a great deal of money to import the best of European conductors for this orchestra and to develop members of the organization into soloists, which is what he did. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, from this start given it by Major Higginson, has given two concerts a week in Boston for something like half a century. One concert is on Friday afternoon and is called a recital. It is really a rehearsal of the Saturday evening concert by the orchestra. The two concerts, one Friday afternoon and the other Saturday evening, are identical, and each is attended by the people of Boston and the suburbs, come what will. An earthquake in Boston would not stop one of these concerts.

Last Friday the Crown Prince of Japan and his bride were in Boston. They desired to go to the Friday afternoon concert. They went, but they sat in seats in the second balcony, which were the only seats available. No discourtesy was meant to the royal visitors by putting them in the second balcony. There simply were no other seats. There never are any other seats.

Henry L. Higginson has been dead for many years, but his orchestra goes on. His memorial is perpetual. He established an institution that has taken hold of a whole community. Major Higginson, now dead, is the musical life of Boston. It is amazing what one individual, with a little vision, can do for a whole community. Lucky is the community, large or small, in which there is one individual with real vision and public spirit. Boston has had many great citizens, but few of them ever did more for the city than Major Higginson and his orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NASHVILLE, TENN.
TENNESSEAN
APR 30 1931

Editorial of the Day

A PRINCE IN THE BALCONY

Those familiar with Boston and its institutions will find no cause for surprise in the fact that when last week the prince and princess of Japan attended a regular Friday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall the only seats available to royalty were in the second balcony.

Prince Takamatsu, long before reaching Boston, according to dispatches, had expressed a wish to hear this renowned orchestra, but a second balcony section was the only one available to the royal party, and that only because regular subscribers freely gave up their season seats for the occasion.

It must not be supposed that this circumstance is indicative of any indifference on the part of Bostonians to their distinguished visitors, for the Japanese party was later entertained at a state banquet which was attended by Mayor Curley, Governor Ely and other prominent Bay State citizens and presented with suitable souvenirs of the occasion, but it is a circumstance which adequately reflects the attitude of the people of Boston toward their own traditions and institutions, and Friday afternoon symphony is one of the most notable of these.

Nothing can interfere with this weekly festival of the Back Bay. Symphony is no movable feast, no casual social gathering, but an unchanging ritual, an irrevocable law to itself, transcending and surpassing all other customs and obligations, a veritable and authentic manifestation of the absolute. Neither membership in the Union Club nor attendance at debutante balls at the Somerset partake of its implications and inviolability. It is the utter epitome of things Bostonian.

So Prince Takamatsu and his bride may feel fortunate that their imperial motor car found itself in Huntington avenue among the pre-Cambrian limousines and other vehicles of heroic vintage affected by the residents of Beacon Hill and the avenue, for if Judgment day itself should fall on a Friday in the Season, it is probable that the Angel Gabriel would be roundly shushed by good Bostonians for introducing a discord into the regular performance of symphony.—New York Herald Tribune.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
APR 30 1931

DR. KARL MUCK'S WAR INTERNMENT TERMED UNJUST

New History of Boston Symphony Orchestra Featured by Defense of Former Conductor.

BOSTON, April 30—Simultaneously with the closing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th season there has come from the press of the Houghton Mifflin Company a new edition of M. A. De Wolfe Howe's history of the orchestra, first published in 1914, that carries the chronicle of that illustrous band straight up to the final programs. Mr. Howe's collaborator in this deed of efficiency was John N. Burk of the staff of the Symphony Hall, to whom is due the ninth and tenth chapters, that cover the conductorships of Rabaud of Monteux and that of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky; while from Mr. Howe himself comes Chapter VIII., captioned Interlude, that deals with the trying years of 1914-18.

Effect of the War.

The progress of the orchestra from its inception through the spring of 1914 was untroubled, save for minor disputations. Twice in the ensuing years its very existence was threatened. First, by the World War and its obvious effect upon an orchestra that from the beginning had been German trained and German led and, second, by the strike of 1920, when the defection of 36 musicians, a third of the entire personnel, precipitated an even more serious crisis.

In the prosperity, good feeling and general satisfactions of this anniversary year those dark and troublous days are easily forgotten. To read Mr. Howe's and Mr. Burk's pages is to have them vividly recalled and almost arest's

IN STREET
aken on RGE REFRIGER-

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHELSEA, MASS.
EVENING RECORD
APR 30 193

III BOSTON

Miss Edna Ida Nitkin, talented daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Nitkin of 294 Washington ave., won the Mason and Hamlin prize of a grand pianoforte at the 22nd annual competition conducted by the New England Conservatory of Music in Jordan hall, Boston, yesterday.

Miss Nitkin, a graduate of Chelsea high in 1923, entered the Conservatory soon afterwards and was graduated in 1928 as a pupil of Mme. Antoinette Szumowska. Since graduation she has continued in the post graduate department as a pupil of Jesus Maria Sanroma, who was the Mason and Hamlin winner in 1920.

Her program in the contest, on which she was marked by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Harold Bauer and Joseph Lhevinne, noted pianists, the judges, was: Bach—Allemande and Gigue from the French Suite; Beethoven—first movement of the Sonata in E major, op. 109, and Chopin—Ballade in G minor.

Following the announcement of the award, Miss Nitkin received from Dr. Koussevitsky an invitation to play with the Boston Symphony at one of its concerts next season.

This year's field of contestants, drawn from the senior and post graduate pianoforte classes, was the largest in the history of the contests.

Carl Charles Feldman of Manchester, N. H., a graduate of the Conservatory in 1927, received honorable mention.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD
NEWS
APR 30

DAY BY DAY

By CARROLL DULANEY

There is a bit of local war history—World War, I mean—in "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931," just published by Houghton-Mifflin Company. It refers to the celebrated incident, back in October, 1917, when Dr. Karl Muck, director of the orchestra, refused to play "The Star-Spangled Banner." The author of the book, M. A. De Wolfe Howe, says Dr. Muck's refusal was due to the fact that the orchestra had no time to rehearse the number. And then he continues:

"But the temper of the time, in the very nature of the case, was

—as it was harder to realize than it is now—quite abnormal. Newspapers continued to repeat the untruth that Dr. Muck had scornfully refused to play 'The Star-Spangled Banner,' and the flames spread far beyond Boston. Early in November the orchestra was scheduled for a concert in Baltimore. A former Governor of Maryland was reported as declaring that if Muck attempted to lead an orchestra in that city he would gladly lead a mob to prevent such an insult to his country and flag. Cardinal Gibbons gave his approval to the agitation on three grounds, the first of which was that 'The Star-Spangled Banner' had been written in Baltimore. A woman at a mass-meeting of protest shouted, at the mention of Muck's name, 'Kill such a man!' and the Grand Jury asked the Police Commissioner of Baltimore to forbid the proposed concert, which was done."

The author admits that the refusal to play the anthem was a mistake, but places the blame on Col. Henry Lee Higginson, founder and patron of the orchestra, rather than Dr. Muck.

Koussevitzky In These Days Of Full Prime

The Symphony Concerts at the End of His Seventh Year of Ripening

May 1 — Transcript.

CONSIDER, through the turn of a column, the obligations of the conductor of a symphony orchestra of the first rank and of international note, standing as Dr. Koussevitzky does today and tomorrow at the end of a seventh year before the same public. Consider those obligations severally—the holding of the orchestra in discipline yet at the top of individual and collective bent; the maintaining through sixty-odd concerts in seven months of a high level of performance; the arranging and the re-arranging of eighty or ninety or a hundred pieces through those sixty-odd programs; the choosing of those pieces out of past and present, from the established, the novel, the neglected, the innovating, from many composers of many periods working in diverse manners; the humoring—for it must be done—of predilection and prejudice in audiences; the safeguarding of health and spirits without which good work is impossible; the preserving—at the back of the head, without pretense or ostentation, yet in all the daily round—of the ambition, the standards, the devotion to a profession and an art that are a conductor's honor; the infusing of an inexhaustible vitality into the chosen music, the accomplished performance, the reactions of the audience. Consider these obligations. Then test Dr. Koussevitzky by his fulfillment of them.

By common consent the Boston Orchestra has returned to the first rank. Mr. Monteux began the return. Dr. Koussevitzky continued, achieved and assured it. The prestige of the orchestra at home and abroad is at highest. In the concert-hall the numbers, applause, interest and loyalty of audiences attest it. In print, reviewers, chroniclers, essayists, bear witness to it. Visiting Europeans confirm it. There are Japanese aware of it. Perhaps we Bostonians are now inclined to take it for granted; to forget that it was gained through seven years of unrelaxing ambition, patience and work; that even slight recession on stage or in auditorium will endanger it.

The Symphony Concerts, as repositories of music, enjoy a like note. There is none to excel them in range, variety, liberality. Eighteenth-century masters may begin programs; Americans of the younger generation fill middle place; a classic of the nineteenth century round the list. There is room for composers of every period, nationality, style, so long as their music keeps vitality. The present is fostered—because the composition of music is a continuous art infused with the life of the time; a pursuit of new matter, methods, means and freedoms; a revelation of newfound, ripening, individualized abilities. Yet proportion is heeded; while along with it goes care for the pleasuring of a diversified audience.

From generalities pass to particulars. The orchestra is composed of players in prime, neither unripened nor over-routined. Heard in chamber-concerts or in solo-pieces outside Symphony Hall, relatively minor members of the choirs surprise by fineness of individual quality. Assembled on their own stage, for no music are they unready, while none overtaxes their abilities—often to the surprise and admiration of visiting composers and guest-conductors. Changes are now few. For the most part, they are the entrance of a new and remarkable talent, like Mr. Polatschek as first clarinet, or Mr. Böttcher as first horn, or Mr. Sanromá as pianist. By association the players have come to feel and know each other; to feel, know and work in image of the conductor. Wherever a hundred more or less sensitive men work together under one, highly sensitive; wherever discipline is the first essential to achievement, there are flashes of irritation. They pass humanwise; while the reciprocating spirit prevails and endures.

Hence the merits of a string choir whose precision and plasticity are unexcelled; who command every finesse and every energy of tone, passing at will from sensuous beauty to striding power; whose sensibility and unanimity serve equally the composer's and conductor's will. Beside it sits a woodwind choir of matched virtuosity with their several instruments, of unfailing musical intelligence, as quick and manifold as the strings in response to the music before them, to the conductor's purpose. It is the distinction of the brass choir that it ranges at will from mellow nineteenth-century sonority to piercing twentieth-century plangency. No modernist rhythming or coloring has yet overtaxed the percussion corner.

As a unified orchestra, these choirs now play with a balance and a reciprocation capable of the finest euphonies or the sharpest contrasts. They range from suggestion to proclamation. Above all, they are supple masters of diverse styles. They excel with Mozart and Haydn. They excel also with Stravinsky and Hindemith. They sound Beethoven and Brahms charactered. They do as much for Debussy and Ravel. Finally such an orchestra and such a conductor have gradually sensitized their accustomed audiences. They are not only suffused with sensuous beauty, thrilled with power, whipped by rhythm, dazzled with color. The quick-eared and quick-minded answer now to subtleties and suggestion, to the finer play of this orchestral art.

From the orchestra of Koussevitzky to his programs. But first, a clearing of the ground. No orchestra can maintain its quality, no audience keep its interest, next to no conductor express himself under the repeated and super-polished performance of a narrow range of music, for the most part classic or museum pieces. The orchestra is staled; the audience sated; the conductor turned finical; the classics themselves routined and devitalized. Furthermore: in a thousand heads float memories of music once liked, now by time and change stripped, outmoded and deadened. To resurrect it and to pretend with it would bring only boredom and disillusion. Yet again: while there are those who are deeply and sincerely stirred by the classics or the surviving romantics, there are also those who are as warmly and honestly impressed by the modernists. It is possible to be thrilled by Stravinsky as well as by Beethoven; to be engrossed by Hindemith as well as by Brahms; to take pleasure in Schumann and also in Honegger. If age must be served, so also must youth, if an orchestra is to endure and be a living thing. If the narrow-minded must be warily humored, twice over should the catholic-eared be pleasured.

Once more: though august matrons do part in dudgeon and gray heads mutter about "noise," the modernists will continue to write in their own manner because thereby they express themselves and their generation. No more can they be excluded from the concerts of the nineteen-thirties than current inventions can be excluded from our households or current manners and customs eschewed in our living. They are a part of the life and the music of our time. A considerable and indispensable public wishes to hear them, as it reads the literature or looks at the painting of its own day. If the modernists were to be removed bodily from the Symphony Concerts, many that now complain of an excess of them would discover and regret the gap. After five years of Monteux and seven years of Koussevitzky, the course of the Symphony Concerts may not easily be turned backward. After fifty years of Symphony Concerts over which the conductor's will has been decisive, no faction in the public, be it conservative or radical, is likely to strip him of his power. Conductors who passion themselves most for performance will prefer classics to moderns. Conductors who passion themselves most for music in itself will give ear to the composers of the immediate day. Conductors who join both passions, like Dr. Koussevitzky, will hold the balance true.

For at bottom the whole controversy resolves itself into a question of proportion. By the evidence of his programs through seven years, Dr. Koussevitzky has not neglected the classics. He has restored the composers of the eighteenth century to just place in the Symphony Concerts. He has not only played Beethoven and Brahms; he has re-vitalized them. No conductor within memory has given Mendelssohn more room; cultivated Schumann more sympathetically. In our ears he has re-created Berlioz. Wagner is intrinsically a composer of the opera house. Dr. Koussevitzky, like Dr. Muck, like most conductors of the present day, prefers to leave him in his own field. There have been condescensions to the popular favor for certain symphonies of Saint-Saëns, Dvorák and Franck.

To pass to established composers of our own day, Debussy and Ravel, Strauss and Sibelius, have ranged as never before through the programs at Symphony Hall. To them Chaikovsky and, in degree, Rimsky-Korsakov have been restored. Mahler and Bruckner have been rediscovered. Hardly an American of conspicuous promise or proved performance has been overlooked. For the most part the discarded romantics are only those whom time—the court without appeal—have banished the world over from the concert-hall. These things being as they certainly are, may not the modernists and the young men have the remaining room? To whom but to the living, to vitzky have distributed the commissions of this anniversary year? Predilections aside, not few who would deny him are those who cannot bear the thought that conductor and trustees are alike inaccessible to their imperious and accustomed will.

Most of us who listen with any discrimination and background to the Symphony Concerts, who count them as something more than week-end gathering-place for entertainment, have had our differences with Dr. Koussevitzky. Hearing the outcome, we have wondered why he accepted and played this or that new piece. Exalting our own notions, we have preferred another pace or accent to his. Harking back, as we fondly believed, to the composer, we have doubted his version of the piece in hand. One in so often must he try to dramatize a music intrinsically undramatic? Or the choice or the arrangement of a program has irked us. All these are the minor and momentary concomitants, inevitable but also trivial, of a conductorship seven years long. Beside Dr. Koussevitzky's essential and ripened qualities, they recede into the small and personal objection before the large and determining considerations. At the end of seven years, it is again in order to call the roll.

It is essential that the Symphony Concerts should escape routine. Season after season and week after week, Dr. Koussevitzky sets in a focus of interest, a source of surprise, a satisfaction remembered and renewed. It is essential that the conductor himself should not be routined. To hackneyed repertory pieces Dr. Koussevitzky comes freshly, infuses them with a new vitality, sounds them as they may have plausibly sounded when they also were new. To untried pieces he brings a patience, persistence, faith and zest that are the delight of the composers that half-persuade even unreceptive listeners.

A conductor may not spare himself and bring an orchestra to the standards of performance, gradually gained and now sustained at Symphony Hall. No more may he spare himself when he would have his programs as wide-ranging as those which Dr. Koussevitzky now assembles. There are classics to be assorted, revivals to be considered, new scores to be studied, one adjustment after another to be made—and he does not flag. After choice, rehearsals and again he is tireless. After performance, betterments under second thought, and his third version of a given piece usually excels the first and the second. The ideal conductor of a permanent orchestra, of an annual series of concerts, is a conductor who places them above all else in his life. After seven years neither the ambition, the devotion nor the incessant work of Dr. Koussevitzky diminishes. He pursues an ideal, rejoicing in his heart that it will always outstrip him by a little.

In those seven years Dr. Koussevitzky's powers have ripened. Remember his Mozart as it was at the beginning and as it is now. Recall his first and his present delivery of the tone-poems of Strauss. The vitality of his Beethoven is ever renewed. His Brahms is measured to a just balance of the essential qualities. His Debussy and Ravel are more and more sensitive and subtilized. Not one of his modernists that is not charactered. Not one of his young men that is not set in the best attainable light. . . . In the earlier day Dr. Koussevitzky tended to over-do to lose measure and control by excess of pre-occupation with the music before him. Now he is surer master of himself and of it. He accomplishes remarkable performances; but he does not set virtuosity over the disclosure of the music in spirit, truth, character and life.

It is true that whatever Dr. Koussevitzky does is colored high or deep with his own personal quality. But that "personality" is kindling force upon orchestra, audience, piece and composer. It is also essential nowadays to the American concert-hall. The conductor's variety gratifies the American instinct for change; is proof against over-familiarity. His inexhaustible vitality keeps every trait and every ability in play and unclouded. When at some distant day, he lays down it

Concert-Chronicle

Cantabrigian Farewell

AT Sanders Theater of Harvard University in Cambridge the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave the concert which is the season's last in the second largest "series" in metropolitan Boston, the concert which is also prelude to the last pair of concerts of the current season at Symphony Hall. Those last two concerts, however, the program of last evening did not anticipate. Rather did it go back—as is the frequent custom of Cantabrigian programs—to works on recent programs. In fact, except for one item the program was that of last Monday evening in Boston—Bach, three movements from the suite in D; Brahms, Symphony in C minor. The third piece, which was Lambert's new and ebullient "Rio Grande" in Boston on Monday, was for obvious practical reasons not on this program but was replaced by the Suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird" from the programs of last Friday and Saturday.

But performances at Cambridge sound less like "mere" repetitions than any other repetitions which the orchestra undertakes: the entire audience is as near to the orchestra as the first considerable body of seats in Symphony Hall, causing performance to take on in a certain degree the chamber music style, stimulating the conductor to such a style; the huge wooden sounding-board above and to the rear of the orchestra causes the most subtle nuances to take on a definiteness they rarely assume otherwise, causes climaxes to shine forth; Dr. Koussevitzky, by nature not given to stale repetition, takes advantage of acoustical and architectural differences to remold and remake "interpretations" with which rehearsal and performance have made them thoroughly familiar; the men, familiar by seven years' intensive training under one man (the advantages of which unbroken, cumulative training no other orchestra now enjoys) respond in maximum degree to the least suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky's flexible conducting.

The net result last evening was that not a single number went without applause in such quantities as to demand calling the players to their feet in response. In Bach's suite it was first violins that made such response. For first violins carry (as the phrase goes) that wondrous melody which has become as a household word in the arrangement for solo violin. First violins also bear the burden of the lilting and stamping measures of the final Gigue. And melody and dance, together with the preceding three-fold overture, proved irresistible to this audience of earnest and serious professors, even more earnest and serious students (nobody can be more serious and earnest than a student once he is headed in that direction) and like-minded residents of the other bank of the Charles.

And from the orchestra under this wooden shell came the dances from the "Firebird" with a vividness, with graphic quality, with a rhythmic verve that made one miss the dancers less than one would believe that concert performance could make it possible to miss them. How agile the movements of the princesses in their play with the golden apples! How barbaric, how clothed with splendors, how wild and untamed the final dance of Katschei's cohorts! And by contrast, how subtle and fluid the dance of the princesses! Just possibly all this was even better than had there been dancers to distract the attention.

And again Brahms's First. One believed on Monday that Dr. Koussevitzky had reached a surpassing performance. After last evening's performance one was not quite so certain about the uniqueness of that Monday reading. Last evening rhythms here and there seemed more energetic, the life-blood of the symphony pulsed a little more—youthfully perhaps? But the grandeur and the breadths were in no wise diminished, and the song of the slow movement never rang more true nor the quiet melody of the Allegretto with more simple charm. And never have the high first violins, near the middle of the slow movement gathered more intense heat than last evening. Thus one finds another surpassing performance to lay beside that of last Monday. Which was the finer? Who can say? But why choose? The Cantabrigians, not having heard Monday's performance, knew no necessity for choice, showered thunders of approval upon conductor and men; at the last rose in their enthusiasm together with the rising forces on the stage, to do final honor to a beloved conductor and orchestra not to be heard again for a six-month.

A. H. M.

Spring Rites For a Season Now Closing

Leave-Taking, Music and Other Incidents Bestrewing the Symphonic Friday

May 2 — Transcript.

THE CONCERT itself shall be example and excuse for the reviewer. Perhaps it was the return of spring weather which made some of us see all things green and count spats a useless and deplorable human invention. Perhaps it was the thirty pages of tables, lists, summaries, indices, that filled more than half the program-book—the annual orgy, on such a May Day more than usually indecent. Perhaps it was the chronological record—the final matinée of the fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts. Whatever the cause, the occasion wore a relaxed air—the indomitable Koussevitzky and his equally indomitable orchestra always excepted. They persevered to the end. For the rest of us the present seemed more engaging than the past in spite of the editor's monstrosity of statistics; the future, in turn, more beguiling than the present.

True, we listened not only politely but intently. True again, the last matinée audience of the symphonic year was altogether coughless. Yet were our minds as firm-fixed as our ears upon music and performance? There was the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," for instance, with which the concert began. It had not changed as masterful piece of flowing counterpoint. But it was pleasanter to think of the banks of the Rhine—the river flowing between—when the train skirts them en route to Munich, most agreeable of summer cities. Soon Debussy's Faun was peering, tonally, out of his bosky shelter. By the same token, soon the chestnut-trees will be in bloom in Paris and the Seine slip under the bridges gold-sheeted from the westering sun.

Between whiles, too, our tongues would run away from the music in presence. Since familiar numbers, all in high favor, filled the program, there was no one to say "Well! Penstock, I suppose you liked that awful stuff," as they do after new Hindemith or new Honegger. At this late day no seat-mates protest their devotion to Beethoven's Fifth—possibly from the subconscious suspicion that at the back of both their heads is a suppressed desire to flee that hackneyed masterpiece. Much more in tune with the day and the mood were exchanges of spring leave-takings and summer plans, diversified by swift little excursions into the Subscription Office to discover whether next year's seats were certainly booked. For on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, and Saturday evening, Oct. 10, the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor—will begin.

Perhaps the relaxing mood seeped also into the applause; while in such things, as every frequenter of Symphony Hall knows, the matinée audience is law and custom unto itself. At the first pause in Beethoven in C minor, it began to dribble away. Not even a bit of ceremony for the five-months' parting with conductor and orchestra could stay it, when at last Beethoven was weary of repeating his final chords. It summoned the orchestra to its feet; called back the conductor once and twice; clapped out and stamped out farewell. But its collective mind, as usual, was on the door and the car, the taxi and the traffic. . . . Nor, as usual, could it agree to stand unanimously or to sit collectively when it was clapping. Dr. Koussevitzky's first entrance. For the standing posture, some will and some will not, whether a passing Japanese Prince or a familiar conductor is the occasion. Whoever the object, there should be an end to these scraggly matinée "homages."

In point of fact the only flood of applause, the afternoon through, followed the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Then it was torrential, alike for the splendor of the music and the passion of the performance. So eager and persistent were these plaudits that they hastened the rites of the day. In the first twenty-minutes of the concert, the orchestra was on its feet, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin at handshaking; while from the back of the stage to the back of the auditorium everybody was beaming upon everyone else. A bright May afternoon does not invite to amateur program-making. Yet the Prelude might have been better placed at the end of the concert. In itself it is an irresistible music. The performance yesterday drove f[illegible] and striding, tense and climactic, at moments overmuch so for Wagner's flood of golden tone and the songful waves into which it often breaks. The Prelude not only suits a festal occasion; it teems with the zest of living and doing and pleasuring. At the sound of it romance cries in the street and purges our souls, though we may be as heavy with the years and the flesh and our natural vanities as those self-same burghers of Nuremberg. Some of us breathe the freer; hold our heads the higher, for the hearing of it. It signalled the beginning, it should have crowned the end, of this semi-centennial year at Symphony Hall.

There were other incidents to be noted and at leisure pondered. To scan the "rush seats" in the second balcony was to note a few unoccupied. What say to that with a program of familiar classics—"Die Meistersinger" and "The Faun," "Till Eulenspiegel" and the Fifth Symphony—when a quasi-modernist list will usually fill every chair? And what again for the scant applause after Debussy's Prelude? It is an acknowledged and untarnished masterpiece. Conductor and orchestra evoke and excel in it. Seldom have they been more in the mood and the atmosphere than when Mr. Laurent sounded his flute, Mr. Gillet his oboe, Mr. Polatschek his clarinet, Mr. Zighera his harp, Mr. Böttcher and his comp[illegible] their horns. Yet the reward wa[illegible] and lukewarm. "The Faun," m[illegible] deservedly, may be going out [illegible] inée fashion. More probably, th[illegible] ence takes piece and performanc[illegible] granted, which state of mind is [illegible] the pitfalls to perfection at the Sym[illegible] Concerts.

From Strauss's "Till" and Beeth[illegible] Fifth, the reviewer, reminding his[illegible] ers of the mood of the day, confi[illegible] claims exemption and excuse. Wit[illegible] stroke of his pen he agrees to al[illegible] has been said in praise of Strauss's [illegible] ing in tones, of a comic characteri[illegible] hardly to be matched within the [illegible] and the means of symphonic music[illegible] as the years accumulate upon his[illegible] and "Till's"—to say nothing of th[illegible] poser's—he is coming to believe tha[illegible] ductors, keen for the details with [illegible] Strauss invariably tempts them, [illegible] "Till" too little in the vein of fo[illegible] and broad humor. The folk-tale [illegible] mistakable at the beginning and th[illegible] Till's tonal exercises in the market[illegible] and the court-room hardly accord[illegible] the wit and the irony of which we[illegible] to hear so much. To the contrary[illegible] are good comic stuff to tickle the r[illegible] well as the ears of hearers. Dr. [illegible] sevitzky steers a middle course. H[illegible] well with the measures of folk-tale; [illegible] the clowneries the superlative s[illegible] Strauss and his own orchestra pre[illegible] him to over-refinement. By all the [illegible] and on more than one of Strauss's [illegible] "Till" is brash.

Almost always Dr. Koussevitzk[illegible] news Beethoven. In the Fifth Symp[illegible] he gains his end by an eminently [illegible] and simple version, high heroic nor[illegible] less; so makes play with the song[illegible] and the accents of the orchestra [illegible] tone and his pains, indeed, were t[illegible] covering to a slow movement that[illegible] tains not a little Beethovenish con[illegible] place. . . . For the rest let th[illegible] viewer take his pleasure of a conce[illegible] its own sake and his; for once a ma[illegible] a brother and not—God save the ma[illegible] an oracle. He deserves it, at season's

H. T.

Koussevitzky In These Days Of Full Prime

The Symphony Concerts at the End of His Seventh Year of Ripening

May 1 Transcript.

CONSIDER, through the turn of a column, the obligations of the conductor of a symphony orchestra of the first rank and of international note, standing as Dr. Koussevitzky does today and tomorrow at the end of a seventh year before the same public. Consider those obligations severally—the holding of the orchestra in discipline yet at the top of individual and collective bent; the maintaining through sixty-odd concerts in seven months of a high level of performance; the arranging and the re-arranging of eighty or ninety or a hundred pieces through those sixty-odd programs; the choosing of those pieces out of past and present, from the established, the novel, the neglected, the innovating, from many composers of many periods working in diverse manners; the humoring—for it must be done—of predilection and prejudice in audiences; the safeguarding of health and spirits without which good work is impossible; the preserving—at the back of the head, without pretense or ostentation, yet in all the daily round—of the ambition, the standards, the devotion to a profession and an art that are a conductor's honor; the infusing of an inexhaustible vitality into the chosen music, the accomplished performance, the reactions of the audience. Consider these obligations. Then test Dr. Koussevitzky by his fulfillment of them.

By common consent the Boston Orchestra has returned to the first rank. Mr. Monteux began the return. Dr. Koussevitzky continued, achieved and assured it. The prestige of the orchestra at home and abroad is at highest. In the concert-hall the numbers, applause, interest and loyalty of audiences attest it. In print, reviewers, chroniclers, essayists, bear witness to it. Visiting Europeans confirm it. There are Japanese aware of it. Perhaps we Bostonians are now inclined to take it for granted; to forget that it was gained through seven years of unrelaxing ambition, patience and work that even slight recession on stage or in auditorium will endanger it.

The Symphony Concerts, as repositories of music, enjoy a like note. There is none to excel them in range, variety, liberality. Eighteenth-century masters may begin programs; Americans of the younger generation fill middle place; a classic of the nineteenth century round the list. There is room for composers of every period, nationality, style, so long as their music keeps vitality. The present is fostered—because the composition of music is a continuous art infused with the life of the time; a pursuit of new matter, methods, means and freedoms; a revelation of newfound, ripening, individualized abilities. Yet proportion is heeded; while along with it goes care for the pleasuring of a diversified audience.

From generalities pass to particulars. The orchestra is composed of players in prime, neither unripened nor over-routined. Heard in chamber-concerts or in solo-pieces outside Symphony Hall, relatively minor members of the choirs surprize by fineness of individual quality. Assembled on their own stage, for no music are they unready, while none overtaxes their abilities—often to the surprise and admiration of visiting composers and guest-conductors. Changes are now few. For the most part, they are the entrance of a new and remarkable talent, like Mr. Polatschek as first clarinet, or Mr. Böttcher as first horn, or Mr. Sanromá as pianist. By association the players have come to feel and know each other; to feel, know and work in image of the conductor. Wherever a hundred more or less sensitive men work together under one, highly sensitive; wherever discipline is the first essential to achievement, there are flashes of irritation. They pass humanwise; while the reciprocating spirit prevails and endures.

Hence the merits of a string choir whose precision and plasticity are unexcelled; who command every finesse and every energy of tone, passing at will from sensuous beauty to striding power; whose sensibility and unanimity serve equally the composer's and conductor's will. Beside it sits a woodwind choir of matched virtuosity with their several instruments, of unfailing musical intelligence, as quick and manifold as the strings in response to the music before them, to the conductor's purpose. It is the distinction of the brass choir that it ranges at will from mellow nineteenth-century sonority to piercing twentieth-century plangency. No modernist rhythming or coloring has yet overtaxed the percussion corner.

As a unified orchestra, these choirs now play with a balance and a reciprocation capable of the finest euphonies or the sharpest contrasts. They range from suggestion to proclamation. Above all, they are supple masters of diverse styles. They excel with Mozart and Haydn. They excel also with Stravinsky and Hindemith. They sound Beethoven and Brahms charactered. They do as much for Debussy and Ravel. Finally such an orchestra and such a conductor have gradually sensitized their accustomed audiences. They are not only suffused with sensuous beauty, thrilled with power, whipped by rhythm, dazzled with color. The quick-eared and quick-minded answer now to subtleties and suggestion, to the finer play of this orchestral art.

From the orchestra of Koussevitzky to his programs. But first, a clearing of the ground. No orchestra can maintain its quality, no audience keep its interest, next to no conductor express himself under the repeated and super-polished performance of a narrow range of music, for the most part classic or museum pieces. The orchestra is staled; the audience sated; the conductor turned finical; the classics themselves routined and devitalized. Furthermore: in a thousand heads float memories of music once liked, now by time and change stripped, outmoded and deadened. To resurrect it and to pretend with it would bring only boredom and disillusion. Yet again: while there are those who are deeply and sincerely stirred by the classics or the surviving romantics, there are also those who are as warmly and honestly impressed by the modernists. It is possible to be thrilled by Stravinsky as well as by Beethoven; to be engrossed by Hindemith as well as by Brahms; to take pleasure in Schumann and also in Honegger. If age must be served, so also must youth, if an orchestra is to endure and be a living thing. If the narrow-minded must be warily humored, twice over should the catholic-eared be pleasured.

Once more: though august matrons depart in dudgeon and gray heads mutter about "noise," the modernists will continue to write in their own manner because thereby they express themselves and their generation. No more can they be excluded from the concerts of the nineteen-thirties than current inventions can be excluded from our households or current manners and customs eschewed in our living. They are a part of the life and the music of our time. A considerable and indispensable public wishes to hear them, as it reads the literature or looks at the painting of its own day. If the modernists were to be removed bodily from the Symphony Concerts, many that now complain of an excess of them would discover and regret the gap. After five years of Monteux and seven years of Koussevitzky, the course of the Symphony Concerts may not easily be turned backward. After fifty years of Symphony Concerts over which the conductor's will has been decisive, no faction in the public, be it conservative or radical, is likely to strip him of his power. Conductors who passion themselves most for performance will prefer classics to moderns. Conductors who passion themselves most for music in itself will give ear to the composers of the immediate day. Conductors who join both passions, like Dr. Koussevitzky, will hold the balance true.

For at bottom the whole controversy resolves itself into a question of proportion. By the evidence of his programs through seven years, Dr. Koussevitzky has not neglected the classics. He has restored the composers of the eighteenth century to just place in the Symphony Concerts. He has not only played Beethoven and Brahms; he has re-vitalized them. No conductor within memory has given Mendelssohn more room; cultivated Schumann more sympathetically. In our ears he has re-created Berlioz. Wagner is intrinsically a composer of the opera house. Dr. Koussevitzky, like Dr. Muck, like most conductors of the present day, prefers to leave him in his own field. There have been condescensions to the popular favor for certain symphonies of Saint-Saëns, Dvorák and Franck.

To pass to established composers of our own day, Debussy and Ravel, Strauss and Sibelius, have ranged as never before through the programs at Symphony Hall. To them Chaikovsky and, in degree, Rimsky-Korsakov have been restored. Mahler and Bruckner have been rediscovered. Hardly an American of conspicuous promise or proved performance has been overlooked. For the most part the discarded romantics are only those whom time—the court without appeal—have banished the world over from the concert-hall. These things being as they certainly are, may not the modernists and the young men have the remaining room? To whom but to the living, to write as they chose, could Dr. Koussevitzky have distributed the commissions of this anniversary year? Predilections aside, not few who would deny him are those who cannot bear the thought that conductor and trustees are alike inaccessible to their imperious and accustomed will.

Most of us who listen with any discrimination and background to the Symphony Concerts, who count them as something more than week-end gathering-place for entertainment, have had our differences with Dr. Koussevitzky. Hearing the outcome, we have wondered why he accepted and played this or that new piece. Exalting our own notions, we have preferred another pace or accent to his. Harking back, as we fondly believed, to the composer, we have doubted his version of the piece in hand. One in so often must he try to dramatize a music intrinsically undramatic? Or the choice or the arrangement of a program has irked us. All these are the minor and momentary concomitants, inevitable but also trivial, of a conductorship seven years long. Beside Dr. Koussevitzky's essential and ripened qualities, they recede into the small and personal objection before the large and determining considerations. At the end of seven years, it is again in order to call the roll.

It is essential that the Symphony Concerts should escape routine. Season after season and week after week, Dr. Koussevitzky sets in a focus of interest, a source of surprise, a satisfaction remembered and renewed. It is essential that the conductor himself should not be routined. To hackneyed repertory pieces Dr. Koussevitzky comes freshly, infuses them with a new vitality, sounds them as they may have plausibly sounded when they also were new. To untried pieces he brings a patience, persistence, faith and zest that are the delight of the composers that half-persuade even unreceptive listeners.

A conductor may not spare himself and bring an orchestra to the standards of performance, gradually gained and now sustained at Symphony Hall. No more may he spare himself when he would have his programs as wide-ranging as those which Dr. Koussevitzky now assembles. There are classics to be assorted, revivals to be considered, new scores to be studied, one adjustment after another to be made—and he does not flag. After choice, rehearsals and again he is tireless. After performance, betterments under second thought, and his third version of a given piece usually excels the first and the second. The ideal conductor of a permanent orchestra, of an annual series of concerts, is a conductor who places them above all else in his life. After seven years neither the ambition, the devotion nor the incessant work of Dr. Koussevitzky diminishes. He pursues an ideal, rejoicing in his heart that it will always outstrip him by a little.

In those seven years Dr. Koussevitzky's powers have ripened. Remember his Mozart as it was at the beginning and as it is now. Recall his first and his present delivery of the tone-poems of Strauss. The vitality of his Beethoven is ever renewed. His Brahms is measured to a just balance of the essential qualities. His Debussy and Ravel are more and more sensitive and subtilized. Not one of his modernists that is not charactered. Not one of his young men that is not set in the best attainable light. . . . In the earlier day Dr. Koussevitzky tended to over-do to lose measure and control by excess of pre-occupation with the music before him. Now he is surer master of himself and of it. He accomplishes remarkable performances; but he does not set virtuosity over the disclosure of the music in spirit, truth, character and life.

It is true that whatever Dr. Koussevitzky does is colored high or deep with his own personal quality. But that "personality" is kindling force upon orchestra, audience, piece and composer. It is also essential nowadays to the American concert-hall. The conductor's variety gratifies the American instinct for change; is proof against over-familiarity. His inexhaustible vitality keeps every trait and every ability in play and unclouded. When at some distant day, he lays down his present charge at his own request—lest his audience should tire of him—his successor will be difficult to find and easy to regret.

H. T. P.

Bana... pkg 25c
Can ... to the ... of the current sea... Symphony Hall. Those last two concerts, however, the program of last evening did not anticipate. Rather did it go back—as is the frequent custom of Cantabrigian programs—to works on recent programs. In fact, except for one item the program was that of last Monday evening in Boston—Bach, three movements from the suite in D; Brahms, Symphony in C minor. The third piece, which was Lambert's new and ebullient "Rio Grande" in Boston on Monday, was for obvious practical reasons not on this program but was replaced by the Suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird" from the programs of last Friday and Saturday.

But performances at Cambridge sound less like "mere" repetitions than any other repetitions which the orchestra undertakes: the entire audience is as near to the orchestra as the first considerable body of seats in Symphony Hall, causing performance to take on in a certain degree the chamber music style, stimulating the conductor to such a style; the huge wooden sounding-board above and to the rear of the orchestra causes the most subtle nuances to take on a definiteness they rarely assume otherwise, causes climaxes to shine forth; Dr. Koussevitzky, by nature not given to stale repetition, takes advantage of acoustical and architectural differences to remold and remake "interpretations" with which rehearsal and performance have made them thoroughly familiar; the men, familiar by seven years' intensive training under one man (the advantages of which unbroken, cumulative training no other orchestra now enjoys) respond in maximum degree to the least suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky's flexible conducting.

The net result last evening was that not a single number went without applause in such quantities as to demand calling the players to their feet in response. In Bach's suite it was first violins that made such response. For first violins carry (as the phrase goes) that wondrous melody which has become as a household word in the arrangement for solo violin. First violins also bear the burden of the lilting and stamping measures of the final Gigue. And melody and dance, together with the preceding three-fold overture, proved irresistible to this audience of earnest and serious professors, even more earnest and serious students (nobody can be more serious and earnest than a student once he is headed in that direction) and like-minded residents of the other bank of the Charles.

And from the orchestra under this wooden shell came the dances from the "Firebird" with a vividness, with graphic quality, with a rhythmic verve that made one miss the dancers less than one would believe that concert performance could make it possible to miss them. How agile the movements of the princesses in their play with the golden apples! How barbaric, how clothed with splendors, how wild and untamed the final dance of Katschei's cohorts! And by contrast, how subtle and fluid the dance of the princesses! Just possibly all this was even better than had there been dancers to distract the attention.

And again Brahms's First. One believed on Monday that Dr. Koussevitzky had reached a surpassing performance. After last evening's performance one was not quite so certain about the uniqueness of that Monday reading. Last evening rhythms here and there seemed more energetic, the life-blood of the symphony pulsed a little more—youthfully perhaps? But the grandeur and the breadths were in no wise diminished, and the song of the slow movement never rang more true nor the quiet melody of the Allegretto with more simple charm. And never have the high first violins, near the middle of the slow movement gathered more intense heat than last evening. Thus one finds another surpassing performance to lay beside that of last Monday. Which was the finer? Who can say? But why choose? The Cantabrigians, not having heard Monday's performance, knew no necessity for choice, showered thunders of approval upon conductor and men; at the last rose in their enthusiasm together with the rising forces on the stage, to do final honor to a beloved conductor and orchestra not to be heard again for a six-month.

A. H. M.

Spring Rites For a Season Now Closing

Leave-Taking, Music and Other Incidents Bestrewing the Symphonic Friday

May 2 Transcript.

THE CONCERT itself shall be example and excuse for the reviewer. Perhaps it was the return of spring weather which made some of us see all things green and count spats a useless and deplorable human invention. Perhaps it was the thirty pages of tables, lists, summaries, indices, that filled more than half the program-book—the annual orgy, on such a May Day more than usually indecent. Perhaps it was the chronological record—the final matinée of the fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts. Whatever the cause, the occasion wore a relaxed air—the indomitable Koussevitzky and his equally indomitable orchestra always excepted. They persevered to the end. For the rest of us the present seemed more engaging than the past in spite of the editor's monstrosity of statistics; the future, in turn, more beguiling than the present.

True, we listened not only politely but intently. True again, the last matinée audience of the symphonic year was altogether coughless. Yet were our minds as firm-fixed as our ears upon music and performance? There was the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," for instance, with which the concert began. It had not changed as masterful piece of flowing counterpoint. But it was pleasanter to think of the banks of the Rhine—the river flowing between—when the train skirts them en route to Munich, most agreeable of summer cities. Soon Debussy's Faun was peering, tonally, out of his bosky shelter. By the same token, soon the chestnut-trees will be in bloom in Paris and the Seine slip under the bridges gold-sheeted from the westering sun.

Between whiles, too, our tongues would run away from the music in presence. Since familiar numbers, all in high favor, filled the program, there was no one to say "Well! Penstock, I suppose you liked that awful stuff," as they do after new Hindemith or new Honegger. At this late day no seat-mates protest their devotion to Beethoven's Fifth—possibly from the subconscious suspicion that at the back of both their heads is a suppressed desire to flee that hackneyed masterpiece. Much more in tune with the day and the mood were exchanges of spring leave-takings and summer plans, diversified by swift little excursions into the Subscription Office to discover whether next year's seats were certainly booked. For on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, and Saturday evening, Oct. 10, the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor—will begin.

Perhaps the relaxing mood seeped also into the applause; while in such things, as every frequenter of Symphony Hall knows, the matinée audience is law and custom unto itself. At the first pause in Beethoven in C minor, it began to dribble away. Not even a bit of ceremony for the five-months' parting with conductor and orchestra could stay it, when at last Beethoven was weary of repeating his final chords. It summoned the orchestra to its feet; called back the conductor once and twice; clapped out and stamped out farewell. But its collective mind, as usual, was on the door and the car, the taxi and the traffic. . . . Nor, as usual, could it agree to stand unanimously or to sit collectively when it was clapping. Dr. Koussevitzky's first entrance. For the standing posture, some will and some will not, whether a passing Japanese Prince or a familiar conductor is the occasion. Whoever the object, there should be an end to these scraggly matinée "homages."

In point of fact the only flood of applause, the afternoon through, followed the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Then it was torrential, alike for the splendor of the music and the passion of the performance. So eager and persistent were these plaudits that they hastened the rites of the day. In the first twenty-minutes of the concert, the orchestra was on its feet, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin at handshaking; while from the back of the stage to the back of the auditorium everybody was beaming upon everyone else. A bright May afternoon does not invite to amateur program-making. Yet the Prelude might have been better placed at the end of the concert. In itself it is an irresistible music. The performance yesterday drove [illegible] striding, tense and climactic, at moments overmuch so for Wagner's flood of golden tone and the songful waves into which it often breaks. The Prelude not only suits a festal occasion; it teems with the zest of living and doing and pleasuring. At the sound of it romance cries in the street and purges our souls, though we may be as heavy with the years and the flesh and our natural vanities as those self-same burghers of Nuremberg. Some of us breathe the freer; hold our heads the higher, for the hearing of it. It signalled the beginning, it should have crowned the end, of this semi-centennial year at Symphony Hall.

There were other incidents to be noted and at leisure pondered. To scan the "rush seats" in the second balcony was to note a few unoccupied. What say to that with a program of familiar classics—"Die Meistersinger" and "The Faun," "Till Eulenspiegel" and the Fifth Symphony—when a quasi-modernist list will usually fill every chair? And what again for the scant applause after Debussy's Prelude? It is an acknowledged and untarnished masterpiece. Conductor and orchestra evoke and excel in it. Seldom have they been more in the mood and the atmosphere than when Mr. Laurent sounded his flute, Mr. Gillet his oboe, Mr. Polatschek his clarinet, Mr. Zighera his harp, Mr. Böttcher and his comp[illegible] their horns. Yet the reward we[illegible] and lukewarm. "The Faun," m[illegible] deservedly, may be going out [illegible] inée fashion. More probably, th[illegible] ence takes piece and performanc[illegible] granted, which state of mind is [illegible] the pitfalls to perfection at the Sym[illegible] Concerts.

From Strauss's "Till" and Beeth[illegible] Fifth, the reviewer, reminding his[illegible] ers of the mood of the day, conf[illegible] claims exemption and excuse. Wit[illegible] stroke of his pen he agrees to a[illegible] has been said in praise of Strauss's [illegible] ing in tones, of a comic characteri[illegible] hardly to be matched within the [illegible] and the means of symphonic music[illegible] as the years accumulate upon his[illegible] and "Till's"—to say nothing of th[illegible] poser's—he is coming to believe tha[illegible] ductors, keen for the details with [illegible] Strauss invariably tempts them, [illegible] "Till" too little in the vein of fo[illegible] and broad humor. The folk-tale [illegible] mistakable at the beginning and th[illegible] Till's tonal exercises in the marke[illegible] and the court-room hardly accord[illegible] the wit and the irony of which we[illegible] to hear so much. To the contrary[illegible] are good comic stuff to tickle the r[illegible] well as the ears of hearers. Dr. [illegible] sevitzky steers a middle course. H[illegible] well with the measures of folk-tale; [illegible] the clowneries the superlative s[illegible] Strauss and his own orchestra pre[illegible] him to over-refinement. By all the [illegible] and on more than one of Strauss's [illegible] "Till" is brash.

Almost always Dr. Koussevitzk[illegible] news Beethoven. In the Fifth Symp[illegible] he gains his end by an eminently [illegible] and simple version, high heroic not[illegible] less; so makes play with the song [illegible] and the accents of the orchestra [illegible] tone and his pains, indeed, were t[illegible] covering to a slow movement that[illegible] tains not a little Beethovenish con[illegible] place. . . . For the rest let th[illegible] viewer take his pleasure of a conce[illegible] its own sake and his; for once a ma[illegible] a brother and not—God save the m[illegible] an oracle. He deserves it, at season'[illegible]

H. T

190

Herald May 2

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last Friday afternoon concert of the 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg"; Debussy, Prelude to Mallarme's "Afternoon of a Faun"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's "Merry Pranks"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, C Minor.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The 51st season, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will open on Oct. 9.

There is little to be said of the works chosen for this concert; little that would be pertinent, for Dr. Koussevitzky, unlike some other conductors, does not pride himself on discovering or inventing "hidden" pasages of beauty or grandeur that have escaped the notice of even illustrious predecessors. It is enough for him to give admirable performances of works as they exist; not as this or that conductor thinks they should have been written, and is eager to supply the deficiencies, the oversights, the carelessness of the composer. Dr. Koussevitzky, having poetic and dramatic imagination, also that indefinable quality which for lack of a better word is called "magnetism," interprets a symphony, suite, symphonic poem, with due respect for the composer's text. He supplies what the composer could not indicate: the vivifying spirit. Music does not exist until it is performed. There are the notes, but they have no significance until the conductor sees in them so many aids in the revealing the composer's spiritual, dramatic, noble, lyrical or passionately sensuous thoughts as they found musical expression.

It is enough to say of the performance yesterday that it was of the finest virtuoso order in which there was full artistic appreciation of the different qualities that have given each composition its commanding place in the literature of music. The audience was enthusiastic. It rose in greeting Dr. Koussevitzky; it saw with unfeigned regret the end of the season; it rejoiced in the announcement that the conductor would again direct the superb, incomparable orchestra of brilliant musicians; the orchestra that he has formed and shaped.

It is customary to say a few words about a season brought to an end. The 50th was of an anniversary nature; conspicuous also for the Bach Festival. Musicians of European countries and of the United States were invited to enlarge the importance of the anniversary by their contribution of compositions. A piece d'occasion is too often only an expression of good will and honorable intention. Of all the more important contributions to the 50th anniversary Roussel's Symphony and Stravinsky's Symphonie de Psaumes were easily the first in rank. It seemed as if Prokofieff had taken his task too easily, hurriedly. His symphony was not worthy of him. The conductor and the audience had a right to expect from Respighi something better than his "Metamorphoseon"; a theme and variations in which variegated instrumentation clothed a poorly nourished body. These were the two conspicuous failures to seize the opportunity.

There has been some ill-considered talk about the undue prominence given to the works of the radical left wing: about the neglect of composers classed as orthodox. Bach was represented by 17 compositions at the regular concerts of the season; Beethoven by seven; Brahms by five; Mozart, Strauss, Wagner, each by four; Haydn by three; Schumann by three; Debussy, Handel, Loeffler, Ravel, Schubert, Sibelius, Tchaikovsky, each by two.

It is true that there were a few works by unfamiliar composers that were as the abomination of desolation; Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" for example; but Nabokov's "Symphonie Lyrique" was not wholly negligible; Kremek's "Little Symphony" was pleasing, as were Pick-Mangiagalli's transcriptions of Bach; Pilati's pretty suite, while Lambert's "Rio Grande" was stormily applauded.

Nor were Americans neglected, shabbily treated. Griffes, Hadley, Hanson, Hill, Loeffler, McKinley, Steinert.

It was a graceful act to invite Sir George Henschel to conduct the first concert. Mr. Arbos is always a welcome visitor. Mr. Hadley showed routine ability as a conductor and had the pleasure of presenting two of his own works. Mr. Burgin gave an engrossing, highly dramatic interpretation of Sibelius's first symphony.

The list of soloists included two who made their first appearance in Boston; surely not their last if the pleasure of the audience has any weight with them: Mr. Milstein, the violinist; Mr. Piatigorsky, the violoncellist. Among the pianists were Messrs. Gieseking and Horowitz; and although Mr. Sanroma was not billed as a soloist, his playing the piano part of Stravinsky's Capriccio and of Lambert's "Rio Grande" was a marked feature of the season.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final program of its 50th season yesterday afternoon. The Friday subscribers applauded Dr Koussevitsky and the players very cordially at every opportunity. Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony were the chosen numbers. It has been customary in the past to end each season with such a program as this, made up entirely of masterpieces generally familiar and generally beloved.

No season of the entire 50 has been more warmly applauded than the one that ends tonight with the usual repetition of yesterday's program. Dr Koussevitzky's unflagging energy, the remarkable series of works commissioned by the orchestra from a number of the foremost living composers, and the monumental Bach festival in March, in honor of the orchestra's founder have made this a memorable year. The repetition, under Sir George Henschel of the initial program of the first season, was not the least notable feature of the anniversary celebration. To the players, the trustees and the contributors toward the annual deficit the public is also deeply indebted. But the prime mover in everything has been Dr Koussevitzky, to whom honor and gratitude are chiefly due.

Compelling Interpretations

Yesterday's concert showed the conductor at the height of his powers. His vividly-imagined and eloquently-carried-through interpretations of masterpieces were as compelling as ever. His increased mastery of the details of orchestral technique and the superlative excellence as a group of the present orchestra enabled Dr Koussevitzky to surpass yesterday his former achievement in each of the chosen pieces. Nobody sensitive to music could listen unmoved to this concert.

But for perfection in orchestral performances of such a list of masterpieces as yesterday's, something more than eloquence and emotional intensity is needed. Dr Koussevitzky's limitations as a conductor are as marked as his abilities. He does not even now invariably secure from the players the absolute precision of attack, the perfect balance of tone, the uniform clarity of musical texture one expects, and seldom in vain, to find in the work of the greatest conductors, such as Muck or Toscanini.

Inner voices are sometimes obscured by the tonal mass, choirs do not make their entrances absolutely at the same instant; even first desk soloists sometimes come in a moment too soon or too late. Great as has been the improvement in all these respects in Dr Koussevitzky's conducting, perfection is not yet attained.

Graver than these limitations of orchestral technique are certain clearly-marked limitations of imaginative intuition, or emotional sympathy. Here one is, of course, on more controversial ground. If the orchestra is momentarily not quite together that is a plain and indisputable fact. If one feels, as one felt yesterday in the C-minor Symphony, that Dr Koussevitzky's Beethoven is not the true Beethoven, that is a matter of opinion. It is clear that his tempo for the andante con moto is slower than that indicated by Beethoven's metronome marking. It is less demonstrable that he does not fully understand the nobility and serenity that underlie this music.

An Ethical Idealist

Its romanticism is superficial. At heart Beethoven was a classicist and an ethical idealist, not a stormy soul like Tchaikovsky, or, to pick a fairer comparison, Wagner. Dr Muck, with no more guidance from tradition and from the printed text than Dr Koussevitzky can command, could by the sheer force of interpretive genius come closer to the heart of Beethoven's mystery. At least, so one listener yesterday firmly believes.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading of "Till Eulenspiegel" yesterday was, on the other hand, the best one recalls from anyone. The whimsicality, the daredevil, irrepressible energy, the half mocking, half sentimental interludes of lyricism in this tone poem have never been more clearly revealed.

The programs carried the first announcement of the 51st season of Boston Symphony concerts, to begin Oct 9 and 10, with Dr Koussevitzky as conductor.

The renewal privilege of this year's subscribers is about to expire, but the very long waiting list will absorb most, if not all, of the few places released by those who fail to renew their season subscriptions.

P. R.

SYMPHONY ENDS 50TH MUSIC YEAR

Post May 2

Popular Classics Fill List for Final Matinee

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With a programme of popular classics, Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra formally ends this evening.

RESPONSIVE AUDIENCE

Yesterday afternoon the same programme found a responsive audience. There were the usual rites of welcome and of implied farewell, with audience and orchestra standing and clapping as Dr. Koussevitzky came upon the platform. The music of Wagner, Debussy and Strauss, though the performances were not of equal excellence, provoked warm applause, the "Meistersinger" Prelude in particular. And after the playing of the Symphony there were many recalls for the conductor; there was much stamping of feet as well as smiting of palms.

To return to the concert itself, Dr. Koussevitzky was yesterday at least in the first half of the programme, obsessed by a passion for detail and an unusual deliberation of pace. Wagner's Prelude, however, gains in dignity and in impressiveness when not rushed off its feet, as it all too often is nowadays. And if Debussy's Faun was more than commonly langorous, the music has seldom, if ever, been played here with such unfailing loveliness of tone, such a wealth of subtle nuance, such perfection of phrasing.

But not for Strauss' Till are such niceties and preciosities. Yet with him, too, Dr. Koussevitzky would be not merely painstaking but finicky and meticulous, and over-sentimental as well. From the performance yesterday there emerged not the super-rogue of German legend, but a spring-struck poet. Gone was much of the diablerie, the irony, the humor and the folksy quality that rightfully should distinguish this music, and a false emotionalism, a devitalizing refinement put in their place. But for these things the performance of the Symphony, like those of the Preludes of Wagner and De... au...

...dio at RKO Boston.

Jubilee Year Closes at Symphony

Ames May 2

By MOSES SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closes its fiftieth season tonight at Symphony Hall. This season has been in many respects memorable. There have been noted guests. There have been extraordinarily fine performances. A climax was the Bach Festival in March, partly to honor the founder of the orchestra, Henry Lee Higginson.

Perhaps the principal feature of the brilliant season has been the series of works commissioned by the orchestra and written especially for its jubilee season by some of the most eminent composers alive—men of the stature of Stravinsky, Prokofiev and Honegger, to name the most prominent. Not all, or perhaps even a majority, of these works pleased all listeners. Many were the subject of disagreement even among critics, who should know better. But every one found some of this new music to his taste. And certainly the effort was worth while—for the honor it bestowed on the Boston orchestra, for the opportunity it gave us to hear music of our time.

It would take a column to begin to distribute praise justly for this season. Let us therefore confine ourselves to singling out the moving spirit, Serge Koussevitzky, for the untiring energy and vivid imagination with which he planned the season as a whole and the similar qualities he put into the individual performances. The extent of his labors has been colossal. Without him, and without the co-operation of his hundred-odd musicians, the season just past is unthinkable.

The season began with ceremoney and sentiment, when Georg Henschel conducted almost the same program he had a half century before, when the orchestra began its life. The final program, fittingly enough, is without ceremony, and it is a collection of standard classics—Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Of course, the performance of these works at yesterday's matinee was in the brilliant vein which we have now come to expect as inevitable from onr virtuoso orchestra. May it live long!

Concert-Crier

May 2 The Pops '31 Evening

The fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts ends this evening. The forty-sixth year of The Pops will begin on Wednesday evening. For four days between, Symphony Hall will be dark outside, but bright and busy inside. Into the cellar will go the usual chairs on the floor. Small tables and other chairs will replace them. For a second summer, stage and auditorium will be "done over" in light, cool colors. Other changes in aspect will divert the eye. Whoever sits at the tables may smoke at will; talk as he chooses while the orchestra is still, but rather less while it is playing; take such "refreshments" as a card that obeys the law may proffer.

These preliminaries completed, eighty members of the Symphony Orchestra will file to their places on the stage. Among them are nearly all the abler players except the leaders of the several choirs. Until the beginning of July these players, with occasional changes, will be the orchestra of The Pops. Young Mr. Fiedler will again be the conductor. The players like him and will work for him. Last season his programs pleased nearly every one. They were neither too classic nor too modern, too light nor too heavy. There was room for Gershwin from a musical play and for Rimsky-Korsakov from Bagdad; for Viennese waltzes and Sousa's marches; for operatic and occasionally symphonic numbers. Nothing too much; nothing in routine; and everything done in lively fashion.

By the sign of his first five programs, Mr. Fiedler will please no less this summer. The first program arrays familiar numbers, plus a selection from Mr. Gershwin's current musical play, "Girl Crazy," and a potpourri from Johann Strauss's Viennese operattas, mixed by Korngold. Ravel's "Bolero" will return on Thursday evening, with a Suite from de Falla's ballet, "Love the Sorcerer," and two canons of Schumann, transcribed from piano to orchestra, for freshening numbers. Chabrier's "España" will be played anew on Friday and Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," on Saturday. The program for the first Sunday concert, on May 10, is notable. It includes Lambert's "Rio Grande," warmly liked at three Symphony Concerts, with Mr. Sanroma again as pianist and The Cecilia for chorus; a neat little eighteenth-century Symphony by the Englishman, Boyce; Elgar's new march in the series he names "Pomp and Circumstance." There is room as well for three familiar numbers from Chaikovsky.

Rounds Out 30 Years

The Boston Orchestra's 50 Years

Monitor May 2

By L. A. SLOPER

FIFTY years of musical purveyance were rounded out by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with May Day, 1931. Much has been printed in these columns already about the celebrations of the festival year. Now that the tumult and the shouting only echo in memory, a few cursory remarks in retrospect may be in order.

The year has been notable, of course, for its novelties, and in particular for the works composed especially for the anniversary. The list of the authors of such works includes some of the most outstanding of contemporary composers. Surprisingly enough, many of these "occasional" pieces had exceptional merit. More surprisingly still, that which commended itself to this chronicler as the most significant of them all bore the name of the most famous among the composers of our day—Igor Stravinsky.

For one had all but given up hope of hearing anything that seemed fresh or original from the pen that set down the epochal "Sacre du Printemps." But the "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra and chorus ---"composed to the glory of God and dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra"—must rank, we believe, above the "Œdipus Rex," if below the "Sacre."

Jubilee Pieces

Other jubilee pieces that appeared to have had an inspiration more mandatory than the mere invitation to contribute were Roussel's Symphony in G minor, Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony, Honegger's Symphony and Hindemith's Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky himself wrote an Overture for the occasion, which this commentator was unable to hear, but of which he heard complimentary reports. Edward Burlingame Hill's "Ode" labored, we felt, under the handicap of Robert Hillyer's verses. Other anniversary items were Howard Hanson's "Romantic" Symphony and Respighi's "Metamorphoseon Modi XII."

There were also a number of novelties not composed for the jubilee. Among these Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangement of Two Preludes by Bach, Hill's Second Symphony, Elgar's Introduction and Allegro, op. 47 (new to Boston!), Krenek's Little Symphony and Lambert's "The Rio Grande" left more than a passing, if not in every instance a favorable, impression. Nabokov's "Symphonie Lyrique" was another novelty which the present writer missed.

Other events were the return of Sir George Henschel, first conductor of the orchestra, to direct the opening concerts of the season; the Bach Festival, at which the B minor Mass and other works came to stirring performance, and the Beethoven Festival at Washington, D. C.

The final program, appropriately jubilant, contained the "Meistersinger" Prelude, Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un Faune," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and, for fitting crown, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in glorious divulgence.

A History of the Orchestra

In commemoration of the orchestra's birthday the Houghton Mifflin Company has just published "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931," by M. A. DeWolfe Howe. This is described on the title page as a "Semicentennial Edition" of Mr. Howe's history of the orchestra, which carried it down to 1914. It has been revised and extended in collaboration with John N. Burk of the Symphony Hall staff.

The period of this extension has been of course in many ways the most exciting in the history of the orchestra. It covers, first, the war period, which all but destroyed the orchestra, and second, the famous "strike" which necessitated its complete reorganization.

Mr. Howe has written, with remarkable restraint, the chapter on the "Interlude" of 1914-1918, which resulted in the withdrawal of Karl Muck under circumstances which it would do no good to rehearse here now; and then the relinquishment of control by Mr. Higginson and the retirement of Charles A. Ellis, the manager.

Mr. Burk then brings the chronicle to date in the two concluding chapters, "The Post-war Frenchmen" and "New Fires from Russia." With conspicuous discernment, justice and tact he describes the service of Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, giving Mr. Monteux credit for rebuilding the orchestra after the "strike" of 1920, for drilling it again into a superb instrument and for introducing a generous number of modern works into the programs—it was he who brought Stravinsky's "Sacre" to its first Boston hearing. So, "the time was ripe for another Nikisch. And once more a superb orchestra was ready to do his bidding."

In the final chapter Mr. Burk rehearses the events of the Koussevitzkyan régime and pays his tribute to the Russian leader. If in these chapters Mr. Burk sometimes becomes the interpretive writer as well as editor and analyst, it is done with such discretion as to add to the value of the book. The volume contains lists of the works performed by the orchestra, the personnel and the soloists throughout its history.

Plans for the fifty-first season have not ripened. Dr. Koussevitzky's present contract, it is undersood, has several more years to run. If the custom of devoting an annual festival to the works of a single composer is to be continued, the choice of the musician next to be so honored has not been announced. The names of Mozart, Strauss, Stravinsky have been "mentioned." It is unlikely that the orchestra would be transferred to the opera house—after the Philadelphian manner—as would be necessary for at least part of the festival if Mozart were chosen. It is felt in some quarters that the name of Stravinsky is still too fearsome to appeal to the great public. Strauss, then, remains perhaps the most likely choice—if choice is made. In that event, the composer would be invited to visit Boston and to hold the baton for some performances. One school of opinion, however, would prefer a respite from festivals, with perhaps a repetition of Bach's B minor Mass instead. Whatever the decision, the next season, with Dr. Koussevitzky at the helm, will not be lacking in artistic adventure.

Music in May the Lightest

By Morris Hastings

THE [illegible] season came to an official and triumphant close as the strains of

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Boston Globe May 3

Boston Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended last night its 50th season. Last week the revised edition of M. A. De Wolfe Howe's history of the orchestra was published, carrying the story through the 50th anniversary year now ended. This book was first published in 1914. An additional chapter by Mr Howe carries the story through to the end of Major Higginson's control of the orchestra, in 1918.

Admirably written additional chapters by Mr J. N. Burk of the Symphony Hall staff bring the narrative down to the present. Appendices, invaluable for musicologists, contain lists of works played, soloists, members of the orchestra and so on. Bliss Perry's fine address on Major Higginson, delivered at the recent Bach Festival, is also included. Nobody interested in American orchestras in general, or in our own in particular, can afford to be without this book. It is throughout a historical record, with no attempt at musical criticism. It is published by Houghton Mifflin, for the trustees of the Boston Symphony.

This sentence from Mr Howe's pen is deserving of quotation as a courageous, if belated act of justice on the part of the Boston Symphony to Dr Muck. It will be found on page 135.

"In justice to both Mr Higginson and Dr Muck, it should be said at this later day that, in respect to the charge on which Dr Muck was held, there has never been shown any reason why Mr Higginson should not have stood behind him, or any reason why he should have been punished as an alien enemy."

This being the case, one regrets that Dr Muck was not asked to share in the anniversary celebration now ended. If the Government has evidence that he was acting as a German spy, they should now publish it.

Mr Howe also explains once more in detail that the story that Muck refused to play the "Star Spangled Banner" at Providence was a lie spread abroad by an adroit English propagandist then serving as editor of a newspaper in that city.

A Brilliant Season

During the season just ended the Boston Symphony, thanks to the zeal and skill of its rebuilders, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky, and to the generous support of the trustees and subscribers to the annual deficits, has regained a position comparable, if not yet quite equal to that it reached under Dr Muck. Under Dr Muck it was the finest orchestra the world has ever heard. Now, under Dr Koussevitzky, it is one of the three or four finest in existence.

The most notable feature of the remarkably brilliant season now ended is the unprecedented list of works commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the pens of a number of the foremost living composers. Several of these new compositions are masterpieces. Others, as one would expect, have turned out to be mediocre and disappointing occasional pieces.

Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," and the new symphonies by Roussel and Honegger seem likely to gain a permanent place in the orchestral repertory. Dr Koussevitzky, who commissioned these works, spared no pains to make the performance of them perfect. He has labored with unusual groups in the schools of this country has been little short of extraordinary during the past 10 years, as Mrs. William Arms Fisher, honorary president of the New England Musical Festival Association, points out.

A decade ago, Mrs. Fisher says, there were very few bands and orchestras in the schools. Now there are 60,000 bands in American schools and 45,000 orchestras, which she rightly hails as a promising sign.

Among the more important ensembles to play at the Garden on May 23 are the Boston Public School Symphony Orchestra, consisting of 150 pieces, and the youthful band from the House of the Angel Guardian.

Mrs. Fisher thinks that the young people have been inspired to join these organizations because of the fame of such Americans as Paul Whiteman, George Gershwin and Rudy Vallee and the reports of the money which this trio earns.

Mrs. Fisher may be right. We find it pleasanter to think that the students play in these groups because they find it good fun.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Boston Globe May 3

Boston Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended last night its 50th season. Last week the revised edition of M. A. De Wolfe Howe's history of the orchestra was published, carrying the story through the 50th anniversary year now ended. This book was first published in 1914. An additional chapter by Mr Howe carries the story through to the end of Major Higginson's control of the orchestra, in 1918.

Admirably written additional chapters by Mr J. N. Burk of the Symphony Hall staff bring the narrative down to the present. Appendices, invaluable for musicologists, contain lists of works played, soloists, members of the orchestra and so on. Bliss Perry's fine address on Major Higginson, delivered at the recent Bach Festival, is also included. Nobody interested in American orchestras in general, or in our own in particular, can afford to be without this book. It is throughout a historical record, with no attempt at musical criticism. It is published by Houghton Mifflin, for the trustees of the Boston Symphony.

This sentence from Mr Howe's pen is deserving of quotation as a courageous, if belated act of justice on the part of the Boston Symphony to Dr Muck. It will be found on page 135.

"In justice to both Mr Higginson and Dr Muck, it should be said at this later day that, in respect to the charge on which Dr Muck was held, there has never been shown any reason why Mr Higginson should not have stood behind him, or any reason why he should have been punished as an alien enemy."

This being the case, one regrets that Dr Muck was not asked to share in the anniversary celebration now ended. If the Government has evidence that he was acting as a German spy, they should now publish it.

Mr Howe also explains once more in detail that the story that Muck refused to play the "Star Spangled Banner" at Providence was a lie spread abroad by an adroit English propagandist then serving as editor of a newspaper in that city.

A Brilliant Season

During the season just ended the Boston Symphony, thanks to the zeal and skill of its rebuilders, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky, and to the generous support of the trustees and subscribers to the annual deficits, has regained a position comparable, if not yet quite equal to that it reached under Dr Muck. Under Dr Muck it was the finest orchestra the world has ever heard. Now, under Dr Koussevitzky, it is one of the three or four finest in existence.

The most notable feature of the remarkably brilliant season now ended is the unprecedented list of works commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the pens of a number of the foremost living composers. Several of these new compositions are masterpieces. Others, as one would expect, have turned out to be mediocre and disappointing occasional pieces.

Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," and the new symphonies by Roussel and Honegger seem likely to gain a permanent place in the orchestral repertory. Dr Koussevitzky, who commissioned these works, spared no pains to make the performance of them perfect. He has labored with unusual groups in the schools of this country has been little short of extraordinary during the past 10 years, as Mrs. William Arms Fisher, honorary president of the New England Musical Festival Association, points out.

A decade ago, Mrs. Fisher says, there were very few bands and orchestras in the schools. Now there are 60,000 bands in American schools and 45,000 orchestras, which she rightly hails as a promising sign.

Among the more important ensembles to play at the Garden on May 23 are the Boston Public School Symphony Orchestra, consisting of 150 pieces, and the youthful band from the House of the Angel Guardian.

Mrs. Fisher thinks that the young people have been inspired to join these organizations because of the fame of such Americans as Paul Whiteman, George Gershwin and Rudy Vallee and the reports of the money which this trio earns.

Mrs. Fisher may be right. We find it pleasanter to think that the students play in these groups because they find it good fun.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Boston Globe May 3

Boston Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended last night its 50th season. Last week the revised edition of M. A. De Wolfe Howe's history of the orchestra was published, carrying the story through the 50th anniversary year now ended. This book was first published in 1914. An additional chapter by Mr Howe carries the story through to the end of Major Higginson's control of the orchestra, in 1918.

Admirably written additional chapters by Mr J. N. Burk of the Symphony Hall staff bring the narrative down to the present. Appendices, invaluable for musicologists, contain lists of works played, soloists, members of the orchestra and so on. Bliss Perry's fine address on Major Higginson, delivered at the recent Bach Festival, is also included. Nobody interested in American orchestras in general, or in our own in particular, can afford to be without this book. It is throughout a historical record, with no attempt at musical criticism. It is published by Houghton Mifflin, for the trustees of the Boston Symphony.

This sentence from Mr Howe's pen is deserving of quotation as a courageous, if belated act of justice on the part of the Boston Symphony to Dr Muck. It will be found on page 135.

"In justice to both Mr Higginson and Dr Muck, it should be said at this later day that, in respect to the charge on which Dr Muck was held, there has never been shown any reason why Mr Higginson should not have stood behind him, or any reason why he should have been punished as an alien enemy."

This being the case, one regrets that Dr Muck was not asked to share in the anniversary celebration now ended. If the Government has evidence that he was acting as a German spy, they should now publish it.

Mr Howe also explains once more in detail that the story that Muck refused to play the "Star Spangled Banner" at Providence was a lie spread abroad by an adroit English propagandist then serving as editor of a newspaper in that city.

A Brilliant Season

During the season just ended the Boston Symphony, thanks to the zeal and skill of its rebuilders, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky, and to the generous support of the trustees and subscribers to the annual deficits, has regained a position comparable, if not yet quite equal to that it reached under Dr Muck. Under Dr Muck it was the finest orchestra the world has ever heard. Now, under Dr Koussevitzky, it is one of the three or four finest in existence.

The most notable feature of the remarkably brilliant season now ended is the unprecedented list of works commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the pens of a number of the foremost living composers. Several of these new compositions are masterpieces. Others, as one would expect, have turned out to be mediocre and disappointing occasional pieces.

Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," and the new symphonies by Roussel and Honegger seem likely to gain a permanent place in the orchestral repertory. Dr Koussevitzky, who commissioned these works, spared no pains to make the performance of them perfect. He has labored with unusual groups in the schools of this country has been little short of extraordinary during the past 10 years, as Mrs. William Arms Fisher, honorary president of the New England Musical Festival Association, points out.

A decade ago, Mrs. Fisher says, there were very few bands and orchestras in the schools. Now there are 60,000 bands in American schools and 45,000 orchestras, which she rightly hails as a promising sign.

Among the more important ensembles to play at the Garden on May 23 are the Boston Public School Symphony Orchestra, consisting of 150 pieces, and the youthful band from the House of the Angel Guardian.

Mrs. Fisher thinks that the young people have been inspired to join these organizations because of the fame of such Americans as Paul Whiteman, George Gershwin and Rudy Vallee and the reports of the money which this trio earns.

Mrs. Fisher may be right. We find it pleasanter to think that the students play in these groups because they find it good fun.

self nor the players throughout his seven seasons in Boston. Where many a man would rest on his laurels, content with a good routine performance, Dr Koussevitzky puts as much effort into rehearsing and conducting even the least exciting of repertory pieces as he gives to novelties, or to such events as the magnificent Bach Festival which crowned the season now ended.

This tribute is plainly due him, even from those who, like the writer of these remarks, often dissent from his interpretations. One may question Koussevitzky's taste, but nobody can deny him energy and eloquence. When he conducts music suited to his temperament, he is unsurpassed as an interpreter.

Koussevitzky's Progress

As a conductor he has gained notably in skill and authority in his seasons here. As an interpreter, his sympathies have broadened, his style has become more subtle and less mannered.

The orchestra is now a magnificent group of players, with few weak spots in its composition. Among the new members the first clarinet, Victor Polatschek, is an outstanding artist. His playing in the slow movement of Mozart's clarinet concerto was the finest individual performance given in Boston of the season just ended.

The public in Boston and New York has responded to the improvement in the Boston Symphony under Dr Koussevitzky. The concerts are invariably given to sold-out houses. Season tickets must be reserved far in advance. Single tickets are procurable only by chance, as the series are oversubscribed before they begin.

The orchestra has progressed far since the first concert in 1881, so interestingly reproduced last Fall, with Sir George Henschel, who conducted in 1881, again conducting the program of 50 years before. Mme Matzenauer, who sang the contralto solos at last Fall's repetition of the 1881 program, also sang magnificently in the B minor Mass of Bach at the Bach Festival.

The next half century seems likely to be as glorious a period for the Boston Symphony as the 50 years just ended have been. One hopes that the tragedy of 1918, which very nearly ended the orchestra's career, will not be paralleled by any other calamity of equal proportions. This city, as long as it has such an orchestra as we now boast, is sure of its position as a world capital of music.

The Pops Begin This Week

Next Wednesday night in Symphony Hall the Pop concerts will open their 46th season, following upon the 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Arthur Fiedler announces programs for this night and the remainder of the week, mingling past favorites with new numbers of interest.

Next Sunday, May 10, will bring the first Sunday night program, which is to be divided between English composers and the music of Tchaikovsky. Lambert's "The Rio Grande," with Sanroma as pianist and the Cecilia Society chorus assisting, will be a feature of this concert, as well as the new "Pomp and Circumstance" march, No. 5, which, just written by Sir Edward Elgar, was recently first performed in his own country. Fiedler will also revive the Fifth Symphony of William Boyce, the 18th century British composer.

of last season's concerts.

The programmes for Friday and Saturday include, as Pop programmes should, the best light pieces and the lightest good pieces. And on Sunday evening Mr. Fiedler will present a programme of symphonic calibre that promises to be distinctly entertaining. Constant Lambert's elaborate piece of choral and orchestral jazz, "The Rio Grande," which made such a stir at the end of the Symphony season, will be performed with the assistance of the Cecilia Chorus, Marie Murray, contralto, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, as before. Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, "Romeo and Juliet" Overture and Overture "1812" make the last portion of the programme, and Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," Symphony by the 18th century Englishman, and Boyce and Harty's arrangement of the Londonderry Air make the beginning.

Hans May 7

Asked to revisit London this spring, where he has not conducted for six years, Dr. Koussevitzky declined the invitation. Nor will he resume his discontinued concerts in May and June at Paris. He has, however, accepted a proposal to journey to Milan and give two symphony concerts in the Scala Theater. His orchestra will be the renowned orchestra of that opera house. The dates are June 7 and 18. Now, Milan is Mr. Toscanini's home-city.

Hans May 11

The Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra have ordered the designing and the striking of a medal to mark this semi-centennial year. Each member of the orchestra will receive one.

The subscribers to the Symphony Concerts who bestowed a golden wreath upon Dr. Koussevitzky, having money still in hand, have added a golden clock for the conductor's study.

Concerts

May 10

BY PHILIP HALE

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra—1881-1931 by M. A. De Wolfe Howe; semi-centennial edition, revised and extended in collaboration with John N. Burk," has been published by Houghton Mifflin Company. It is an attractively printed volume of 272 large octavo pages with portraits of Maj. Higginson and the conductors, and pictures of the orchestra under Herschel in the old Music Hall and under Koussevitzky in the season just ended. There are appendices of great value and a sufficient index. It is a pleasure to find Bliss Perry's admirable address "Henry L. Higginson," delivered at the recent Bach Festival, published in full as Appendix A.

The editor acknowledges the extension of three appendices by Miss Elizabeth Thompson of the Symphony Hall staff. Appendix B. The Repertoire. There is a list of all orchestral compositions performed in the Friday and Saturday series from the first concert in 1881 through May 2, 1931. The list also includes works performed only at other concerts. Figures in parentheses indicate the number of times the work has been played at the regular series, thus Beethoven's Fifth Symphony has been performed 37 times; Urack's Symphony only once. Does any one remember Otto Urack, at one time violoncellist of the orchestra, who, consumed by the desire to be a conductor, abandoned the career of a virtuoso?

Appendix C. Conductors and Players. An alphabetical list of all the members with the terms of service from A. Gloescher, trombone, 1891-1898, to Zung, violinist, 1925—The size of the orchestra under the conductors is also given. In 1881-82 the orchestra contained 72 players, including 4 temporary members. Last season there were 113, including the librarian.

Then comes Appendix D, the list of all soloists and assisting musicians who have taken part in the concerts of the orchestra in Boston and elsewhere, with dates of their assistance and the total number of appearances of each soloist: a long list from Joseph Achron to Paul Zimmerman. If one is surprised at finding the name of George Magrath, it is the name not of our distinguished friend Dr. Magrath, but of a pianist (1883). Yet Dr. Magrath has sung at Symphony concerts as a member of the Cecilia.

The Catalogue of the Casadesius Collection of Old Musical Instruments is in Appendix E.

The compilation of these appendices, a task requiring accuracy and what the Germans call Sitzfleisch, is even more than an indispensable addition to the history; it evokes memories, it might even invite discussion, as to why this or that work was thought worthy of performance; why this singer or that instrumentalist was allowed to appear at a Symphony concert.

Mr. Howe in the earlier edition ended his history of the orchestra with a short comparison of Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler, Dr. Muck's successor in 1908. This history was published in 1914. He told the story in a pleasing manner. In his preface to the semi-centennial edition he quotes a review of the earlier volume published in the Evening Transcript in which the reviewer noted with commendation that here was "not the work of a musical critic, but of an editor and annalist" and added: "Perhaps, when the 50th anniversary of the establishment of the orchestra befalls in 1931, some historian of aesthetic accomplishments may have his inning." Mr. Howe thinks that this might be possible at the end of another 50 years. "For the present . . . it has seemed well to the trustees of the orchestra to place before the public an extension of the original work of editor and annalist, carrying the story on from 1914 to the present time."

Yet a "Secret History" of the orchestra; a story of players' intrigues, of even scandals, well larded with anecdotes, would be entertaining: trivial historiettes — why Lichtenberg, the excellent violinist, lost favor with Gericke; how Nikisch was taught the game of poker; Mr. Paur's interest in his henyard; why Mme. van Endert, the sleek soprano, was engaged in 1914; all about Mr. Fradkin's behavior; the true reason for Dr. Muck's internment—readers might be amused but the historian would no doubt think it prudent to leave Boston between trains and with false whiskers.

In "Interlude: 1914-1918" Mr. Howe prudently remarks that Dr. Muck's internment was "technically as an alien enemy, though on grounds that were never made public." There were several absurd charges made against Dr. Muck; one with reference to Camp Devens, but the public could not be convinced of the absurdities. That there were alleged grounds for suspicion of his undue interest in the enemy's cause and his efforts to aid that cause were a matter of public and private dicussion. Maj. Higginson was loath to believe any charge brought against the conductor, even when he was shown certain letters in which Dr. Muck wrote about him in a most disrespectful and ungrateful manner. There was talk in 1917 of the United States government not allowing the orchestra to visit other cities. Maj. Higginson wrote to us on Dec. 17, 1917: "I should like to tell you this: that I myself have been to the department of justice in Washington this week and have talked with the officer who has had these particular questions in mind. He was kindly and courteous to a degree, knew all about our affairs, and told me that it was the decission of the department that we should not go to the District of Columbia but that we could go anywhere else; that there was no occasion for suspecting anything about the orchestra, and that they were entirely content . . . I say again that you can tell this to anybody you choose."

In spite of Major Higginson's loyalty to Dr. Muck there were times when his faith in him was shaken. He wrote to us on April 8, 1918, chiefly about a successor to Dr. Muck. Mentioning a man, who is now conductor of a prominent orchestra in this country, he asked: "How are we to know whether he is to be trusted politically? I should have said that Dr. Muck was safe, but apparently he isn't."

We should not bring up the subject at this late day, were it not for the chapter "Interlude," which to those unacquainted with the facts and reading only Mr. Howe's remark "there has never been shown any reason why Mr. Higginson should not have stood behind him, or any reason why he should have been punished as an alien enemy," would be conclusive evidence in Dr. Muck's favor. This statement is probably true; but there were other charges against the conductor which Mr. Howe perhaps necessarily ignores.

Mr. Burk's chapters, "The Post-War Frenchmen" and "New Fires from Russia," are sanely critical as well as historical. He pays due tribute to Charles A. Ellis, to whose shrewd and enlightened management the success of the orchestra at home and abroad was largely due, and to the present management continuing on the lines planned by Mr. Ellis. He sums up Mr. Rabaud's reign: "His conception of the music itself was just, intelligently balanced—ideal. . . . a year pleasantly spent with a delightful visitor from France." The finer qualities of Mr. Monteux, musician and conductor, are pointed out. Dr. Koussevitzky has a chapter to himself. There is discussion about the invasion of contemporary composers of the ultra-radical school. Mr. Burk treats the question without partisanship; as one observing the gradual acceptance by the audience of new and unfamiliar forms and expressions of musical ideas, though some found in certain compositions neither music nor ideas. "Koussevitzky," says Mr. Burk, "is but fulfilling the conductor's duty of using his keener artistic and technical insight to descry and perform what may be outstanding in the music of his day; of leading his audience into new paths, gradually accustoming them to change."

Boston Symphony Orchestra has from its beginnings combined a singularly constant ideal of æsthetic rectitude and dignity with a liberality of attutde toward the unorthodox and the experimental which has immensely enriched the musical life of America and stimulated its receptiveness.

"Great is the Orchestra's reward. It is honored as an institution which justifies the civilization that nurtured and perfected it. May it live to make increasingly glad the hearts of those for whom such triumphs of the spirit outlast the drums and tramplings of a half century of material conquests."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MOVIE FACTS AND FANCIES

Continued from the Preceding Page

in Possession." This is Montgomery's first picture since returning from New York, following a week's illness with grippe.

Beryl Mercer recently completed prominent roles in "Always Goodbye" for Fox, and "The Miracle Woman" for Columbia.

A studio visitor was recently introduced to Ricardo Cortez on the First National lot.

"Senor Cortez," began the young lady—and then she rattled along in excellent Spanish for some minutes. Cortez smiled and replied in English, "I don't speak Spanish."

Undaunted, the girl started to talk in exquisite French. This time Ricardo called a studio aid. "Say," he begged, "tell this lady that the only language I know is English."

She was disappointed, but nearly all the film folk know that Ric's real name is Jacob Krantz and he comes from Brooklyn.

"Lost Ecstasy," the Mary Roberts Rinehart story, will be released under the title, "I Take This Woman." The working title has been "In Defense of Love." Gary Cooper and Carol Lombard have the leads.

Richard Talmadge will start shooting this month on "Dancing Dynamite," which is being made at Catalina Island.

Georges Metaxa, who is playing opposite Claudette Colbert in "Secrets of a Secretary," will leave for Hollywood to be leading man to Dolores Del Rio in "Rose of the Rancho."

Lowell Sherman has been borrowed by Samuel Goldwyn for the male lead opposite Ina Claire in "The Greeks Had a Word for It." Sherman will also direct this United Artists release. Jean Harlow and Carol Lombard will be in the cast.

Radio Pictures have purchased "The Last Virtue" from I. A. R. Wylie, magazine writer. The author is well known for her stories from which "Four Sons" and "Young Nowhere" were made. Among the scenarios which she wrote expressly for pictures were "Evenings for Sale," "The Foreign Legion" and "Temple of Dawn."

Alison Skipworth, stage player of distinction, will be a prominent member of the cast of William Powell's forthcoming picture, tentatively titled "The Co-respondent." Marian Marsh will play the feminine lead opposite Mr Powell.

The title of Edward G. Robinson's picture has been changed from "The Four Flusher" to "Smart Money." The picture is completed. Evalyn Knapp plays opposite Robinson and James Cagney also has a prominent role.

Paul Muni will not play the title role in "Scarface," but expects to return to the legitimate stage.

The first scenes of the new Charlie Chan picture, "The Black Camel," were made in the shadow of Aloha Tower on the beach of Honolulu. Among the players who made the trip to Hawaii were Warner Oland, Sally Eilers, J. M. Kerrigan, Victor Varconi and Dorothy Revier.

Marjorie White takes her Great Dane along when she goes riding in her pint-size roadster. "If the car breaks down Dick can tow us home," says Marjorie.

Joan Bennett doesn't take

Stories of

TOM MOORE WAS BORN IN LAND OF SHAMROCK

Tom Moore, who plays the handsom "cop" in "The Last Parade" at th Bowdoin Square Theatre, has probab portrayed more film Irishmen than ar actor now in talkies. This is as should be. Moore was born with sham rocks outside his door in County Meat Ire, and has inherited the ready w and charm of his race.

Moore comes from a family of actor His brother Owen is well known in th talkies and for a time Matt and Jo Moore were popular in the silent film

GEORGE ARLISS MOST DECORATED MAN OF FILM

George Arliss, star of "The Millio aire" at the Fenway Theatre, has th title of the most decorated man in mo tion pictures. His performance i "Disraeli" won him the award of th Academy of Motion Picture Arts an Sciences, the Photoplay gold medal an the gold medal awarded for fine dic tion by the American Academy of Art and Sciences.

Born in England, Arliss came t America with Mrs Patrick Campbe to stay six months, and remained 3 years to become the dean of America stage stars, famous for such memor able performances as those he gave i "Disraeli," "The Green Goddess," "Ol English," "Hamilton," "The Devil, "Darling of the Gods," "Septimus, "Paganini," "Merchant of Venice" an many others.

He is married to Florence Mont gomery who plays the wife in "Th Millionaire" as she did in "Disraeli." The Arlisses have two homes in Eng land and an apartment in New York They have no children.

DRAMATIC EDITOR URGED CARILLO TO GO ON STAGE

Leo Carillo, star of "Hell Bound" at the Washington Street Olympia and Uptown Theatres, was formerly a newspaper cartoonist and submitted daily sketches to a Los Angeles paper. These sketches obtained a permanent job in the art department, until the paper's dramatic editor met him. The editor was much impressed with Carillo's ability as an impersonator and urged him to go on the stage. Eventually the editor persuaded a vaudeville manager to give Leo a try-out. This was the beginning of a theatrical career that has endured many years.

For some time Carillo was a headline attraction on the Orpheum circuit and he left vaudeville only to star on the stage. His principal role was the title part in "Lombardi, Ltd" and he has not only played this part on the stage but in pictures. He was one of the original four stars to appear in the talkies.

Strange to say, Carillo didn't study for a professional career, and had no intention of either drawing or acting. On the contrary, his boyhood ambition was to be a civil engineer and his first job was with the Southern Pacific Railway. He was a humble member of a construction gang.

AMERICAN ACTRESS MADE SUCCESS IN ENGLAND

Despite the fact that Tallulah Bankhead, star of "Tarnished Lady" at the Metropolitan Theatre, made her greatest success in England, she is an American girl. Miss Bankhead has

Music in May the Lightest

By Morris Hastings

THE [illegible] season came to an official and triumphant close as the strains of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony died away in Symphony Hall last evening. Which is not to say, however, that Boston is to be devoid of melody during the summer months.

On Wednesday, as a matter of fact, Arthur Fiedler and some 80 men from the Boston Symphony commence the 46th season of Pops concerts. And the week of May 18 is known as "Music Week" all over the country.

Arthur Fiedler, who last year proved himself a capable and popular Pops conductor, has once more selected programs which are designed to suit every taste, no matter how varied. On the opening evening, for example, Berlioz in his most militant mood is tempered by the soothing melody of the "Londonderry Air."

Wagner's Valkyrie maidens shriek lustily to one another across the composer's tonal mountain peaks; while, on the same program, George Gershwin's tunes from "Girl Crazy" toss their saucy heels most delectably. And the dainty measures of Bolzoni's Minuet contrast strongly with Liszt's boisterous and impassioned utterance in "Les Preludes."

A Novelty

One of the more interesting items on Fiedler's programs for the first week is a performance of Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande," which occurs next Sunday evening. The Cecilia Society sings the choral part and Sanroma will be at the piano.

The score was one of the most entertaining novelties which Dr. Koussevitzky presented during the past season. With its facile jazz rhythms and its frequently rich texture, Lambert's work well merits that friendly phrase, "a good piece."

The culminating event of "Music Week" is the concert to be held in Boston Garden on Saturday night, May 23. School bands and orchestras of New England will perform in it. As it would obviously be impossible for all 200 existing bands of this description to play in a single evening, even though each one should only play for 10 minutes, a rigid selection will be made during the week.

Besides these separate organizations, an orchestra formed from the best musicians in the school orchestras of the six New England states will play a 20-minute program under the direction of Francis Findlay, teacher at the New England Conservatory of Music.

The development of instrumental groups in the schools of this country has been little short of extraordinary during the past 10 years, as Mrs. William Arms Fisher, honorary president of the New England Musical Festival Association, points out.

A decade ago, Mrs. Fisher says, there were very few bands and orchestras in the schools. Now there are 60,000 bands in American schools and 45,000 orchestras, which she rightly hails as a promising sign.

Among the more important ensembles to play at the Garden on May 23 are the Boston Public School Symphony Orchestra, consisting of 150 pieces, and the youthful band from the House of the Angel Guardian.

Mrs. Fisher thinks that the young people have been inspired to join these organizations because of the fame of such Americans as Paul Whiteman, George Gershwin and Rudy Vallee and the reports of the money which this trio earns.

Mrs. Fisher may be right. We find it pleasanter to think that the students play in these groups because they find it good fun.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Boston Globe May 3

Boston Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended last night its 50th season. Last week the revised edition of M. A. De Wolfe Howe's history of the orchestra was published, carrying the story through the 50th anniversary year now ended. This book was first published in 1914. An additional chapter by Mr Howe carries the story through to the end of Major Higginson's control of the orchestra, in 1918.

Admirably written additional chapters by Mr J. N. Burk of the Symphony Hall staff bring the narrative down to the present. Appendices, invaluable for musicologists, contain lists of works played, soloists, members of the orchestra and so on. Bliss Perry's fine address on Major Higginson, delivered at the recent Bach Festival, is also included. Nobody interested in American orchestras in general, or in our own in particular, can afford to be without this book. It is throughout a historical record, with no attempt at musical criticism. It is published by Houghton Mifflin, for the trustees of the Boston Symphony.

This sentence from Mr Howe's pen is deserving of quotation as a courageous, if belated act of justice on the part of the Boston Symphony to Dr Muck. It will be found on page 135.

"In justice to both Mr Higginson and Dr Muck, it should be said at this later day that, in respect to the charge on which Dr Muck was held, there has never been shown any reason why Mr Higginson should not have stood behind him, or any reason why he should have been punished as an alien enemy."

This being the case, one regrets that Dr Muck was not asked to share in the anniversary celebration now ended. If the Government has evidence that he was acting as a German spy, they should now publish it.

Mr Howe also explains once more in detail that the story that Muck refused to play the "Star Spangled Banner" at Providence was a lie spread abroad by an adroit English propagandist then serving as editor of a newspaper in that city.

A Brilliant Season

During the season just ended the Boston Symphony, thanks to the zeal and skill of its rebuilders, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky, and to the generous support of the trustees and subscribers to the annual deficits, has regained a position comparable, if not yet quite equal to that it reached under Dr Muck. Under Dr Muck it was the finest orchestra the world has ever heard. Now, under Dr Koussevitzky, it is one of the three or four finest in existence.

The most notable feature of the remarkably brilliant season now ended is the unprecedented list of works commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the pens of a number of the foremost living composers. Several of these new compositions are masterpieces. Others, as one would expect, have turned out to be mediocre and disappointing occasional pieces.

Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," and the new symphonies by Roussel and Honegger seem likely to gain a permanent place in the orchestral repertory. Dr Koussevitzky, who commissioned these works, spared no pains to make the performance of them perfect. He has labored with unflagging energy, sparing neither himself nor the players throughout his seven seasons in Boston. Where many a man would rest on his laurels, content with a good routine performance, Dr Koussevitzky puts as much effort into rehearsing and conducting even the least exciting of repertory pieces as he gives to novelties, or to such events as the magnificent Bach Festival which crowned the season now ended.

This tribute is plainly due him, even from those who, like the writer of these remarks, often dissent from his interpretations. One may question Koussevitzky's taste, but nobody can deny him energy and eloquence. When he conducts music suited to his temperament, he is unsurpassed as an interpreter.

Koussevitzky's Progress

As a conductor he has gained notably in skill and authority in his seasons here. As an interpreter, his sympathies have broadened, his style has become more subtle and less mannered.

The orchestra is now a magnificent group of players, with few weak spots in its composition. Among the new members the first clarinet, Victor Polatschek, is an outstanding artist. His playing in the slow movement of Mozart's clarinet concerto was the finest individual performance given in Boston of the season just ended.

The public in Boston and New York has responded to the improvement in the Boston Symphony under Dr Koussevitzky. The concerts are invariably given to sold-out houses. Season tickets must be reserved far in advance. Single tickets are procurable only by chance, as the series are oversubscribed before they begin.

The orchestra has progressed far since the first concert in 1881, so interestingly reproduced last Fall, with Sir George Henschel, who conducted in 1881, again conducting the program of 50 years before. Mme Matzenauer, who sang the contralto solos at last Fall's repetition of the 1881 program, also sang magnificently in the B minor Mass of Bach at the Bach Festival.

The next half century seems likely to be as glorious a period for the Boston Symphony as the 50 years just ended have been. One hopes that the tragedy of 1918, which very nearly ended the orchestra's career, will not be paralleled by any other calamity of equal proportions. This city, as long as it has such an orchestra as we now boast, is sure of its position as a world capital of music.

The Pops Begin This Week

Next Wednesday night in Symphony Hall the Pop concerts will open their 46th season, following upon the 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Arthur Fiedler announces programs for this night and the remainder of the week, mingling past favorites with new numbers of interest.

Next Sunday, May 10, will bring the first Sunday night program, which is to be divided between English composers and the music of Tchaikovsky. Lambert's "The Rio Grande," with Sanroma as pianist and the Cecilia Society chorus assisting, will be a feature of this concert, as well as the new "Pomp and Circumstance" march, No. 5, which, just written by Sir Edward Elgar, was recently first performed in his own country. Fiedler will also revive the Fifth Symphony of William Boyce, the 18th century British composer.

"POPS" SEASON OPENS ON WED.—MUSIC NOTES

May 3

Next Wednesday evening the Pops begin at Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler's first programme ranges from Gershwin to Wagner, and those for the remainder of the week give further evidence of the breadth of his sympathies. Last year Mr. Fiedler proved his skill in suiting all tastes and won back to the Pop concerts some who had been frightened away by the uncompromising standards of his distinguished predecessor, Alfredo Casella.

Thursday's list, to be sure, contains nothing lighter than a Strauss Waltz and a Schubert March. Yet it abounds in music that is tuneful and rhythmic, including the most insistently rhythmic piece in the modern repertory, Ravel's Bolero, which was the outstanding hit of last season's concerts.

The programmes for Friday and Saturday include, as Pop programmes should, the best light pieces and the lightest good pieces. And on Sunday evening Mr. Fiedler will present a programme of symphonic calibre that yet promises to be distinctly entertaining. Constant Lambert's elaborate piece of choral and orchestral jazz, "The Rio Grande," which made such a stir at the end of the Symphony season, will be performed with the assistance of the Cecilia Chorus, Marie Murray, contralto, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, as before. Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, "Romeo and Juliet" Overture and Overture "1812" make the last portion of the programme, and Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," a Symphony by the 18th century Englishman, and Boyce and Harty's arrangement of the Londonderry Air make the beginning.

Hans May 7

Asked to revisit London this spring, where he has not conducted for six years, Dr. Koussevitzky declined the invitation. Nor will he resume his discontinued concerts in May and June at Paris. He has, however, accepted a proposal to journey to Milan and give two symphony concerts in the Scala Theater. His orchestra will be the renowned orchestra of that opera house. The dates are June 7 and 18. Now, Milan is Mr. Toscanini's home-city.

Hans May 11

The Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra have ordered the designing and the striking of a medal to mark this semi-centennial year. Each member of the orchestra will receive one.

The subscribers to the Symphony Concerts who bestowed a golden wreath upon Dr. Koussevitzky, having money still in hand, have added a golden clock for the conductor's study.

97

THE BOSTON HERALD,

Concerts

May 10

BY PHILIP HALE

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra—1881-1931 by M. A. De Wolfe Howe; semi-centennial edition, revised and extended in collaboration with John N. Burk," has been published by Houghton Mifflin Company. It is an attractively printed volume of 272 large octavo pages with portraits of Maj. Higginson and the conductors, and pictures of the orchestra under Herschel in the old Music Hall and under Koussevitzky in the season just ended. There are appendices of great value and a sufficient index. It is a pleasure to find Bliss Perry's admirable address "Henry L. Higginson," delivered at the recent Bach Festival, published in full as Appendix A.

The editor acknowledges the extension of three appendices by Miss Elizabeth Thompson of the Symphony Hall staff. Appendix B. The Repertoire. There is a list of all orchestral compositions performed in the Friday and Saturday series from the first concert in 1881 through May 2, 1931. The list also includes works performed only at other concerts. Figures in parentheses indicate the number of times the work has been played at the regular series, thus Beethoven's Fifth Symphony has been performed 37 times; Urack's Symphony only once. Does any one remember Otto Urack, at one time violoncellist of the orchestra, who, consumed by the desire to be a conductor, abandoned the career of a virtuoso?

Appendix C. Conductors and Players. An alphabetical list of all the members with the terms of service from A. Gloescher, trombone, 1891-1898, to Zung, violinist, 1925—The size of the orchestra under the conductors is also given. In 1881-82 the orchestra contained 72 players, including 4 temporary members. Last season there were 113, including the librarian.

Then comes Appendix D, the list of all soloists and assisting musicians who have taken part in the concerts of the orchestra in Boston and elsewhere, with dates of their assistance and the total number of appearances of each soloist: a long list from Joseph Achron to Paul Zimmerman. If one is surprised at finding the name of George Magrath, it is the name not of our distinguished friend Dr. Magrath, but of a pianist (1883). Yet Dr. Magrath has sung at Symphony concerts as a member of the Cecilia.

The Catalogue of the Casadesius Collection of Old Musical Instruments is in Appendix E.

The compilation of these appendices, a task requiring accuracy and what the Germans call Sitzfleisch, is even more than an indispensable addition to the history; it evokes memories, it might even invite discussion, as to why this or that work was thought worthy of performance; why this singer or that instrumentalist was allowed to appear at a Symphony concert.

Mr. Howe in the earlier edition ended his history of the orchestra with a short comparison of Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler, Dr. Muck's successor in 1908. This history was published in 1914. He told the story in a pleasing manner. In his preface to the semi-centennial edition he quotes a review of the earlier volume published in the Evening Transcript in which the reviewer noted with commendation that here was "not the work of a musical critic, but of an editor and annalist" and added: "Perhaps, when the 50th anniversary of the establishment of the orchestra befalls in 1931, some historian of aesthetic accomplishments may have his inning." Mr. Howe thinks that this might be possible at the end of another 50 years. "For the present . . . it has seemed well to the trustees of the orchestra to place before the public an extension of the original work of editor and annalist, carrying the story on from 1914 to the present time."

Yet a "Secret History" of the orchestra: a story of players' intrigues, of even scandals, well larded with anecdotes, would be entertaining: trivial historiettes — why Lichtenberg, the excellent violinist, lost favor with Gericke; how Nikisch was taught the game of poker; Mr. Paur's interest in his henyard; why Mme. van Endert, the sleek soprano, was engaged in 1914; all about Mr. Fradkin's behavior; the true reason for Dr. Muck's internment—readers might be amused but the historian would no doubt think it prudent to leave Boston between trains and with false whiskers.

In "Interlude: 1914-1918" Mr. Howe prudently remarks that Dr. Muck's internment was "technically as an alien enemy, though on grounds that were never made public." There were several absurd charges made against Dr. Muck; one with reference to Camp Devens, but the public could not be convinced of the absurdities. That there were alleged grounds for suspicion of his undue interest in the enemy's cause and his efforts to aid that cause were a matter of public and private dicussion. Maj. Higginson was loath to believe any charge brought against the conductor, even when he was shown certain letters in which Dr. Muck wrote about him in a most disrespectful and ungrateful manner. There was talk in 1917 of the United States government not allowing the orchestra to visit other cities. Maj. Higginson wrote to us on Dec. 17, 1917: "I should like to tell you this: that I myself have been to the department of justice in Washington this week and have talked with the officer who has had these particular questions in mind. He was kindly and courteous to a degree, knew all about our affairs, and told me that it was the decission of the department that we should not go to the District of Columbia but that we could go anywhere else; that there was no occasion for suspecting anything about the orchestra, and that they were entirely content . . . I say again that you can tell this to anybody you choose."

In spite of Major Higginson's loyalty to Dr. Muck there were times when his faith in him was shaken. He wrote to us on April 8, 1918, chiefly about a successor to Dr. Muck. Mentioning a man, who is now conductor of a prominent orchestra in this country, he asked: "How are we to know whether he is to be trusted politically? I should have said that Dr. Muck was safe, but apparently he isn't."

We should not bring up the subject at this late day, were it not for the chapter "Interlude," which to those unacquainted with the facts and reading only Mr. Howe's remark "there has never been shown any reason why Mr. Higginson should not have stood behind him, or any reason why he should have been punished as an alien enemy," would be conclusive evidence in Dr. Muck's favor. This statement is probably true; but there were other charges against the conductor which Mr. Howe perhaps necessarily ignores.

Mr. Burk's chapters, "The Post-War Frenchmen" and "New Fires from Russia," are sanely critical as well as historical. He pays due tribute to Charles A. Ellis, to whose shrewd and enlightened management the success of the orchestra at home and abroad was largely due, and to the present management continuing on the lines planned by Mr. Ellis. He sums up Mr. Rabaud's reign: "His conception of the music itself was just, intelligently balanced—ideal. . . . a year pleasantly spent with a delightful visitor from France." The finer qualities of Mr. Monteux, musician and conductor, are pointed out. Dr. Koussevitzky has a chapter to himself. There is discussion about the invasion of contemporary composers of the ultra-radical school. Mr. Burk treats the question without partisanship; as one observing the gradual acceptance by the audience of new and unfamiliar forms and expressions of musical ideas, though some found in certain compositions neither music nor ideas. "Koussevitzky," says Mr. Burk, "is but fulfilling the conductor's duty of using his keener artistic and technical insight to descry and perform what may be outstanding in the music of his day; of leading his audience into new paths, gradually accustoming them to change."

Boston Symphony Orchestra has from its beginnings combined a singularly constant ideal of æsthetic rectitude and dignity with a liberality of attitude toward the unorthodox and the experimental which has immensely enriched the musical life of America and stimulated its receptiveness.

"Great is the Orchestra's reward. It is honored as an institution which justifies the civilization that nurtured and perfected it. May it live to make increasingly glad the hearts of those for whom such triumphs of the spirit outlast the drums and tramplings of a half century of material conquests."

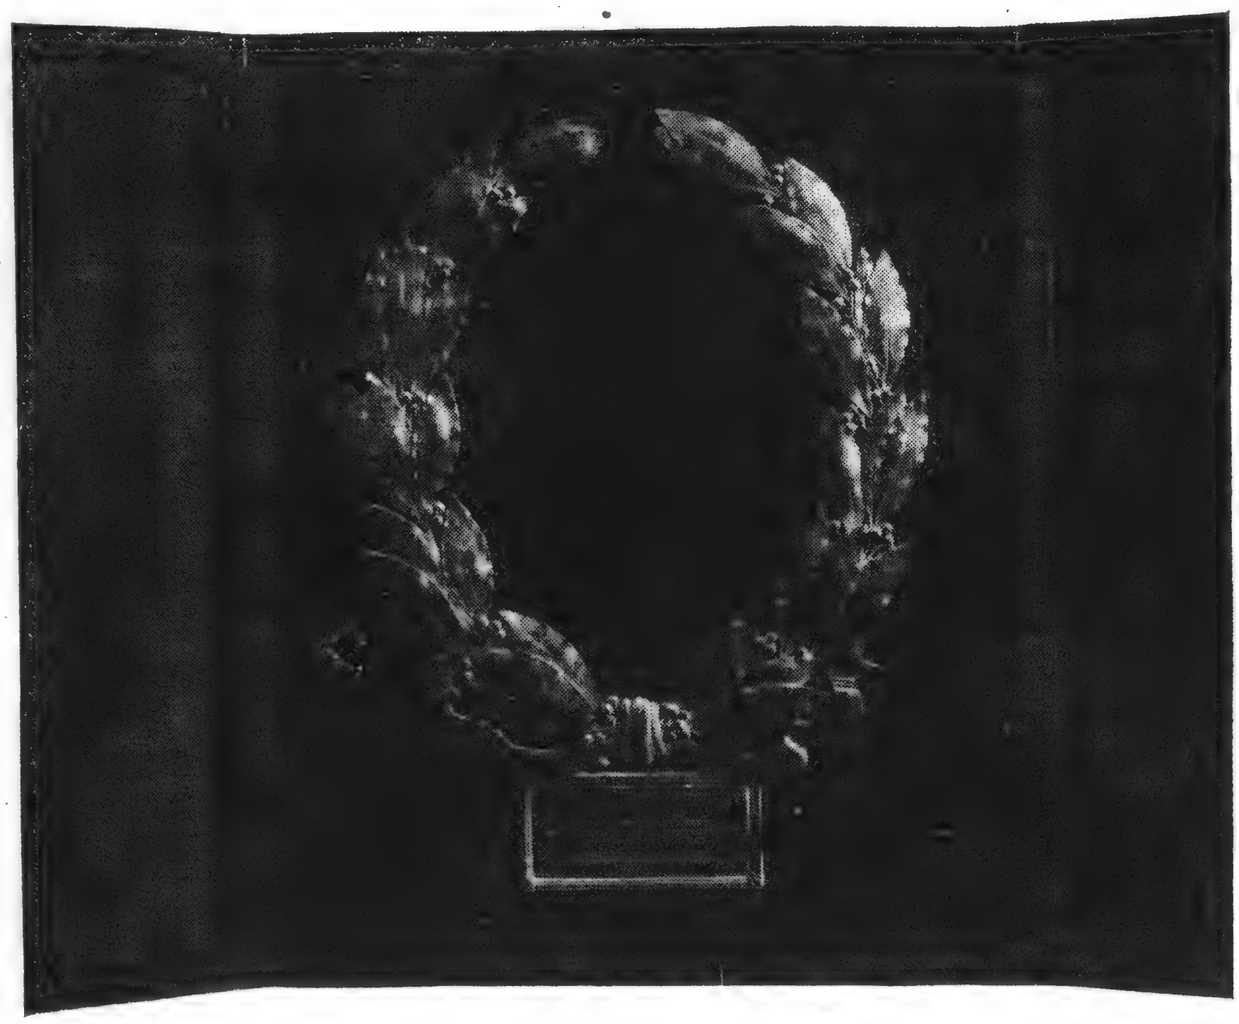
Serge Koussevitzky

From a Photographic Study, Posed and Made in April, 1931 by Underwood & Underwood

Trans-Mage

Players === Music and Musicians === The Scr

"He Who Deserves It Bears the Palm"



(Horner)

Wreath for Dr. Koussevitzky

Given to Him, on Saturday Last, at the Final Concert in the Fiftieth Year of the Boston Orchestra. A Committee of Subscribers to the Various Series Proposed It and Collected Subscriptions at One Dollar Apiece. It is a Design of Olive Leaves Cut in Gold by Tiffany & Co. It Bears this Inscription: "Sergei Koussevitzky Inspired Leader with the Ever Grateful and Affectionate Appreciation of His Audiences. . . . Fiftieth Anniversary Boston Symphony Orchestra 1931."

Wreathed Rites For Season's End

The Final Symphony Concert, With a Golden Circlet For Dr. Koussevitzky

THE AUDIENCE of Saturday at the Symphony Concerts does better by farewells. It is not in haste to be off and away like the company on Friday, which often seems to share the belief of sated reviewers that the high point of any concert is the end. It is less self-conscious, more eager and expansive; in any concerted action unanimous. Last Saturday, for example, it rose to a man and a woman when Dr. Koussevitzky came first to the stage; joined the standing orchestra in hearty plaudits. It received the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" with pleasure rather than excitement; restored "The Afternoon of a Faun" to the favor denied it on Friday; reserved its warmest applause for "Till Eulenspiegel." Clapping piece and performance to the echo and bringing the orchestra to its feet, it also testified to one of the conductor's most individual characteristics.

Seldom does Dr. Koussevitzky take the same piece in exactly the same way. Almost always he receives some new impression from it; conveys it to the orchestra; so imparts it to more sensitive and accustomed hearers. Twice last week, on a Monday and on a Thursday, he led in Brahms's Symphony in C minor. By reliable report, on both occasions there were differences in the readings—not only each to each, but in comparison with that, early in April, at the subscription concerts. Similarly with "Till" though the two performances were only a day apart. On Friday the conductor tended to be virtuoso-like with the tonal clowneries. On Saturday he took them more heartily, with the comic gusto of the folk-tale and of Strauss's music. Almost before the eye as well as the ear Till strutted the market-place; pranked it with the women; thumbed his nose by and large.

At the end of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the farewell rites began in usual course. Unitedly the audience rose again, unitedly applauded conductor and orchestra, hardly noticing that Judge Cabot was on his way to the stage, a leathern case in his hand. He had scarcely mounted it before Dr. Koussevitsky turned to go. A louder clapping soon recalled him. Before him Judge Cabot opened the case; disclosed the golden wreath, pictured elsewhere on this page; laid it, finally, on the music-stand. Subscribers to the Friday, Saturday, Monday and Tuesday series had made it ready, at the end of this anniversary year, as token of the regard in which his audiences hold the conductor who has brought the Symphony Concerts again to acme.

Judge Cabot spoke briefly in short, warm sentences that avoided the commonplace of such occasions. Dr. Koussevitzky replied as one who struggles less with a strange language than with deep emotion. The audience added a commotion of cheers and clapping; the orchestra swelled the acclaim. The conductor shook whatever hands were within easy reach; waved grateful and excited arms; finally departed, bearing his wreath before him. . . . The dispersal was slow. In the corridors many lingered—with an event on their tongues. . . . "The orchestra that Henry Higginson created half a century ago has stood unswervingly for those esthetic virtues. . . . which reflect honor upon the public whose spirit they reveal and express."

H. T. P.

MUSIC

Globe May 17

Music Notes and Comment

The Pop concert tomorrow evening has been taken over by the Sisterhood of Temple Kehillath Israel of Brookline. At this concert Esther Miller, local pianist who made her Boston debut with the People's Symphony Orchestra last Winter, will play Liszt's A-major concerto. No seats are available for this concert, but the remaining programs of the week are open to the public.

Mr Fiedler will play two scores new to Boston at the second Sunday evening Pop concert a week from tonight. These are Alexander Tansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique" and Abram Chasins' "Parade." Excerpts from the "Sonatine" were played here on the piano during the season just past by Mr Iturbi, but the orchestral version has never been heard in Boston. The premiere of "Parade" took place at a concert this past season by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, under Toscanini.

Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" at this Sunday concert. The remainder of the program will comprise music by Wagner.

The amount of the contributions by Boston Symphony subscribers for the presentation of a gold wreath to Dr Koussevitzky at the conclusion of the season, May 2, was considerably in excess of the cost of the wreath. The additional funds were used to purchase a gold clock, which likewise was presented to the Boston Symphony conductor. The clock bears the inscription: "To Serge Koussevitzky, from his devoted admirers, 50th anniversary, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1931."

In a speech to the orchestra, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, announced that a commemorative medal was being designed, and when struck off, a copy would be presented to each member of the orchestra.

194

Again Lambert and "The Rio Grande"

With Bach and Brahms to End The Season of Monday Symphonies

FOR his last program for the Monday audience Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening played three movements—the overture, air, gigue—from Bach's Suite in D major, pleasurably heard at the recent Bach festival; Constant Lambert's work for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte, "The Rio Grande," so well received on Friday and Saturday last; Brahms's Symphony in C minor, perennial favorite at Symphony Hall these latter years.

As at the concerts of the week-end Lambert's new piece of symphonic jazz occupied the center of attention. It is too early to write a fresh review on this work, these columns having discussed it extensively on Thursday and Saturday and briefly yesterday. It is characteristic that young Lambert omits all woodwinds and mellow brass from his orchestration, that he fills his percussion section to the brim and that he demands (and at Symphony Hall receives) virtuoso performance from it. It is noteworthy also that from a score which exploits all the fifty-seven possible varieties of cross-rhythms which one associates with jazz and its parent, rag-time, the one instrument which the popular mind first thinks of as being part and parcel with these styles, the saxophone, is entirely omitted. Apparently Mr. Lambert thinks more of his music than of conventional jazz style. For in passing through one's mind the entire thematic content of the piece, one cannot think of a single theme or passage which seems to demand or would be enhanced by saxophone tone.

It has often been noted that performance improves with repetition with Dr. Koussevitzky. (Indeed with whom would not repetition—up to a reasonable point—improve performance?). Lambert's "The Rio Grande" was only one more case in point. To one listener who heard it both Saturday and yesterday, it sounded last evening more brilliant, more rhythmically pointed, of an increased abandon and elasticity, with climaxes more firmly and broadly placed, but with the gentler measures in the middle and at the end not a whit less suave or less humanly appealing. In retrospect one recalls Lambert's direction. "The chorus should aim at a rather more theatrical and pungent style of singing than is usual with choral societies." One can only answer, "He should have heard the Cecilia Society." They labored (at rehearsal) arduously and at times almost desperately with these unaccustomed rhythms and emphasis. They achieved magnificently. Nothing sounded labored or difficult in their singing; the opposite effect, of verve, of dash, of unbelievable ebullient spirits, came from them. Whether the young composer would have called this singing sufficiently "theatrical" one cannot venture to say. But of its "pungency" there can be no manner of doubt. Also, of Mr. Lambert's powers of vital and original and forceful and worth-while expression there can be no doubt after these performances. One can only hope that this work will be heard reasonably often; and that Mr. Lambert can maintain the high level which he has set for himself in his maiden work of this degree of importance.

With Bach's suite—or the three movements from it—Dr. Koussevitzky was now forceful, now spirited, now suave and expressive, always, in whatever style he and Bach essayed, always eloquent. The air (so often played as a solo "for the G-string") aroused specially the approval of the audience.—And Brahms's symphony brought to a fitting conclusion a notable year in this series of concerts. To some of us it seemed as if Dr. Koussevitzky had placed for himself last evening a new high level with this work. To us it seemed as if the stately beginning had never been quite so stately; as if the melodies had never been sung so penetratingly ("from the heart to the heart"); as if the loftiness and the nobility of the last movement came from new and more deeply conceived bases. It is a piece of good fortune that a series of concerts can end thus. A. H. M.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last Friday afternoon concert of the 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg"; Debussy, Prelude to Mallarme's "Afternoon of a Faun"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's "Merry Pranks"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, C Minor.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The 51st season, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will open on Oct. 9.

There is little to be said of the works chosen for this concert; little that would be pertinent, for Dr. Koussevitzky, unlike some other conductors, does not pride himself on discovering or inventing "hidden" pasages of beauty or grandeur that have escaped the notice of even illustrious predecessors. It is enough for him to give admirable performances of works as they exist; not as this or that conductor thinks they should have been written, and is eager to supply the deficiencies, the oversights, the carelessness of the composer. Dr. Koussevitzky, having poetic and dramatic imagination, also that indefinable quality which for lack of a better word is called "magnetism," interprets a symphony, suite, symphonic poem, with due respect for the composer's text. He supplies what the composer could not indicate: the vivifying spirit. Music does not exist until it is performed. There are the notes, but they have no significance until the conductor sees in them so many aids in the revealing the composer's spiritual, dramatic, noble, lyrical or passionately sensuous thoughts as they found musical expression.

It is enough to say of the performance yesterday that it was of the finest, virtuoso order in which there was full artistic appreciation of the different qualities that have given each composition its commanding place in the literature of music. The audience was enthusiastic. It rose in greeting Dr. Koussevitzky; it saw with unfeigned regret the end of the season; it rejoiced in the announcement that the conductor would again direct the superb, incomparable orchestra of brilliant musicians; the orchestra that he has formed and shaped.

It is customary to say a few words about a season brought to an end. The 50th was of an anniversary nature; conspicuous also for the Bach Festival. Musicians of European countries and of the United States were invited to enlarge the importance of the anniversary by their contribution of compositions. A piece d'occasion is too often only an expression of good will and honorable intention. Of all the more important contributions to the 50th anniversary Roussel's Symphony and Stravinsky's Symphonie de Psaumes were easily the first in rank. It seemed as if Prokofieff had taken his task too easily, hurriedly. His symphony was not worthy of him. The conductor and the audience had a right to expect from Respighi something better than his "Metamorphoseon"; a theme and variations in which variegated instrumentation clothed a poorly nourished body. These were the two conspicuous failures to seize the opportunity.

There has been some ill-considered talk about the undue prominence given to the works of the radical left wing; about the neglect of composers classed as orthodox. Bach was represented by 17 compositions at the regular concerts of the season; Beethoven by seven; Brahms by five; Mozart, Strauss, Wagner, each by four; Haydn by three; Schumann by three; Debussy, Handel, Loeffler, Ravel, Schubert, Sibelius, Tchaikovsky, each by two.

It is true that there were a few works by unfamiliar composers that were as the abomination of desolation; Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" for example; but Nabokov's "Symphonie Lyrique" was not wholly negligible; Kremek's "Little Symphony" was pleasing, as were Pick-Mangiagalli's transcriptions of Bach; Pilati's pretty suite, while Lambert's "Rio Grande" was stormily applauded.

Nor were Americans neglected, shabbily treated. Griffes, Hadley, Hanson, Hill, Loeffler, McKinley, Steinert.

It was a graceful act to invite Sir George Henschel to conduct the first concert. Mr. Arbos is always a welcome visitor. Mr. Hadley showed routine ability as a conductor and had the pleasure of presenting two of his own works. Mr. Burgin gave an engrossing, highly dramatic interpretation of Sibelius's first symphony.

The list of soloists included two who made their first appearance in Boston; surely not their last if the pleasure of the audience has any weight with them: Mr. Milstein, the violinist; Mr. Piatigorsky, the violoncellist. Among the pianists were Messrs. Gieseking and Horowitz; and although Mr. Sanroma was not billed as a soloist, his playing the piano part of Stravinsky's Capriccio and of Lambert's "Rio Grande" was a marked feature of the season.

SYMPHONY ENDS 50TH MUSIC YEAR

Popular Classics Fill List for Final Matinee

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With a programme of popular classics, Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra formally ends this evening.

RESPONSIVE AUDIENCE

Yesterday afternoon the same programme found a responsive audience. There were the usual rites of welcome and of implied farewell, with audience and orchestra standing and clapping as Dr. Koussevitzky came upon the platform. The music of Wagner, Debussy and Strauss, though the performances were not of equal excellence, provoked warm applause, the "Meistersinger" Prelude in particular. And after the playing of the Symphony there were many recalls for the conductor; there was much stamping of feet as well as smiting of palms.

To return to the concert itself, Dr. Koussevitzky was yesterday at least in the first half of the programme, obsessed by a passion for detail and an unusual deliberation of pace. Wagner's Prelude, however, gains in dignity and in impressiveness when not rushed off its feet, as it all too often is nowadays. And if Debussy's Faun was more than commonly langorous, the music has seldom, if ever, been played here with such unfailing loveliness of tone, such a wealth of subtle nuance, such perfection of phrasing.

But not for Strauss' Till are such niceties and preciosities. Yet with him, too, Dr. Koussevitzky would be not merely painstaking but finicky and meticulous, and over-sentimental as well. From the performance yesterday there emerged not the super-rogue of German legend, but a spring-struck poet. Gone was much of the diablerie, the irony, the humor and the folksy quality that rightfully should distinguish this music, and a false emotionalism, a devitalizing refinement put in their place. But for these things the performance of the Symphony, like those of the Preludes of Wagner and Debussy, made ample amends, and the audience departed well content.

Music

Monday Symphony Concert

Last night in Symphony Hall came the sixth and final concert in the current series of Monday night performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky. The conductor made an eleventh hour change in his program; thus it contained the Bach Suite for Orchestra No. 3 in D major, instead of the announced "Suite Borodin" by Tcherepnin—an arrangement philosophically accepted by the audience, despite the disappointment it felt. The remaining numbers included the promised repetition of Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande," for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte (J. M. Sanromá) and the Brahms Symphony in C minor.

If in the minds of those who listened last night, there may have lurked a doubt concerning the complete enjoyment of the Bach suite that doubt must have been dispelled upon the conclusion of the famous Air, intensified by the perfect unison of the violin choir. Too seldom does the concert-goer find opportunity to hear many of these charming Bach arias in their original form and setting.

Mr. Lambert found himself in august company last night, and a on a very recent occasion, again acquitted himself, through the medium of orchestra and voices, with no little credit. The performance again reached a remarkably high peak and occasioned prolonged applause for conductor, pianist, the Cecilia Society which sang, and the orchestra which played with verve and enthusiasm.

The symphony had a superb presentation, albeit the baton seemed at moments a bit heavy. But there could be no mistaking the richness of the climax which brought to a close a program than which these Monday patrons have probably had no finer.

G. M. S.

Monitor Apr. 28

IENCE MONITOR,

Symphony in Last of Series

By MOSES SMITH

The beginning of the end of the music season was the last of the Monday night concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting a band that has been surpassingly brilliant in these closing weeks, had arranged a program consisting of the Bach D major suite, Brahms' C minor Symphony and Constant Lambert's "Rio Grande."

Lambert's apotheosis of jazz, first played here last Friday, and which we were hearing for the third time in four days, wears well. The principle reason for its novelty sustains it on repeated hearing, namely the fact that a composer has at last appeared who not only has worth-while ideas to express in the language of jazz but who also thinks in this language, finds it, in fact, his inevitable means of expression for the particular piece in hand.

The sole piano passages, cadenza-like — brilliantly played by Jesus Maria Sanroma — the colorful yet essentially economized jazz orchestration, the forceful (though somewhat weaker) pages for chorus — all these things gave evidence of a sure mastery of craft. There are sentimental pages, too, as in the music for solo contralto, but even these weave a theatrical spell. The whole performance, under Dr. Koussevitzky's inspired leadership, was remarkably effective.

The virtuosity with which the other two pieces were played was

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. EVE. POST

JAY 6 1931

In the Wor

Boston Symphony Orchestra's History of Half a Century

SOME interesting figures may be gleaned from M. A. De Wolfe Howe's revision of his history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra published in 1914, bringing the history up to the close of the fiftieth season, which ended last month. The longest consecutive term of service in the orchestra is that of C. Barth, 'cellist, who has been a member from 1894, a term of thirty-seven seasons, under Paur, Gericke, Muck, Fiedler, Rabaud, Monteux and Koussevitzky, the only conductors under whom he did not play being Henschel, 1881-84, and Nikisch, 1889-93.

In Georg Henschel's term as conductor, 1881 to 1884, there were seventy-two men in the orchestra. During the terms of Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, and Emil Paur, from 1884 to 1906, the size of the orchestra varied from eighty-one to eighty-four. Karl Muck, 1906-1902, raised the number to ninety-six and Max Fiedler, 1908-1912, made the membership 100. Under Henry Rabaud, 1918-1919, it was 102, and Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924, made it ninety-nine. Serge Koussevitzky in 1924 made it 105, increasing the number to 113 for the jubilee year, which ended.

Beginning with Annie Louise Cary, contralto, at the opening concert in 1881, the list of soloists is long, too long to print here, but in the first decade were such other notable singers as Henrietta Beebe, Anna Drasdil, Clara Eames, Emmy Fursch-Madi, Minnie Juch, Lilli Lehman, and Lillian Nordica, sopranos; Sofia Scalchi, Antoinette Winant, Zelie Trebelli, Agnes Huntington, Mary H. How and Mathilde Phillips, contraltos; Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Georg Henschel, baritone, and Emil Fischer, basso.

Pianists included Adele Aus der Ohe, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Teresa Carreno, Helen Hopekirk, B. J. Lang, Adele Marguiles, Julia Rive-King, Carl Baerman, Henry H. Huss, Rafael Joseffy, E. A. MacDowell, and Moritz Rosenthal. Violinists included, T. Adamowski, Henry Heindl, Franz Kneisel, Charles Martin Loeffler, Maud Powell and Camilla Urso. 'Cellists were Fritz Giese and Wilhelm Muller and others were E. M. Heindl, flute, and Alexander Freygang, harp.

In later years came the sopranos Frances Alda, Lillian Blauvelt, Emma Eames, Olga Samaroff, Harold Samuel, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Emil Sauer, Xavier Scharwenka, E. Robert Schmitz, Martinus Sieviking, Alexander Siloti, Sigismond Stojowski, Antoinette Szumowska, Alexander Tansman and Olga von Radicki.

Violinists have been E. Fernandez Arbos, Richard Burgin, Mischa Elman, Georges Enesco, Samuel Gardner, Cecilia Hansen, Jascha Heifetz, Willy Hess, Franz Kneisel, Fritz Kreisler, Sylvain Nowak, Emile Sauret, Toscha Seidel, Albert Spalding, Albert Stoessel, Joseph Szigeti, Jacques Thibaud, Anton Witte and Efrem Zimbalist. 'Cellists have been Jean Bedetti, Jean Guardy, Fritz Giese, Rudolf Krasselt, Josef Malkin, Maurice Marechal, Felix Salmond, Alwin Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke.

Mozart leads the list of composers in the fifty years with forty-three compositions, "The Magic Flute" Overture having been played the greatest number of times, nineteen. Wagner is next with thirty-eight numbers, "Die Meistersinger" Prelude leading with thirty-nine performances, the greatest number of times for one piece. Beethoven is next with thirty-six performances, the Fifth Symphony having been played thirty-seven times. Saint-Saens and Bach follow with thirty-two each, Liszt being next with thirty.

Tchaikovsky is represented by twenty-five numbers and the "Pathetic" Symphony has been played fifteen times; Dvorak by twenty-four pieces, "From the New World" Symphony having been played thirteen times; Haydn by twenty-two pieces, Symphonies No. 2, 13 having been played eleven times each; Mendelssohn with twenty-one and the "A Midsummer Night's Dream" music played twenty-three times; Schumann with twenty and Symphonies No. 1, 4 played twenty-three times each. Other composers with number of pieces and most popular compositions are:

Richard Strauss, 19; "Death and the Transfiguration," 17; Brahms, 18; Symphony No. 2, 30; Chadwick, 18; "Melpomene," 6; Sibelius, 18; Symphony No. 1, 9; Handel, 17; Concerto Grosso

MUSIC

Globe May 2

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final program of its 50th season yesterday afternoon. The Friday subscribers applauded Dr Koussevitsky and the players very cordially at every opportunity. Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony were the chosen numbers. It has been customary in the past to end each season with such a program as this, made up entirely of masterpieces generally familiar and generally beloved.

No season of the entire 50 has been more warmly applauded than the one that ends tonight with the usual repetition of yesterday's program. Dr Koussevitzky's unflagging energy, the remarkable series of works commissioned by the orchestra from a number of the foremost living composers, and the monumental Bach festival in March, in honor of the orchestra's founder have made this a memorable year. The repetition, under Sir George Henschel of the initial program of the first season, was not the least notable feature of the anniversary celebration. To the players, the trustees and the contributors toward the annual deficit the public is also deeply indebted. But the prime mover in everything has been Dr Koussevitzky, to whom honor and gratitude are chiefly due.

Compelling Interpretations

Yesterday's concert showed the conductor at the height of his powers. His vividly-imagined and eloquently-carried-through interpretations of masterpieces were as compelling as ever. His increased mastery of the details of orchestral technique and the superlative excellence as a group of the present orchestra enabled Dr Koussevitzky to surpass yesterday his former achievement in each of the chosen pieces. Nobody sensitive to music could listen unmoved to this concert.

But for perfection in orchestral performances of such a list of masterpieces as yesterday's, something more than eloquence and emotional intensity is needed. Dr Koussevitzky's limitations as a conductor are as marked as his abilities. He does not even now invariably secure from the players the absolute precision of attack, the perfect balance of tone, the uniform clarity of musical texture one expects, and seldom in vain, to find in the work of the greatest conductors, such as Muck or Toscanini.

Inner voices are sometimes obscured by the tonal mass, choirs do not make their entrances absolutely at the same instant; even first desk soloists sometimes come in a moment too soon or too late. Great as has been the improvement in all these respects in Dr Koussevitzky's conducting, perfection is not yet attained.

Graver than these limitations of orchestral technique are certain clearly-marked limitations of imaginative intuition, or emotional sympathy. Here one is, of course, on more controversial ground. If the orchestra is momentarily not quite together that is a plain and indisputable fact. If one feels, as one felt yesterday in the C-minor Symphony, that Dr Koussevitzky's Beethoven is not the true Beethoven, that is a matter of opinion. It is clear that his tempo for the andante con moto is slower than that indicated by Beethoven's metronome marking. It is less demonstrable that he does not fully understand the nobility and serenity that underlie this music.

An Ethical Idealist

Its romanticism is superficial. At heart Beethoven was a classicist and an ethical idealist, not a stormy soul like Tchaikovsky, or, to pick a fairer comparison, Wagner. Dr Muck, with no more guidance from tradition and from the printed text than Dr Koussevitzky can command, could by the sheer force of interpretive genius come closer to the heart of Beethoven's mystery. At least, so one listener yesterday firmly believes.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading of "Till Eulenspiegel" yesterday was, on the other hand, the best one recalls from anyone. The whimsicality, the daredevil, irrepressible energy, the half mocking, half sentimental interludes of lyricism in this tone poem have never been more clearly revealed.

The programs carried the first announcement of the 51st season of Boston Symphony concerts, to begin Oct 9 and 10, with Dr Koussevitzky as conductor.

The renewal privilege of this year's subscribers is about to expire, but the very long waiting list will absorb most, if not all, of the few places released by those who fail to renew their season subscriptions. P. R.

194

Again Lambert and "The Rio Grande"

With Bach and Brahms to End The Season of Monday Symphonies

FOR his last program for the Monday audience Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening played three movements—the overture, air, gigue—from Bach's Suite in D major, pleasurably heard at the recent Bach festival; Constant Lambert's work for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte, "The Rio Grande," so well received on Friday and Saturday last; Brahms's Symphony in C minor, perennial favorite at Symphony Hall these latter years.

As at the concerts of the week-end Lambert's new piece of symphonic jazz occupied the center of attention. It is too early to write a fresh review on this work, these columns having discussed it extensively on Thursday and Saturday and briefly yesterday. It is characteristic that young Lambert omits all woodwinds and mellow brass from his orchestration, that he fills his percussion section to the brim and that he demands (and at Symphony Hall receives) virtuoso performance from it. It is noteworthy also that from a score which exploits all the fifty-seven possible varieties of cross-rhythms which one associates with jazz and its parent, rag-time, the one instrument which the popular mind first thinks of as being part and parcel with these styles, the saxophone, is entirely omitted. Apparently Mr. Lambert thinks more of his music than of conventional jazz style. For in passing through one's mind the entire thematic content of the piece, one cannot think of a single theme or passage which seems to demand or would be enhanced by saxophone tone.

It has often been noted that performance improves with repetition with Dr. Koussevitzky. (Indeed with whom would not repetition—up to a reasonable point—improve performance?). Lambert's "The Rio Grande" was only one more case in point. To one listener who heard it both Saturday and yesterday, it sounded last evening more brilliant, more rhythmically pointed, of an increased abandon and elasticity, with climaxes more firmly and broadly placed, but with the gentler measures in the middle and at the end not a whit less suave or less humanly appealing. In retrospect one recalls Lambert's direction. "The chorus should aim at a rather more theatrical and pungent style of singing than is usual with choral societies." One can only answer, "He should have heard the Cecilia Society." They labored (at rehearsal) arduously and at times almost desperately with these unaccustomed rhythms and emphasis. They achieved magnificently. Nothing sounded labored or difficult in their singing; the opposite effect, of verve, of dash, of unbelievable ebullient spirits, came from them. Whether the young composer would have called this singing sufficiently "theatrical" one cannot venture to say. But of its "pungency" there can be no manner of doubt. Also, of Mr. Lambert's powers of vital and original and forceful and worth-while expression there can be no doubt after these performances. One can only hope that this work will be heard reasonably often; and that Mr. Lambert can maintain the high level which he has set for himself in his maiden work of this degree of importance.

With Bach's suite—or the three movements from it—Dr. Koussevitzky was now forceful, now spirited, now suave and expressive, always, in whatever style he and Bach essayed, always eloquent. The air (so often played as a solo "for the G-string") aroused specially the approval of the audience.—And Brahms's symphony brought to a fitting conclusion a notable year in this series of concerts. To some of us it seemed as if Dr. Koussevitzky had placed for himself last evening a new high level with this work. To us it seemed as if the stately beginning had never been quite so stately; as if the melodies had never been sung so penetratingly ("from the heart to the heart"); as if the loftiness and the nobility of the last movement came from new and more deeply conceived bases. It is a piece of good fortune that a series of concerts can end thus.

A. H. M.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last Friday afternoon concert of the 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg"; Debussy, Prelude to Mallarme's "Afternoon of a Faun"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's "Merry Pranks"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, C Minor.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The 51st season, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will open on Oct. 9.

There is little to be said of the works chosen for this concert; little that would be pertinent, for Dr. Koussevitzky, unlike some other conductors, does not pride himself on discovering or inventing "hidden" pasages of beauty or grandeur that have escaped the notice of even illustrious predecessors. It is enough for him to give admirable performances of works as they exist; not as this or that conductor thinks they should have been written, and is eager to supply the deficiencies, the oversights, the carelessness of the composer. Dr. Koussevitzky, having poetic and dramatic imagination, also that indefinable quality which for lack of a better word is called "magnetism," interprets a symphony, suite, symphonic poem, with due respect for the composer's text. He supplies what the composer could not indicate: the vivifying spirit. Music does not exist until it is performed. There are the notes, but they have no significance until the conductor sees in them so many aids in the revealing the composer's spiritual, dramatic, noble, lyrical or passionately sensuous thoughts as they found musical expression.

It is enough to say of the performance yesterday that it was of the finest virtuoso order in which there was full artistic appreciation of the different qualities that have given each composition its commanding place in the literature of music. The audience was enthusiastic. It rose in greeting Dr. Koussevitzky; it saw with unfeigned regret the end of the season; it rejoiced in the announcement that the conductor would again direct the superb, incomparable orchestra of brilliant musicians; the orchestra that he has formed and shaped.

It is customary to say a few words about a season brought to an end. The 50th was of an anniversary nature; conspicuous also for the Bach Festival. Musicians of European countries and of the United States were invited to enlarge the importance of the anniversary by their contribution of compositions. A piece d'occasion is too often only an expression of good will and honorable intention. Of all the more important contributions to the 50th anniversary Rousel's Symphony and Stravinsky's Symphonie de Psaumes were easily the first in rank. It seemed as if Prokofieff had taken his task too easily, hurriedly. His symphony was not worthy of him. The conductor and the audience had a right to expect from Respighi something better than his "Metamorphoseon"; a theme and variations in which variegated instrumentation clothed a poorly nourished body. These were the two conspicuous failures to seize the opportunity.

There has been some ill-considered talk about the undue prominence given to the works of the radical left wing; about the neglect of composers classed as orthodox. Bach was represented by 17 compositions at the regular concerts of the season; Beethoven by seven; Brahms by five; Mozart, Strauss, Wagner, each by four; Haydn by three; Schumann by three; Debussy, Handel, Loeffler, Ravel, Schubert, Sibelius, Tchaikovsky, each by two.

It is true that there were a few works by unfamiliar composers that were as the abomination of desolation; Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" for example; but Nabokov's "Symphonie Lyrique" was not wholly negligible: Kremek's "Little Symphony" was pleasing, as were Pick-Mangiagalli's transcriptions of Bach: Pilati's pretty suite, while Lambert's "Rio Grande" was stormily applauded.

Nor were Americans neglected, shabbily treated. Griffes, Hadley, Hanson, Hill, Loeffler, McKinley, Steinert.

It was a graceful act to invite Sir George Henschel to conduct the first concert. Mr. Arbos is always a welcome visitor. Mr. Hadley showed routine ability as a conductor and had the pleasure of presenting two of his own works. Mr. Burgin gave an engrossing, highly dramatic interpretation of Sibelius's first symphony.

The list of soloists included two who made their first appearance in Boston; surely not their last if the pleasure of the audience has any weight with them: Mr. Milstein, the violinist; Mr. Piatigorsky, the violoncellist. Among the pianists were Messrs. Gieseking and Horowitz; and although Mr. Sanroma was not billed as a soloist, his playing the piano part of Stravinsky's Capriccio and of Lambert's "Rio Grande" was a marked feature of the season.

SYMPHONY ENDS 50TH MUSIC YEAR

Popular Classics Fill List for Final Matinee

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With a programme of popular classics, Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra formally ends this evening.

RESPONSIVE AUDIENCE

Yesterday afternoon the same programme found a responsive audience. There were the usual rites of welcome and of implied farewell, with audience and orchestra standing and clapping as Dr. Koussevitzky came upon the platform. The music of Wagner, Debussy and Strauss, though the performances were not of equal excellence, provoked warm applause, the "Meistersinger" Prelude in particular. And after the playing of the Symphony there were many recalls for the conducto.; there was much stamping of feet as well as smiting of palms.

To return to the concert itself, Dr. Koussevitzky was yesterday at least in the first half of the programme, obsessed by a passion for detail and an unusual deliberation of pace. Wagner's Prelude, however, gains in dignity and in impressiveness when not rushed off its feet, as it all too often is nowadays. And if Debussy's Faun was more than commonly langorous, the music has seldom, if ever, been played here with such unfailing loveliness of tone, such a wealth of subtle nuance, such perfection of phrasing.

But not for Strauss' Till are such niceties and preciosities. Yet with him, too, Dr. Koussevitzky would be not merely painstaking but finicky and meticulous, and over-sentimental as well. From the performance yesterday there emerged not the super-rogue of German legend, but a spring-struck poet. Gone was much of the diablerie, the irony, the humor and the folksy quality that rightfully should distinguish this music, and a false emotionalism, a devitalizing refinement put in their place. But for these things the performance of the Symphony, like those of the Preludes of Wagner and Debussy, made ample amends, and the audience departed well content.

Music

Monday Symphony Concert

Last night in Symphony Hall came the sixth and final concert in the current series of Monday night performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky. The conductor made an eleventh hour change in his program; thus it contained the Bach Suite for Orchestra No. 3 in D major, instead of the announced "Suite Borodin" by Tcherepnin—an arrangement philosophically accepted by the audience, despite the disappointment it felt. The remaining numbers included the promised repetition of Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande," for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte (J. M. Sanromá) and the Brahms Symphony in C minor.

If in the minds of those who listened last night, there may have lurked a doubt concerning the complete enjoyment of the Bach suite that doubt must have been dispelled upon the conclusion of the famous Air, intensified by the perfect unison of the violin choir. Too seldom does the concert-goer find opportunity to hear many of these charming Bach arias in their original form and setting.

Mr. Lambert found himself in august company last night, and a on a very recent occasion, again acquitted himself, through the medium of orchestra and voices, with n little credit. The performance agai reached a remarkably high peak an occasioned prolonged applause fo conductor, pianist, the Cecilia So ciety which sang, and the orchestr which played with verve and enthu siasm.

The symphony had a superb pre entation, albeit the baton seeme at moments a bit heavy. But the could be no mistaking the richness the climax which brought to a clo a program than which these Monda patrons have probably had no fine

G. M. S.

Monitor Apr. 28

IENCE MONITOR,

Symphony in Last of Series

By MOSES SMITH

The beginning of the end of the music season was the last of the Monday night concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting a band that has been surpassingly brilliant in these closing weeks, had arranged a program consisting of the Bach D major suite, Brahms' C minor Symphony and Constant Lambert's "Rio Grande."

Lambert's apotheosis of jazz, first played here last Friday, and which we were hearing for the third time in four days, wears well. The principle reason for its novelty sustains it on repeated hearing, namely the fact that a composer has at last appeared who not only has worth-while ideas to express in the language of jazz but who also thinks in this language, finds it, in fact, his inevitable means of expression for the particular piece in hand.

The sole piano passages, cadenza-like — brilliantly played by Jesus Maria Sanroma — the colorful yet essentially economized jazz orchestration, the forceful (though somewhat weaker) pages for chorus — all these things gave evidence of a sure mastery of craft. There are sentimental pages, too, as in the music for solo contralto, but even these weave a theatrical spell. The whole performance, under Dr. Koussevitzky's inspired leadership, was remarkably effective.

The virtuosity with which the other two pieces were played was

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. EVE. POST

MAY 6 1931

In the World of Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra's History of Half a Century

SOME interesting figures may be gleaned from M. A. De Wolfe Howe's revision of his history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra published in 1914, bringing the history up to the close of the fiftieth season, which ended last month. The longest consecutive term of service in the orchestra is that of C. Barth, 'cellist, who has been a member from 1894, a term of thirty-seven seasons, under Paur, Gericke, Much, Fieldler, Rabaud, Monteux and Koussevitzky, the only conductors under whom he did not play being Henschel, 1881-84, and Nikisch, 1889-93.

In Georg Henschel's term as conductor, 1881 to 1884, there were seventy-two men in the orchestra. During the terms of Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, and Emil Paur, from 1884 to 1906, the size of the orchestra varied from eighty-one to eighty-four. Karl Much, 1906-1902, raised the number to ninety-six and Max Fieldler, 1908-1912, made the membership 100. Under Henry Rabaud, 1918-1919, it was 102, and Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924, made it ninety-nine. Serge Koussevitzky in 1924 made it 105, increasing the number to 113 for the jubilee year, just ended.

Beginning with Annie Louise Cary, contralto, at the opening concert in 1881, the list of soloists is long, much too long to print here, but in the first decade were such other notable singers as Henrietta Beebe, Anna Drasdil, Emma Eames, Emmy Fursch-Madi, Emma Juch, Lilli Lehman, and Lillian Nordica, sopranos; Sofia Scalchi, Emily Winant, Zelie Trebelli, Agnes Huntington, Mary H. How and Mathilde Phillips, contraltos; Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Georg Henschel, baritone, and Emil Fischer, basso.

Pianists included Adele Aus der Ohe, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Teresa Carreno, Helen Hopekirk, B. J. Lang, Adele Marguiles, Julia Rive-King, Carl Baerman, Henry H. Huss, Rafael Joseffy, E. A. MacDowell, and Moritz Rosenthal. Violinists included, T. Adamowski, Henry Heindl, Franz Kneisel, Charles Martin Loeffler, Maud Powell and Camilla Urso. 'Cellists were Fritz Giese and Wilhelm Muller and others were E. M. Heindl, flute, and Alexander Freygang, harp.

In later years came the sopranos Frances Alda, Lillian Blauvelt, Emma Calve, Clementine De Vere, Geraldine Farrar, Olive Fremstadt, Johanna Gadski, Ethyl Hayden, Frieda Hempel, Georgine von Januschowsky, Nellie Melba, Alice Nielsen, Milka Ternina, Maggie Teyte, Jeannette Vrecland and Julie Wyman; the contraltos Merle Alcock, Sophie Braslau, Marguerite D'Alvarez, Jeanne Gerville-Reache, Louise Homer, Louise Kirby-Lunn, Margaret Matzenauer, Kathryn Meisle, Sigrid Onegin, Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Nevada Van der Veer and Emily Winant.

Tenors have been Daniel Beddoe, Italo Campanini, Edmond Clement, Richard Crooks, Ben Davies, Tudor Davies, Andreas Dippel, Arthur Hackett, George Hamlin, Roland Hayes, Paul Kalisch, George Meader, Lambert Murphy, John McCormack and Ellison van Hoose. Baritones and bassos have been Pasquale Amato, David Bispham, O. C. Bushnell, Giuseppe Campanari (also 'cellist in the orchestra from 1885 to 1893), Frangcon Davies, Charles Gilibert, Max Heinrich, Arthur Middleton, Fred Patton, Francis Rogers, Joseph Standigl, John Charles Thomas, Reinald Werrenrath and Herbert Witherspoon.

Some of the pianists have been Martha Baird, Harold Bauer, Richard Burmeister, Ferruccio Busoni, Alfredo Casella, Alfred Cortot, Eugen d'Albert, Vladimir de Pachmann, Vincent d'Indy, Ernst von Dohnanyi, Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Rudolph Ganz, Heinrich Gebhard, Walter Gieseking, Leopold Godowski, Katharine Goodson, Mark Hambourg, Myra Hess, Josef Hofmann, Helen Hopekirk, Ernest Hutcheson, Josef Lhevinne, Maier and Pattison, Guiomar Novaes, Ignace Jan Paderewski, John Powell, George Proctor, Serge Prokofieff, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Franz Rummel, Camille Saint-Saens, Olga Samaroff, Harold Samuel, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Emil Sauer, Xavier Scharwenka, E. Robert Schmitz, Martinus Sieviking, Alexander Siloti, Sigismond Stojowski, Antoinette Szumowska, Alexander Tansman and Olga von Radicki.

Violinists have been E. Fernandez Arbos, Richard Burgin, Mischa Elman, Georges Enesco, Samuel Gardner, Cecilia Hansen, Jascha Heifetz, Willy Hess, Franz Kneisel, Fritz Kreisler, Sylvain Nowak, Emile Sauret, Toscha Seidl, Albert Spalding, Albert Stoessel, Joseph Szigeti, Jacques Thibaud, Anton Witek and Efrem Zimbalist. 'Cellists have been Jean Bedetti, Jean Guardy, Fritz Giese, Rudolf Krasselt, Josef Malkin, Maurice Marechal, Felix Salmond, Alwin Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke.

Mozart leads the list of composers in the fifty years with forty-three compositions, "The Magic Flute" Overture having been played the greatest number of times, nineteen. Wagner is next with thirty-eight numbers, "Die Meistersinger" Prelude leading with thirty-nine performances, the greatest number of times for one piece. Beethoven is next with thirty-six performances, the Fifth Symphony having been played thirty-seven times. Saint-Saens and Bach follow with thirty-two each. Liszt being next with thirty.

Tchaikovsky is represented by twenty-five numbers and the "Pathetic" Symphony has been played fifteen times; Dvorak by twenty-four pieces, "From the New World" Symphony having been played thirteen times; Haydn by twenty-two pieces, Symphonies No. 2, 13 having been played eleven times each; Mendelssohn with twenty-one and the "A Midsummer Night's Dream" music played twenty-three times; Schumann with twenty and Symphonies No. 1, 4 played twenty-three times each. Other composers with number of pieces and most popular compositions are:

Richard Strauss, 19; "Death and the Transfiguration," 17; Brahms, 18; Symphony No. 2, 30; Chadwick, 18; "Melpomene," 6; Sibelius, 18; Symphony No. 1, 9; Handel, 17; Concerto Grosso in D minor, 7; Rimsky-Korsakoff, 17; "Scheherazade," 12; Debussy, 16; "Images," 13; Schubert, 15; "Unfinished Symphony," 30; Rubinstein, 15; Piano Concerto in D minor, 14; D'Indy, 15; Symphony in B flat, 7; Strube, 15; Fantastic Dance, 3; Glazounoff, 13; Symphonies No. 4 and 6, 3; Stravinsky, 12; "Firebird," 6; Berlioz, 12; "Roman Carnival," 21; Respighi, 12; "Fountains of Rome" and "Pines of Rome," 4 each; Weber, 11; "Euryanthe" Overture, 25; Ravel, 11; "LaValse," 10; Loeffler, 11; "Death of Tintagiles," 7.

Some of the other composers with number of pieces are: Franck, Hadley, Hill, Honegger, Prokofieff, 10; Bruch, Grief, Smetana, Spohr, 9; Cherubini, Massenet, Raff, Volkmann, 8; Auber, Lalo, Humperdinck, MacDowell, J. K. Paine, 7; Bruckner, D'Albert, Gluck, K. Goldmark, Gounod, Rachmaninoff, Reger, Roussel, Vivaldi, 6; Albeniz, Sinding, 5.

TODAY'S GLOBE CONTENTS

Page 18
Household Department.
Dorothy Dix' letter box.
Page 19
Household Department.
Page 20
Comic Strips.
Page 21
Hub couple held as bogus bill passers at New Haven.
Death Notices.
Page 22
Queen and Governess risk lives at bedside of little Crown Prince Michael, ill with diphtheria at Bucharest.
North End school children have May Day program on Common.
Mayor Curley sounds keynote of Child Health Day in radio address.
Dr George H. Bigelow reads children's charter in Child Health Day address.

JUDGE DISCHARGES QUINCY MAN WHO MADE BEER

QUINCY, May 1—Declaring there was nothing in the present statutes to prevent a man making beer for his own use, Judge Avery of the District Court today discharged Oscar Dupont of Winter st, Quincy Point, an a charge of keeping and exposing liquor for sale.

The officers found 120 bottles of beer in Dupont's cellar, they said. Dupont said he had made the beer for his own use, and Judge Avery told him he knew of no law to prevent it.

RADIO PROGRAMS
PAGE 6
From Globe Studio of WEEI

8:20 A M—Looking over the morning Globe.
12:15 P M—News bulletins.
4:00 P M—News bulletins.
6:35 P M—News bulletins.
11:06 P M—News bulletins

Continued on the Ninth Page

Rivalry between Harvard and Princeton since the break following the 1926 Football game. It will mark, also, the opening of the Harvard

INFORMATION OBSCURED

194

Again Lambert and "The Rio Grande"

With Bach and Brahms to End The Season of Monday Symphonies

FOR his last program for the Monday audience Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening played three movements—the overture, air, gigue—from Bach's Suite in D major, pleasurably heard at the recent Bach festival; Constant Lambert's work for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte, "The Rio Grande," so well received on Friday and Saturday last; Brahms's Symphony in C minor, perennial favorite at Symphony Hall these latter years.

As at the concerts of the week-end Lambert's new piece of symphonic jazz occupied the center of attention. It is too early to write a fresh review on this work, these columns having discussed it extensively on Thursday and Saturday and briefly yesterday. It is characteristic that young Lambert omits all woodwinds and mellow brass from his orchestration, that he fills his percussion section to the brim and that he demands (and at Symphony Hall receives) virtuoso performance from it. It is noteworthy also that from a score which exploits all the fifty-seven possible varieties of cross-rhythms which one associates with jazz and its parent, rag-time, the one instrument which the popular mind first thinks of as being part and parcel with these styles, the saxophone, is entirely omitted. Apparently Mr. Lambert thinks more of his music than of conventional jazz style. For in passing through one's mind the entire thematic content of the piece, one cannot think of a single theme or passage which seems to demand or would be enhanced by saxophone tone.

It has often been noted that performance improves with repetition with Dr. Koussevitzky. (Indeed with whom would not repetition—up to a reasonable point—improve performance?). Lambert's "The Rio Grande" was only one more case in point. To one listener who heard it both Saturday and yesterday, it sounded last evening more brilliant, more rhythmically pointed, of an increased abandon and elasticity, with climaxes more firmly and broadly placed, but with the gentler measures in the middle and at the end not a whit less suave or less humanly appealing. In retrospect one recalls Lambert's direction. "The chorus should aim at a rather more theatrical and pungent style of singing than is usual with choral societies." One can only answer, "He should have heard the Cecilia Society." They labored (at rehearsal) arduously and at times almost desperately with these unaccustomed rhythms and emphasis. They achieved magnificently. Nothing sounded labored or difficult in their singing; the opposite effect, of verve, of dash, of unbelievable ebullient spirits, came from them. Whether the young composer would have called this singing sufficiently "theatrical" one cannot venture to say. But of its "pungency" there can be no manner of doubt. Also, of Mr. Lambert's powers of vital and original and forceful and worth-while expression there can be no doubt after these performances. One can only hope that this work will be heard reasonably often; and that Mr. Lambert can maintain the high level which he has set for himself in his maiden work of this degree of importance.

With Bach's suite—or the three movements from it—Dr. Koussevitzky was now forceful, now spirited, now suave and expressive, always, in whatever style he and Bach essayed, always eloquent. The air (so often played as a solo "for the G-string") aroused specially the approval of the audience.—And Brahms's symphony brought to a fitting conclusion a notable year in this series of concerts. To some of us it seemed as if Dr. Koussevitzky had placed for himself last evening a new high level with this work. To us it seemed as if the stately beginning had never been quite so stately; as if the melodies had never been sung so penetratingly ("from the heart to the heart"); as if the loftiness and the nobility of the last movement came from new and more deeply conceived bases. It is a piece of good fortune that a series of concerts can end thus.

A. H. M.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last Friday afternoon concert of the 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg"; Debussy, Prelude to Mallarme's "Afternoon of a Faun"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's "Merry Pranks"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, C Minor.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The 51st season, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will open on Oct. 9.

There is little to be said of the works chosen for this concert; little that would be pertinent, for Dr. Koussevitzky, unlike some other conductors, does not pride himself on discovering or inventing "hidden" pasages of beauty or grandeur that have escaped the notice of even illustrious predecessors. It is enough for him to give admirable performances of works as they exist; not as this or that conductor thinks they should have been written, and is eager to supply the deficiencies, the oversights, the carelessness of the composer. Dr. Koussevitzky, having poetic and dramatic imagination, also that indefinable quality which for lack of a better word is called "magnetism," interprets a symphony, suite, symphonic poem, with due respect for the composer's text. He supplies what the composer could not indicate: the vivifying spirit. Music does not exist until it is performed. There are the notes, but they have no significance until the conductor sees in them so many aids in the revealing the composer's spiritual, dramatic, noble, lyrical or passionately sensuous thoughts as they found musical expression.

It is enough to say of the performance yesterday that it was of the finest virtuoso order in which there was full artistic appreciation of the different qualities that have given each composition its commanding place in the literature of music. The audience was enthusiastic. It rose in greeting Dr. Koussevitzky; it saw with unfeigned regret the end of the season; it rejoiced in the announcement that the conductor would again direct the superb, incomparable orchestra of brilliant musicians; the orchestra that he has formed and shaped.

It is customary to say a few words about a season brought to an end. The 50th was of an anniversary nature; conspicuous also for the Bach Festival. Musicians of European countries and of the United States were invited to enlarge the importance of the anniversary by their contribution of compositions. A piece d'occasion is too often only an expression of good will and honorable intention. Of all the more important contributions to the 50th anniversary Roussel's Symphony and Stravinsky's Symphonie de Psaumes were easily the first in rank. It seemed as if Prokofieff had taken his task too easily, hurriedly. His symphony was not worthy of him. The conductor and the audience had a right to expect from Respighi something better than his "Metamorphoseon"; a theme and variations in which variegated instrumentation clothed a poorly nourished body. These were the two conspicuous failures to seize the opportunity.

There has been some ill-considered talk about the undue prominence given to the works of the radical left wing; about the neglect of composers classed as orthodox. Bach was represented by 17 compositions at the regular concerts of the season; Beethoven by seven; Brahms by five; Mozart, Strauss, Wagner, each by four; Haydn by three; Schumann by three; Debussy, Handel, Loeffler, Ravel, Schubert, Sibelius, Tchaikovsky, each by two.

It is true that there were a few works by unfamiliar composers that were as the abomination of desolation; Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" for example; but Nabokov's "Symphonie Lyrique" was not wholly negligible; Kremek's "Little Symphony" was pleasing, as were Pick-Mangiagalli's transcriptions of Bach; Pilati's pretty suite, while Lambert's "Rio Grande" was stormily applauded.

Nor were Americans neglected, shabbily treated. Griffes, Hadley, Hanson, Hill, Loeffler, McKinley, Steinert.

It was a graceful act to invite Sir George Henschel to conduct the first concert. Mr. Arbos is always a welcome visitor. Mr. Hadley showed routine ability as a conductor and had the pleasure of presenting two of his own works. Mr. Burgin gave an engrossing, highly dramatic interpretation of Sibelius's first symphony.

The list of soloists included two who made their first appearance in Boston; surely not their last if the pleasure of the audience has any weight with them: Mr. Milstein, the violinist; Mr. Piatigorsky, the violoncellist. Among the pianists were Messrs. Gieseking and Horowitz; and although Mr. Sanroma was not billed as a soloist, his playing the piano part of Stravinsky's Capriccio and of Lambert's "Rio Grande" was a marked feature of the season.

SYMPHONY ENDS 50TH MUSIC YEAR

Popular Classics Fill List for Final Matinee

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With a programme of popular classics, Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra formally ends this evening.

RESPONSIVE AUDIENCE

Yesterday afternoon the same programme found a responsive audience. There were the usual rites of welcome and of implied farewell, with audience and orchestra standing and clapping as Dr. Koussevitzky came upon the platform. The music of Wagner, Debussy and Strauss, though the performances were not of equal excellence, provoked warm applause, the "Meistersinger" Prelude in particular. And after the playing of the Symphony there were many recalls for the conductor; there was much stamping of feet as well as smiting of palms.

To return to the concert itself, Dr. Koussevitzky was yesterday at least in the first half of the programme, obsessed by a passion for detail and an unusual deliberation of pace. Wagner's Prelude, however, gains in dignity and in impressiveness when not rushed off its feet, as it all too often is nowadays. And if Debussy's Faun was more than commonly langorous, the music has seldom, if ever, been played here with such unfailing loveliness of tone, such a wealth of subtle nuance, such perfection of phrasing.

